His latter days.

A. D.	ITALY.	FRANCE.	GERMANY, &c.
1106	Henry V. Emperor, and King of Italy.	1106 Louis VI.	1106 Henry V. last Emperor of the House of Franconia.
1115	The Countess Matilda of Tuscany bequeaths her extensive Fiefs to the Papal See.	1115 Makes war against Henry I. of England and Normandy.	1115 Rise of the House of Guelf.
1119	First war between Genoa and Pisa.	1118 Second indecisive war with the same Prince.	1119 The Controversy for Ecclesiastical Investitures terminated by the Concordat of Worms.
1122	Concordat of Worms. Termination of the struggle for Ecclesiastical Investitures.
1125	Lothaire II., Emperor and King.	1125 New war in Normandy.	1125 Lothaire II. (of Saxony) Emperor.
1137	Ruin of Amalfi by the Pisans.	1137 Louis VII.	1137 IMPERIAL HOUSE OF SWABIA OR Hohenstaufen.
1138	Conrad III., Emperor and King.		1138 Conrad III. (of Swabia) First Emperor of this Family.
1139	The "Two Sicilies" erected into a Kingdom under Roger II., by Papal investiture.		1139 Fall of Henry the Proud, Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, chief of the House of Guelf, Origin of the Factions of Guelphs and Ghibellines.
1143	Rome under Arnold of Brescia.		1143 Henry the Lion, son of Henry the Proud, recovers Saxony.
1152	Frederic I. (Barbarossa) Emperor and King.	1152 Louis Quinze by his divorce from Eleanor, heiress of that Duchy.	1152 Frederic I. (Barbarossa)
1155	Oppresses the Lombard Cities.
1156			1156 Restores Bavaria to Henry the Lion.
1162	And razes Milan to the ground.	1162 War of Louis with Henry II. of England.	1160 Charles Sverkerus, first King of Sweden and the Goths.
1167	League of the Lombard Cities against him.
1172	Establishment of the Aristocratic Constitution of Venice.	1172 Louis ineffectually supports the sons of Henry in a Rebellion against that Prince.
1176	Great victory of Legnano, gained by the Lombard League over the Emperor Frederic I.
1183	The Peace of Constance establishes the independence of the Lombard Republics.	1180 Philip (II.) Augustus.	1178 Fall of Henry the Lion.
1189	Henry, son of the Emperor, succeeds to the Crown of The Sicilies by marriage with Constance its heiress.	1190 Joins the THIRD CRUSADE.	1183 PEACE OF CONSTANCE.
1190	Henry VI. Emperor, and King of Italy and The Sicilies.		1189 Frederic Barbarossa engages in the THIRD CRUSADE in which he dies; and is succeeded by his son.
		1193 After his return, invades the Norman territories of Richard I. of England.	1190 Henry VI. Emperor, and King of Italy and The Sicilies.
1197	Otto IV. Emperor, and King of Italy; and Frederic II., King of the Sicilies.		1192 Imprisons Richard I. of England on his return from the third Crusade.
1198	The Pontificate of Innocent III. commences. Rapid increase of the Papal Power.		1194 And restores to Henry the Lion his Allodial Estates only, which afterwards comprise the two Duchies of Brunswick.
1194	In the FOURTH CRUSADE, Venice acquires a share of the dismembered Empire of the East. The Factions of Guelphs and Ghibellines introduced into Italy by the struggle of the Papal and Imperial Powers. Continual Wars among the Lombard Cities. Rise of Florence.	1194 And by the Conquest of Constantinople establish the Latin Empire of the East.	1197 Death of Henry VI. Double election of Otto (son of Henry the Lion) and Philip of Swabia.
		1195 Philip conquers Normandy from John of England.	1192 Waldemar II., King of Denmark, with extensive dominions.

SPAIN.	ENGLAND.	THE EASTERN AND MOHAMMEDAN EMPIRES.
4 Alfonso I., King of Aragon. 9 And of Castile also by marriage with Urraca his Queen, becoming Alfonso VII. in that Kingdom. 8 Captures from the Saracens Saragosa, thenceforward the Capital of Aragon. 8 Alfonso VIII., King of Leon and Castile. 8 Ramiro II., King of Aragon. 8 Petronilla, Queen of Aragon. Barcelona united with Aragon by her marriage with Raymond V. its Count. 9 Alfonso, Count of Portugal, thenceforth first King of that Country, defeats the Saracens in a great Battle at Ourique. 10 Takes Lisbon from the Saracens.	A. D. I. HOUSE OF NORMANDY. (Continued.) 1100 Henry I., King of England. 1105 Makes his Brother Robert prisoner, and obtains possession of Normandy. 1113 First decisive war with Louis VI. of France. 1118 Confederacy against Henry, headed by the French King, but terminated by a peace. 1120 Shipwreck and death of Prince William, Henry's Son. 1123 New war in Normandy, shortly followed by a pacification. 1126 Stephen, King of England. 1128 The King of Scots invades England, and is defeated in the battle of "The Standard." 1129 Landing in England of the Empress Matilda, daughter of Henry I., and commencement of Civil War. 1141 Battle of Lincoln. Stephen made prisoner, but in a few months released. 1147 Matilda leaves England. 1150 Her son Henry obtains possession of Normandy, and (1155) of Gascony by marriage. 1153 And concludes a peace with Stephen upon condition of succeeding him. II. HOUSE OF PLANTAGENET. 1154 Henry II., King of England. 1159 War with Louis VII. of France. 1162 Thomas à Becket created Archbishop of Canterbury, and quarrels with the King. 1164 Constitutions of Clarendon. Flight of Becket to France. 1170 The King and Becket are reconciled. Murder of the Archbishop. 1171 Henry invades Ireland, and receives the submission of its Princes. 1173 Conquest of Ireland. 1175 Rebellion of his sons, assisted by Louis VII. of France. 1178 Reconciliation of Henry with those Princes. 1183 Second Rebellion of his Sons. 1189 Richard I., (Cœur de Lion,) King of England. 1190 Undertakes the THIRD CRUSADE. 1192 And is detained prisoner by the Emperor Henry VI. on his return from Palestine. 1193 His Brother John, assisted by Philip II. of France, attempts to seize the Crown. 1194 Ransom and restoration of Richard to his Kingdom. 1199 John, King of England. 1200 Murder of his Nephew, Arthur of Brittany. 1204 Philip II. of France wrests Normandy from John.	A. D. 1098 Commencement of the FIRST CRUSADE. 1099 Capture of Jerusalem by the Crusaders. Foundation of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem under Godfrey of Bouillon. 1100 Baldwin I., King of Jerusalem. 1118 John, (or Calo Johannes,) Emperor of the East. Baldwin II., King of Jerusalem. 1131 Falk of Anjou, King of Jerusalem. 1143 Manuel, Emperor of the East. 1144 Baldwin III., King of Jerusalem. 1145 Rise of Noureddin, Atabec of the Turks, in Syria. 1147 The SECOND CRUSADE. 1169 Almeric, King of Jerusalem. 1167 Egypt conquered by the Latins. 1169 Not wrested from them by Noureddin. 1171 End of the Fatimite Khalifate of Egypt. Rise of Sa'ad. 1173 Baldwin IV., King of Jerusalem. 1180 Alvisius II., Emperor of the East. 1183 Andronicus I., (Comnenus,) Emperor of the East. Guy de Lusignan, King of Jerusalem. 1185 Ismar II., (Angelin,) Emperor of the East. 1186 Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, Arabia, and Syria. 1187 Defeats the Latins in the great Battle of Tiberias, and CAPTURES JERUSALEM. 1190 THE THIRD CRUSADE. 1191 The Crusaders recapture Acre, and (1192) defeat Saladin in the Battle of Arsuf. 1193 Death of Saladin, and division of his Empire. 1195 Alexius III., (Angelin,) Emperor of the East. 1202 THE FOURTH CRUSADE. 1204 Ends in the capture of Constantinople. Baldwin I., Latin Emperor of Constantinople. Theodore Lascaris, Greek Emperor of Nice. 1206 Henry, Latin Emperor of Constantinople.

ITALY.	FRANCE.	GERMANY, &c.
A. D.	A. D.	A. D.
1208 Ferrara chooses the Marquis of Este for her Signora.	1208 Crusade against the Albigens.	1208 Otto IV., sole Emperor; excommunicated by Pope Innocent III.,
1214 Frederic II., Emperor, and King of Italy and The Sicilies.	1214 Philip defeats the Emperor Otto IV. at the great Battle of Bouvines.	1214 Defeated at the great Battle of Bouvines by Philip, gusius of France, and deposed. Frederic II. (son of Henry VI.) Emperor.
1216 Death of Pope Innocent III.	1216 His son Louis in England, ineffectually aspires to the Crown.	1216 The Fifth Crusade undertaken by the King of Hungary and German Princes.
	1218 Many French Nobles join the Fifth Crusade.	1220 Henry, son of the Emperor, elected King of the Romans to succeed him.
	1223 Louis VIII.
1226 Second League of the Lombard Cities, encouraged by the Papacy.	1226 Louis IX. (St. Louis.)	1227 The Emperor excommunicated by Pope Gregory IX. for delaying to engage in a Crusade.
	1229 Acquisition of Languedoc as an Appanage of the Crown.	1228 He embarks for Palestine, obtains the crown of Jerusalem from the Sultan of Egypt.
	1230 First war with Henry III. of England.	1229 Receives the Crown of Palestine at Jerusalem in spite of his wife, and returns to Europe.
1230 Complete establishment of THE INQUISITION.
1234 Indecisive war of the Lombard League with the Emperor.		1234 War excited against him in Italy by the Papacy.
	1238 The French Nobles join the Sixth Crusade.	1238 His son deposed from the dignity of King of the Romans for rebellion against him.
1239 Frederic excommunicated by Pope Gregory IX.		1239 Frederic again excommunicated by Pope Gregory IX.
	1242 Second war with Henry III. of England.	1241 Rise of the Hanseatic League.
1245 The Council of Lyons under Pope Innocent IV. passes a sentence of excommunication and deposition against Frederic II.	1245 Louis IX. obtains Provence by marriage.	1245 The Council of Lyons, under Pope Innocent IV., passes sentence of excommunication and deposition against him.
	1248 Engages in the SEVENTH CRUSADE.	1248 He completes the dream of pretenders to the Imperial Crown.
1250 Death of Frederic and Interregnum of the Empire. His son Conrad, King of the Sicilies.	1249 Captures Damietta.	1250 Death of Frederic II. GREAT INTERREGNUM IN THE EMPIRE, a period of anarchy for twenty-three years.
1253 Rome under the Senator Brancalione.	1250 But is made prisoner near Cairo with the loss of his army, and ransomed.	1250 Ottocar II. of Bohemia conquers Austria and marries Duchess.
1254 Death of Conrad, King of The Sicilies.	1254 He returns to France.	1254 Death of Conrad, King of the Sicilies. (son of Frederic.)
1257 Milan falls under the tyranny of the Torriani.		1255 Confederacy of the Rhenish Cities for their common protection.
1259 Ferocious naval war of Venice and Genoa.	1259 Restore several conquered Provinces by treaty to Henry III. of England.
	1261 Burgundy becomes an Appanage of the Crown.
		1268 Death of Conrad, Grandson of Frederic. EXTINCTION OF THE HOUSE OF Hohenstaufen.
1266 Conquest of The Sicilies by Charles of Anjou, who defeats and puts to death Conradin, son of Conrad. Extinction of the House of Hohenstaufen or Swabian.	1270 Louis IX. undertakes the EIGHTH AND LAST CRUSADE; dies before Tunis; and is succeeded by his son, Philip (III.) the Bold.
1272 Rodolph of Hapsburg, Emperor, and King of Italy.	1271 The great Pief of Languedoc lapses to the Crown.	1273 Rodolph of Hapsburg, Founder of the House of Austria, Emperor.
1277 The Visconti obtain the government of Milan.		1278 Cedes Romagna to the Papal See. And, after several successful wars against Ottocar of Bohemia, defeats him in a battle, in which that Prince was slain.
1278 The Emperor Rodolph cedes Romagna to the Papal See.
1292 Revolt of Sicily from Charles of Anjou. Massacre of the "Sicilian Vespers."		1293 Rodolph inherits his son Albert with the Archduchy of Austria.
1294 Great Battle of Meloria, between Genoa and Pisa, which extinguishes the maritime power of the latter Republic.	1295 Philip (IV.) the Fair.	1291 Adolphus of Nassau, Emperor. Commencement of the struggle of the Swiss against the tyranny of Adolf of Austria.

HISTORY.

Commencement, to the Close of the Crusades.

1291.

SPAIN.	ENGLAND.	THE EASTERN AND MOHAMMEDAN EMPIRES.
	A. D. 1207 Quarrel of John with Pope Innocent III., who lays the Kingdom under an interdict. 1209 Excommunicates the King.	A. D.
1212 Signal victory over the Saracens near Tolosa. 1213 James I., King of Aragon. 1214 Henry I., King of Castile.	1212 And issues a sentence of deposition against him. Abjoints submission of John. 1215 Revolt of the English Barons, and SIGMUND OF MAISON CHASTRA by John, who immediately violates it. 1216 The Barons offer the Crown to Prince Louis of France. Death of John, and accession of Henry III. 1217 Louis compelled to abandon his enterprise.	1214 The Tartars, or Moghuls, under Zing a Khan, d China. 1216 THE FIFTH CRUSADE. 1217 Peter de Courtenay, Latin Emperor of Constantinople.
1217 The King of Leon becomes Alfonso X. of Castile by marriage with Berenguela, heiress of Henry I. Final reunion of the two Kingdoms.	1218 Many English Nobles join the FIFTH CRUSADE.	1221 Robert, Latin Emperor of Constantinople. 1222 John Ducas Vatatzes, Greek Emperor of Nice. 1224 Ravage of Persia by Zingis Khan.
1218 Ferdinand III., King of Leon and Castile.	1230 First ineffectual expedition of Henry III. into France for the recovery of his States.	1228 Baldwin II. and John de Brienne, Latin Emperors of Constantinople. 1229 The Emperor Frederic II. of Germany, in Palestine. Recovers Jerusalem by treaty from the Sultan of Egypt. 1231 Jerusalem again seized by the Turks. 1236 THE SIXTH CRUSADE.
1218 James I. of Aragon completes the conquest of the Balearic Isles from the Saracens.	1240 Richard, Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, leads the SIXTH CRUSADE, and redeems Jerusalem. 1241 Expedition of Henry III. into France; defeated in the battle of Taillebourg.	1240 Jerusalem redeemed by the Earl of Cornwall. 1242 But finally lost.
1218 Cordova taken from the Saracens by Ferdinand III. of Leon and Castile. 1218 James I. of Aragon conquers Valencia from the Saracens.	1246 The King recovers his power.	1246 THE SEVENTH CRUSADE in Egypt. 1250 Ends in the capture of Louis IX. of France.
1217 Ferdinand III. captures Seville, and	1253 Civil War. 1254 The King takes prisoner at the battle of Lewes. THE COMMONS FIRST summoned to PARLIAMENT. 1255 The battle of Evesham. Defeat and death of Montfort.	1255 Theodore Lascaris II., Greek Emperor of Nice. 1256 The Tartars conquer Persia, and put an end to the Seljukian Power and the nominal Khalifate of Baghdad. 1259 John Lascaris, 1260 Michael Palaiologus, Greek Emperors of Nice. 1261 Recovery of Constantinople from the Latins. Michael Palaiologus, Emperor of the East.
1218 Completes his victorious career by further conquests in Andalusia. 1218 Alfonso XI., King of Leon and Castile.	1270 Prince Edward joins the EIGHTH AND LAST CRUSADE. 1273 Edward I., King of England. 1274 Returns to England from the Crusade.	1270 THE EIGHTH AND LAST CRUSADE. 1273 Conquest of the Seljukian Kingdom of Roum by the Moghuls. 1279 Conquest of China by the Moghuls. 1282 Andronicus the Elder, Emperor of the East.
1218 Pedro III., King of Aragon.	1284 Final Conquest of Wales.
1218 Acquires the Crown of Sicily.	1291 The Scottish Barons and Prelates formally acknowledge the Sovereignty of Edward.	1291 Fall of Acre, the last Christian possession in Palestine. END OF THE CRUSADES.
1218 Sancho IV., King of Leon and Castile. 1218 Alfonso III. } Kings of Aragon. 1218 James I. }

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXXII.

THE FIRST CRUSADE.

FROM A. D. 1095 TO A. D. 1099.

History. HAVING followed out the Annals of the Middle Ages to the commencement of those expeditions, in which the martial and fanatical ardour of the European nations was precipitated and exhausted on the shores of Asia and Africa, we approach a new and memorable series of events: the most stupendous which the Universe had witnessed, since the overthrow of the Roman Empire, and the establishment of the Mohammedan Religion and Power. To this interesting Period, on which we are about to enter,—filling in duration just two hundred years,—several properties conspired to give a peculiar and determinate character. It began and ended with the sudden development, and with the slow but total extinction, of a single mighty passion in the rude European mind. It presented the first example of combined and continuous action for a common object among those nations of Barbarian origin, who had founded the modern Monarchies of Europe on the ruins of the Roman dominion. It threw, for the first time since the consolidation of the Gothic and Mohammedan conquests, the powers of the Western and Eastern World into formal and general collision; and it witnessed and tried, on the plains of Syria and Egypt, the embattled cause of Christendom and Islam. Nor is there wanting, in the internal fortunes of each of the European Kingdoms, some remarkable consummation which may be distinctly traced, and is accurately defined, within the limits of the same Period of History. Whatever share of influence we may with different Writers concede or deny to the operation of one common cause, the triumph of Royal authority over Feudalism in France; the secure foundation of the Constitutional System in England; the completion of the Aristocratic and Municipal liberties of the Imperial Germanic body; the victorious extension of the Christian Monarchies of Spain from the Ebro to the Guadalquivir; the rise and growth of commerce and freedom in the Italian Republics; and the gradual elevation of the Papal Power to its meridian grandeur; are all at least strictly contained in the order of time, within the same exact Period of two Centuries, which was filled with the great simultaneous episode of THE CRUSADES.

General causes of those enterprises.

State of Religion.

The predisposing circumstances which led to those famous enterprises, and thereby impressed such singular features on the History of the Period before us, are to be sought rather in the general aspect and feelings of Society during the Ages immediately antecedent, than in the occurrence of any particular events. Amidst the lawless violence which preceded and attended the settlement of the Feudal System, the voice of Religion could seldom be heard above the perpetual din of armed rapine; and her influence, instead of being habitually exercised over the consciences of men, was felt only with startling remorse in some brief interval of sickness or calamity. Then, the rude and superstitious warrior, with the same untempered energy of passion, was prepared to rush at once from the perpetration of atrocious crime to seek its atonement in exercises of the severest penance. Equally among Churchmen and Laity, the devotional spirit of the times, such as it was, knew no other mode of reconciliation with offended Heaven, than in these acts of mortification. But if many sought to expiate their guilt in the passive austerities of the Cloister, it was more congenial to the restless and enterprising character, which marked the Northern mind, to embrace the encounter with fatigue and peril, as the surest test and the most acceptable tribute of repentant faith. The Romish Clergy, therefore, probably only indulged instead of creating a popular inclination, when, in the VIIIth and IXth Centuries, they began to commute the more ancient penances enjoined by the Canons of the Church, for pilgrimages to Rome, to the shrines of various Saints, and above all to Jerusalem. The desire of visiting the places on which celebrated events have occurred, seems, indeed, a curiosity too deeply implanted in our nature to belong to any particular time or condition of Man; but the associations connected with the hallowed scene of Human Redemption were calculated to sanctify this feeling with peculiar interest, and had rendered journeys to Jerusalem not uncommon in some of the earliest Ages of Christianity. When this practice was communicated to the Gothic nations, the love of pilgrimages gradually became almost a universal passion; and though its objects were deformed by the grossness of superstition, and its course much diverted to Rome itself, and to those shrines in different Countries at which pretended miracles were wrought, especially that of St. James at Compostella,* in Spain, the stream of mistaken yet sincere devotion continued to set steadily towards the shores of Palestine.

But the impulse which, above all others, had a tendency to increase the ardour for pilgrimages, arose from a growing belief, early in the XIth Century, that the end of the World was at hand. It was imagined that the thousand years mentioned in the Apocalypse would speedily be fulfilled; that the reign of Antichrist approached; and that the terrors of the last Judgment would immediately follow.* In proportion as this erroneous interpretation of Sacred Prophecy gained wider credence, the Western World became violently agitated with fearful forebodings of the destruction which awaited the Earth; every delusive form of propitiation for sin in penance and pilgrimage was eagerly embraced; and as it was concluded that to visit the scenes of Redemption was both a meritorious and a preservative act, multitudes annually flocked to Jerusalem, to revive and recover those hopes of salvation which withered under the remembrance of habitual guilt. When an expedient so quieting to the consciences of men in a state of Society equally fruitful of crime and superstition, had once been discovered, inducements were not wanting for its repetition; and the custom surpassed and survived its original impulse and occasion. Throughout the Xth and XIth Centuries, the passion for pilgrimages was ever on the increase; and it is recorded of a single company which visited the Holy Sepulchre, about the middle of the latter Age, that its numbers were no fewer than seven thousand persons.†

* For some account of the circumstances which gave celebrity to the shrine of St. James at Compostella, vide p. 439 of this vol.—me.

Foremost among the devotees, as among the warriors of the times, were the Normans. That singular and high spirited People, in every respect the most remarkable of the Barbarian races, had no sooner become converts to Christianity, than they strangely infused into their Religious profession the same wild and enthusiastic temper, the same ardour for adventurous enterprise, which had distinguished their Pagan career. The conquest of Southern Italy, which originated entirely in the casual return of their pilgrims from the Holy Land through that theatre of Saracen warfare;‡ is in itself a striking memorial both of their addiction to such Religious journeyings, and of the equal readiness for either devout or martial achievement by which they were animated. Traversing Italy in the route between their own land and the Mediterranean ports which communicated with Palestine, in small but well-armed bands, the Norman pilgrims were prepared alike either to crave hospitality in the blessed name of the Cross, or to force their way at the point of the lance. Their victorious establishment in Italy tended to increase their intercourse with the East; their daring assaults upon the Byzantine Empire, though foreign to our present subject, attest their undiminished thirst of enterprise; and we shall find the sons of the Norman conquerors of the Sicilies and England figuring among the chief promoters and warriors of the First Crusade.

Such a union of Religious and martial ardour, however, was by no means confined to the Normans; and the XIth Century was marked, throughout Western Europe, by the general expansion of a spirit, of which the organized result may be numbered among the most active and powerful causes of the Crusades. This was the institution of CHIVALRY. The rude origin of a state of manners so extraordinary in itself, and so restricted to the descendants of the great Northern Race,‡ is obviously to be found in those ceremonies which, among their ancestors in the German forests,* attended the assumption of arms by the youthful warrior. In subsequent Ages the same forms of martial investiture, with little addition or variation, were preserved among the conquerors of the Roman Empire, and perpetuated in every Kingdom which they had founded. In the Lombard Annals; in a recorded Act, as well as occasionally in the Capitularies of Charlemagne; and in the Chronicles of our own Saxon Era; are to be found sufficient evidence of a common practice in the ceremonial investiture of Knighthood. We may here overlap the chain of circumstances which, in later connection with Feudal and Social obligations, imparted to the spirit of Chivalry, which in the outset was only essentially martial, its more graceful virtues of loyalty and honour, courtesy and benevolence, generosity to enemies, protection to the feeble and the oppressed, and respectful tenderness to Woman. To trace the growth of these beautiful attributes of Chivalry, as a Moral and Social system, belongs not to our present inquiry; and it will suffice to notice in this place that admixture of Religious ideas and duties with a military institution, which converted it into a ready engine of superstitious excitement, and singularly disposed the public mind of Europe for any enterprise of fanatical warfare.

The exact epoch at which Chivalry acquired a Religious character, it is neither easy, nor is it material, to ascertain. In the Age of Charlemagne, and in his might seem a work of supererogation to insist on the fact; if an accomplished modern Writer (Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. iii. p. 482.) had not, in rather an elaborate passage, cited the Achilles of Homer as a beautiful portraiture of the Chivalric character "in its most general form." On this position it may, in the first place, be remarked as singular, that Mr. Hallam should number "a calm indifference to the cause in which he was engaged" among the qualities of the Homeric hero, as suggesting a parallel with the Knightly character; of which enthusiastic and loyal devotion in enterprise formed the peculiar attributes. In the next place, the resentment of Achilles for the loss of Briseis merely as his captured property, is utterly repugnant to that principle of respectful idleness for the Fair, which every true Knight cherished as an indispensable article in his creed of love and honour. In fact, the most irreconcilable distinction between the manners of the Classical and Gothic Ages rests, as we have before had occasion to remark, on the totally opposite estimation of Woman. Finally, the conduct of Achilles, both in suffering the inferior herd of Greeks to strike the corpse of Hector, and in dragging the lifeless body of his noble ad fallen antagonist at his chariot wheels, would have been held utterly abhorrent from Chivalric ideas of courtesy; and Mr. Hallam, a few pages further on, has quoted a passage from a Chronicle of the XIth Century, which denounces the act of insulting the dead body of an enemy as the lowest depth of infamy. Thus altogether, to say nothing of the absence of that dedication of the sword to the cause of Heaven, which, mistaken as it was, gave a Religious impression to the Knightly character, the portraiture of Achilles is completely destitute of those qualities of loyalty, devotedness to Woman, and courtesy to enemies, which Mr. Hallam himself justly specifies as virtues essential to Chivalry. That lofty energy of the soul, which is inspired by contempt of death and thirst for glory, and displayed in daring and magnanimous achievement, constitutes indeed, the vital essence of Heroism under every form of Society; but into this hesitating of action, common to the Grecian and the Gothic warrior, it was the singular peculiarity of the Chivalric spirit, to infuse the triple incentive and sentiment of Religion, Social, and Amatory obligation; and instead of sustaining the parallel suggested, the Homeric representation, amounting as it does in native sublimity of conception, might, with more propriety, be selected for a sufficient example of the contrast between the Heroic character in the two great Romantic Ages of the Ancient and Modern World.

* Tacitus, De Moribus Germanorum, c. 13.

† Paulus Diaconus, De Gestis Langobard. c. 23, 24. Vita Ludovici Pi. ad Ann. 791. Malinbury, lib. ii. c. 2.

* Chron. Guil. Godelli, (in Recueil des Historiens Français, vol. x.) p. 262. De Vic et de Vaissette, Hist. de Languedoc, vol. ii. p. 86—117, &c.

‡ As Robertson has remarked, (Hist. of Charles V. vol. i. note 13,) even many of the Charters of the XIth Century have for preamble, "Appropinquante mundi terminus." &c.

§ Inquisita, Historia, p. 963, 964.

¶ Leo Ostensis, Chron. Mon. Cassin. lib. ii. c. 37. Giannone, Historia di Napoli, vol. i. p. 7.

‡ The want of all resemblance to the spirit of Chivalry in the manners and sentiments of Classical Antiquity is so obvious, that it

The First Crusade.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

Union of martial and superstitious feelings.

History. Empire at least, the form of Knightly investiture was certainly unattended by any vows or Ecclesiastical ceremonies.* But in the Xth Century it had become common to invoke the aid of Religion in the inauguration of the Knight; his sword was laid on the altar, blessed, and even sometimes girded to his side, by the Priest; and his solemn vow dedicated its use to the service of Heaven, in the special defence of the Church, as well as the general protection of the weak and the oppressed. The more complete conversion of the whole process of investiture into a Religious ceremonial; the previous vigils, confession, prayer, and receipt of the Sacrament; the bath and the robe of white linen, as emblems of purification; all those preparations, in short, by which the entrance into the Knightly, was designedly assimilated to that into the Monastic profession, formed the growth of rather later times†. But there is abundant proof of the success of the Church, before the Crusades, in infusing some Religious principle into the martial spirit of Chivalry‡. For this, justice has scarcely been extended to the motives of the Romish Clergy by different classes of Writers, who, whether from indignation at the real corruptions of that Church, or from hostility to the cause of Christianity itself, can discover only unmingled evil in the Ecclesiastical policy of the Middle Ages. But apart from the lower and more interested purpose, in itself surely not unjustifiable, of converting the martial temper of lawless communities into a means of defence for the Church; the Clergy of the Xth Century appear to have laboured with a zeal and sincerity above suspicion, in mitigating a spirit which they could not subdue. Their efforts to soften the ferocity and harmonize the feelings of the times by their reprobation of private wars, and judicial combats, have been already observed;§ and there seems no reason to doubt that, in covering the ceremonies of Chivalry with the sanction of Religion, their policy was originally animated by a principle equally praiseworthy. In the same Knightly vows which they demanded or registered at the Altar, engagements to abstain from secret perfidy and open wrong, to shield the oppressed, and to do justice to all Christian men, were at least mingled with the obligation of fidelity and protection to the Church itself. The ultimate extension of these pledges into the imaginary duty of warring to the utterance against all Infidels, was indeed as incompatible with the generally peaceful designs of the Clergy, as it was repugnant to every genuine precept of the Gospel. But in a Period so turbulent that even the ordinary social virtues could be no better exercised and protected than at the sword's point, a warlike and ignorant race passed, by an easy and obvious transition, into the monstrous error of believing, that the sincerity of their Faith and the cause of Divine Truth were to be proven and upheld by the same carnal weapon.

Progress of fanatical enthusiasm.

This doctrine was too congenial both to the fierce manners and superstitious feelings of the Laity to need the suggestions of the Ecclesiastical Order for its excitement; and it may well be questioned whether the Clergy directed or merely shared and obeyed the impulse of the times. They who can see nothing in the pilgrimizing and Crusading madness of the Xth and XIth Centuries but the influence of a crafty system of Ecclesiastical policy, attribute to the Clergy a far greater superiority of intellect over the spirit of their Age than they apparently possessed, only to fix the deeper stigma upon the abuse of their power. It is not only more probable in itself, but more consistent with Historical evidence, to conclude that they were fervently imbued with the fanaticism which they are accused of having coolly excited; a vast number of Prelates and inferior Ecclesiastics shared in the toils and dangers of pilgrimages and Crusades; and the sincerity of the preachers and the warriors of those expeditions must in general be tried by the same standard of mistaken enthusiasm. In every sense, indeed, it was the union of Religious and martial principles, first effected in the Chivalric institutions, which prepared and prolonged the fanatical madness of Europe: the profession of arms became hallowed by its presumed dedication to the service of Heaven; and we may therefore enlarge on the definition of a celebrated Writer, in pronouncing Chivalry to have been at one both a principal cause and an enduring consequence of the Crusades.*

Such, then, through the united influence of martial enthusiasm and superstitious feelings, were the circumstances which predisposed the nations of Western Europe for any enterprise of fanatical warfare. The immediate occasion of the Crusades must be related in retrospect to the fall of Jerusalem, and the affairs of both the Byzantine and the Muhammedan Empires. During a long interval of above four Centuries, between its capture by Omar, and by the Seljukian Turks, Jerusalem had shared the vicissitudes of Saracen revolution; and the treatment both of its Christian inhabitants and of the pilgrims who thronged to its sacred places, was variously affected by the temper of its Musulman Lords. After the fierce spirit of intolerance, which animated the Saracens in their early career of proselyting conquest, had subsided, and during the more tranquil period of the Khalifate, no obstacle was opposed either to the exercise of worship by residents, or to the resort of devout strangers. The spot which tradition had assigned to the Holy Sepulchre, together with the Church of the Resurrection originally built by Constantine the Great,† were left in possession of the Christians; and satisfied with the exaction of a small tribute from every inhabitant and pilgrim, the Saracen Governors even encouraged the periodical increase of population which swelled their revenues. The reign of Haroun Al Raschid was especially marked as a Period of undisturbed communication between the Latin world and Jerusalem; and the transmission of the keys of the city to Charlemagne by that Khalif, though assuredly not designed as a surrender of its sovereignty, was an elegant expression of esteem for the Emperor of the Western Christians, and a pledge of secure access for his subjects‡.

When, in the Xth Century, Jerusalem fell under the dominion of the Fatimite Khalifs of Egypt, the resort of pilgrims to Jerusalem was equally protected by the first two Princes of that Dynasty, who were not insensible to the benefits of the commercial intercourse of the same fleets which conveyed these devout passengers.

* Vita Lucie. Pri. ubi suprà.

† Du Cange, Glossarium in v. Arma, Miles, &c.

‡ Du Cange, in v. Miles. Muratori, Antiq. Med. Ævi. Diss. lvi.

§ Vide p. 276 of this volume.

* Gibbon, Decline and Fall, &c. vol. xi. p. 41.

† Eusebius, in Vita Constantini. lib. iii. c. 25.

‡ Eginhart Vita Caroli Magni, p. 80—81. Willermus Tyrensis Archiepiscopus, (Gesta Dei per Francos), p. 639.

But when the phrensy of Hakem, the third Fatimite Khalif, as we have already observed,* instigated him to destroy, or at least greatly to injure, the Church of the Resurrection and the rock of the Sepulchre, the horrors of a Persecution which he at the same time inflicted on the Christians of Jerusalem interrupted the devotional visits of their Western brethren; and the report of his sacrilegious tyranny first excited that indignation of the Latin World at the possession and profanation of the Holy Sepulchre by Infidels, which afterwards burst into action with an energy so tremendous. Before the institutions of Chivalry were sufficiently matured to feed this kindling spirit, the death of Hakem, and the return of his successors to a more tolerant policy, again opened the shores of Palestine to the devotion of Europe; the Church of the Resurrection rose from its ruins; the Holy Sepulchre was repaired; and the custom of pilgrimage, stimulated by its temporary repression, was renewed with tenfold ardour. An immense tide of population flowed from every Western Country towards Jerusalem; and, in the language of a contemporary Chronicler, the innumerable multitude of pilgrims comprehended the lowest and middle orders of the people, Counts, Princes, and dignified Prelates, and even women, as well of noble as of poorer condition.†

During the remaining period of the Fatimite dominion in Palestine, these pious visitants continued to experience from the Mussulman tyrants of the land, in the alternations of policy and caprice, just sufficient protection to encourage their concourse, with abundant injuries to exasperate that desire of vengeance which they communicated to the whole Western World. Precisely when this feeling, nourished by the general pre-dispositions in the social state of Europe to which we have referred, had acquired full strength, it was forced into impetuous action by one of those sudden and violent vicissitudes of revolution, to which Asia in every Age of her History has been subject. In their rapid career of conquest, the Seljukian Turks, in an uncertain year towards the close of the XIth Century, became the masters of Palestine.‡ Those recent and fierce converts to Islamism, appearing as the champions of the Abassidian Khalifs of Bagdad, were animated with equal hatred against the Fatimite possessors and the Christian tributaries of Palestine; and their entrance into Jerusalem was marked by an indiscriminate massacre. The fanatical cruelty of a race of barbarians, with the sanguinary precepts of the Koran freshly engrafted on their native ferocity, was untempered, like that of the more civilized Saracens, by any motives of toleration; the Christian Clergy in Jerusalem were frequently tortured and imprisoned in mere wanton fury, or for the sake of the ransom which their sufferings wrung from their brethren; and the Latin pilgrims, who, in defiance of danger, were still urged by pious impulses to visit the Holy Land, were exposed in their journey through it, and in their devotions at the Sepulchre, to every variety of insult and spoliation from the savage and greedy Turks. The reports which they circulated on their return, both of the afflictions of the Church of Jerusalem and of their own endured wrongs, agitated all Christendom with an universal sentiment of mingled horror, shame, and vengeance, at the profanation of the holy places of Jerusalem, the imaginary disgrace of suffering the scenes of Human Redemption to remain in the hands of sacrilegious Infidels, and the conviction that the punishment of their impious atrocities was a duty enjoined equally by Religion and by Honour.*

While these feelings were shared with deep sincerity alike by the great body of the Clergy and Laity of Western Europe, events had arisen in the state of the Byzantine Empire, which gave the Papal See an immediate motive of political interest in directing the strong impulse of the Age to a Religious war. When the victorious career of the Seljukian Turks under Alp Arslan,† began to threaten the safety of Constantinople itself, the Emperor Michael VII., in the extremity of his distress and terror, grasped at a faint hope of succour by addressing himself to the Ruler of the Latin Church. Through a mission to Pope Gregory VII., he exposed the common danger of Christendom from the new growth of the Mohammedan Power, declared his reverence for the Papal authority, and implored its exercise for his aid among the Princes of the West. Such an application, which seemed to promise the submission of the Greek Church to the Papacy, opened views of aggrandizement, too congenial to the towering ambition and adventurous spirit of Gregory to be received with indifference; and he strenuously exhorted the Sovereigns of Europe by encyclical epistles to arm against the Infidels. In these letters the principal recommendation was the union of the two Churches of Christendom for a general armament against the Turks; but in a single passage announcing that fifty thousand warriors had already declared their willingness to be led to the redemption of the Holy Sepulchre, is first; plainly shadowed out the great subsequent design of the Crusades.§

The proposal of Gregory VII. was not yet, however, directed with sufficient singleness of purpose to the shores of Palestine to inflame the kindling enthusiasm of the West; and the opportunity of maturing his daring project was reserved for his successor and imitator Urban II. A renewal of the supplication which had been addressed to Gregory, was produced by the increasing distress of the Eastern Empire; and the subsequent connection of its affairs with the First Crusade requires that we should here briefly resume the thread of the Byzantine Annals, which we dropped in the last Chapter with the accession of Alexius Comnenus. That Prince, at the outset of his reign, found his dominions assailed simultaneously on opposite extremities by the arms of the Normans of Italy and the Seljukian Turks. The invasion of Greece by Robert Guiscard, the first Norman Duke of Calabria, with the magnificent design of conquering the Eastern Empire, demanded the earliest care of Alexius; and though his resistance was gallant and vigorous, his defeat by the Norman in the great battle of Durazzo, shook the tottering fabric of Byzantine Power to its centre. The distraction of an Italian war arrested Guiscard in the subjugation of Greece, and

The First Crusade.
From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

II. Distress of the Byzantine Empire from the Turkish conquests.
Supplication of the Emperor Michael VII. to the Papacy for aid.

Scheme of Pope Gregory VII.

Reign of Alexius I. (Comnenus.) Kinship of the East.
A. D.
1081.

* Willermus Tyr. p. 634.

† Vide supra, p. 370.

‡ It is usual to infer that the first design of a Crusade was contained in an encyclical letter of Pope Sylvester II. at the commencement of the XIth Century. But the object of his epistle (Recurd de Hist. Francia, vol. x. p. 425.) does not appear to have gone beyond the obtaining of some pecuniary succour from Christendom for the distressed Church of Jerusalem.

§ Epistole Greg. VII. lib. i. c. 8. (in Labbé, Concilia, vol. x.)

* Vide p. 570 of this volume.

† Glaber, lib. iv. in Recueil des Hist. Françaises, vol. x. p. 50.

‡ Willermus Tyr. p. 633.

History.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

Cession of Asia Minor
to the Turks.

A. D.
1054.

The Selju-kian Kingdom of Roum invades the Empire.

perhaps saved Constantinople from his assaults;* but his enterprise had favoured the progress of the Turks in the Eastern Provinces of the Empire; and Alexius was compelled to purchase their forbearance by the formal cession of Asia Minor. The establishment, in that wealthy region, of the subordinate Seljukian Kingdom of Roum, or of the Romans,—a title in itself insulting to the proud pretensions, and fallen majesty, of the successors of Constantine—contracted the Eastern frontiers of their Empire to the shores of the Bosphorus and the Hellespont. The residence of Solymán, the Sultan of Roum, was fixed at Nice in Bithynia, within a hundred miles of Constantinople; and the Turkish outposts were separated only by the strait from the Imperial Capital. A hollow pacification did not prevent Solymán from meditating the passage of that channel; and his preparation of a naval armament filled Alexius with reasonable alarm for the safety of the European remnant of his dominions.† Following the example of Michael VII., he addressed the most earnest entreaties for succour to the Pope and the temporal Princes of Western Christendom.‡ The independent partitions of the Seljukian conquests on the death of Malek Shah, and the decline of the Turkish Power through intestine dissensions, relieved the pressure on the Byzantine Empire; and Alexius was enabled even to recover some portion of Asia Minor from the successor of Solymán: but his envoys were yet resident at the Papal Court, when by an instrument apparently far more powerless, that spark was struck into the enthusiasm of Europe, which threw its combustible elements into one general conflagration of Religious warfare.

III. Peter the Hermit.

The name and story of the extraordinary individual who lit up this unquenchable flame of fanaticism, must be familiar to every reader. Peter the Hermit was a poor gentleman of Picardy, who after following in arms his Feudal Lord, Eustace de Bouillon, and vainly attempting to improve his fortunes by an alliance with a lady of noble family, had, in some moment either of disappointed ambition, or of awakened remorse for deeper guilt, escaped from a profitless service and a distasteful marriage, to the refuge of the Cloister. But the restless fervour of spirit, which afterwards produced effects so memorable, led him shortly to desert the Monastic profession for a life of absolute solitude; and to the character of an anchorite, he next superadded that of a pilgrim to the Holy Land. The scenes which he witnessed, the sufferings which he endured, in this expedition, were of a nature to confirm the mental distemper, which had been nourished in his cell. At Jerusalem his indignation was excited by the cruelties of the Turks to the Christian residents and pilgrims: his piety was shocked at the profanations with which the Holy Sepulchre was insulted by those barbarian Infidels. He fancied himself inspired by Heaven to effect its deliverance from their hands; and in a conversation with the Patriarch of Jerusalem, he declared his purpose to rouse the Princes and People of the West to avenge the disgrace of Christendom.§ He possessed many qualities which, notwithstanding an unpromising exterior, peculiarly fitted him for the task to which he thoroughly devoted himself. He was inspired with the genuine spirit of enthusiasm: regardless of bodily privation and fatigue, steadfast in purpose, ardent in imagination, and, above all, animated by that admixture of pious intentions with personal vanity, which has deluded the Fanatic of every Age. When he first emerged from obscurity, and burst upon the World as the preacher of a Religious war, he is described as emaciated by self-inflicted austerities and wayfaring toil; diminutive in stature; mean in appearance; and clad in those coarse weeds of a Solitary, from whence he derived his surname of the Hermit. But his eye beamed with fire and intelligence; he was fluent in speech; and the vehement sincerity of his feelings supplied him with the only eloquence which would have been intelligible to the popular passions of his times.*

Having obtained from the Patriarch of Jerusalem letters of credence and supplication for the cause which he had undertaken, Peter on his return to Europe repaired at once to the Papal Court, and found in Urban II. an astonished but ready listener to his magnanimous project. The Pope recognised, and perhaps sincerely credited, the Divine authority of his mission; but the views of Gregory VII. were not forgotten by his successor; and motives of ambition, sufficiently strong to induce his assent, must have been suggested by the embassy of Alexius, and the desire of extending the authority of the Papal See over the Churches of the East. The probability that schemes of more worldly policy were at least mingled with the Religious impressions of Urban II. is increased by the assertion of a well-informed Writer of his times,† that he had recourse to a temporal counsellor, who had in his own person proved the weakness of the Byzantine Empire. This was Boemond, natural son of Robert Guiscard, who had attended his father in his daring invasion of Greece, and whose ambitious spirit was now impatiently restrained within the narrow limits of a Neapolitan Fief. The Norman Prince, whose selfish and wily character strikingly developed itself in the subsequent events of the Crusade, was little influenced by the devotional fervour of the Age; and if his advice determined Urban to direct the enthusiasm of Europe to the shores of Palestine, we may readily believe the Chronicler that it was founded more upon Political than Religious considerations;‡

However this may have been, the Hermit of Picardy, who had just quitted the Papal Court strengthened by the approbation and the promises of the spiritual Chief of Christendom; and travelling over Italy and France, he everywhere proclaimed the sacred duty of delivering the Sepulchre of Christ from the hands of the Infidels. Unless we bear in mind the prodigious influence of those superstitious and martial feelings which together absorbed the passions of a fierce and ignorant Age, it is difficult to conceive the recorded effects of the Hermit's preaching; and language has been exhausted in de-

* Anna Comnena, Alexias, lib. iii.—v. &c. Galfridus Malaterra, Hist. (in Muratori, Scorp. Rer. Ital. vol. v.) lib. iii. c. 24—39.

† For the History of the Turkish conquest of Asia Minor, &c. vide De Guignes, vol. i. p. 244, vol. ii. p. 1—12. Also the original account of William of Tyre, lib. i. c. 9, 10.

‡ Guibert Abbat. Hist. Hierosol. p. 475, 476. (Gesta Dei per Francos.)

§ Willemus Tyr. lib. i. c. 11. Guibert Abbat. p. 482.

* Willemus Tyr. ubi supra, p. 637. The Archbishop's lively portrait of the Fanatic has often been quoted. Erat autem hereticus staturus paullus, et quantum ad exteriorem hominem, persona contemptibilis. Sed major in cigno regnabat corpore virtus. Facies enim ingenui erat, et oculum habens perspicacem; gravisque, et sponte fluens et non deceptus eloquium.

† Malmesbury, p. 407.

‡ Paschal. Fisanus, Vita Urbani II. (in Script. Rerum Ital. vol. ii.) n. 352. Willemus Tyr. p. 638. Malmesbury, ubi supra.

History. scribing after contemporary authorities, the innumerable
From crowds of all ranks which thronged cities and hamlets,
A. D. churches and highways, at his voice; the tears, the sighs, 1095. the indignation excited in these multitudes by his to picture of the wrongs of their Christian brethren and
A. D. the sacrilegious defilement of the Holy Sepulchre; the 1099. shame and remorse which followed his reproaches at the guilty supineness that had abandoned the blessed scenes of Redemption to the insults of Infidels; the eager reception of his injunctions to every sinner to seek reconciliation with Heaven by devotion to its cause; and the rapture which his denunciations of vengeance against the Saracen enemies of God awakened in the stern hearts of congregated warriors.
The fanatical austerity of the preacher, which was proclaimed in his withered form, his squalid attire, and his abstemious diet; the voluntary poverty which distributed to the indigent the alms vainly designed for its own relief; the rude eloquence of speech and gesture, which flowed from impassioned sincerity, were all in deep unison with the Religious sentiments of his hearers: the appeal to arms roused with irresistible strength that double excitement of devotion and valour which animated, as with a blended and inseparable principle, the Christian Chivalry of Europe.*

The Pope had dismissed the Hermit with the assurance that he would strenuously support his great design; and the enthusiasm which Peter had awakened by his preaching was restrained from bursting into action only by eager expectation of the fulfilment of the pledge. At Piacenza, Urban first convoked the Prelates of Italy and the neighbouring regions; four thousand inferior Clergy and thirty thousand Lay persons were computed to have flocked to the scene; and the Legates of the Eastern Emperor having been admitted into the assembly to expose the dangers which menaced their Country and all Christendom from the progress of the Turks, and to implore the aid of the Nations of the West against the Infidels, it was resolved to promote the demand, and to mature the design of a Holy War, by the authority of a more general Council.† Urban was directed in his choice of a place for its assembly by the partialities of birth, by the predominant martial and Religious spirit of his native Country, France, and by the special invitation of Raymond, Count of Thoulouse. Clermont, the Capital of Auvergne, was appointed for the seat of the Council, at which the Pope in person presided, and an immense multitude of Clergy and Laity of all ranks, from France, Italy, and Germany, gave their attendance. During the first week after the opening of the Council, its deliberations were chiefly engaged in the enactment of some general provisions for the improvement of morals and the repression of private war: but on the ninth morning of the Session, the Pope himself ascended an elevated pulpit in the open air, and preached the sacred duty of redeeming the Sepulchre of Christ from the Infidels, and the certain propitiation for sin by devotion to this meritorious service. His fervent exhortations were addressed to a multitude already deeply imbued with fanatical purpose; his inference of a Divine Command for the Holy War was interrupted by one universal and tumultuous cry of "It is the Will of God;"
and the slightly varied acclamations of Deus vult, Deus cl vult, and Deus lo vult, expressed the common enthusiasm of the Clergy and the People, while it marks the pure retention of the Latin Tongue in the familiar speech of Ecclesiastics, and the popular corruptions which it had undergone into the two great Northern and Provençal dialects of France. At the instant when their cries resounded throughout the vast assembly, the figurative injunction of Scripture to the sinner, to take up the Cross of Christ, suggested to Urban the idea that all who embraced the sacred enterprise, should bear on their shoulder or breast that symbol of salvation. The proposal was eagerly adopted; the Bishop of Puy first solicited the Pope to affix the holy sign in red cloth* on his shoulder; and the example being immediately followed, the Cross became the invariable badge of the profession, while it gave an enduring title to the warfare of the Croisé, or Crusader. The first temporal Prince who assumed the Cross was the Count of Thoulouse, and his offers, through his Ambassadors, to devote his powerful resources, as well as his person, to the cause, were hailed with admiration. Before the Council broke up, Adhemar, the Bishop of Puy, was invested by Urban with full authority as Papal Legate for the conduct of the expedition; and the following Spring was appointed for the period of its departure to the East.†

The decision of the Council of Clermont was welcomed throughout the Latin World with joyful assent; and Europe echoed with the clang of warlike preparation for the sacred enterprise. France, Italy, and Germany were inspired with a common ardour; the same spirit was communicated to the British Islands, and penetrated the remoter region of Scandinavia;‡ and if Spain did not equally respond to the call, it was only because the Christian Chivalry of Castle and Aragon were already occupied, on a nearer theatre of Religious hostility, in the long contest with their Saracen enemies.§ In every Country, and among all ranks and conditions of men, the master passions of fanatical and its incentives.

The First Crusade.
From A. D. 1095. to A. D. 1099.

The Redemption of the Holy Sepulchre resolved upon.

Universal enthusiasm of Europe.

Its incentives.

* It has been observed by Gibbon, after Du Cange, that although in the First Crusade red was the general colour of the Cross, different hues were subsequently adopted as national distinctions: red by the French, green by the Flemings, auri white by the English. Yet the red cross of St. George was early our national emblem, and still proudly floats on that banner which,—"a thousand years has braved the battle and the breeze."

† Willermus Tyr p. 639—641. Guibert, p. 478—480. Fulcher, p. 392. Baldricus Arch. [also in Gesta Dei,] p. 79—88. Labbé, Concilia, vol. x.

‡ Malmsbury whimsically involves his picture of the universal extent of the Crusading ardour, in an allusion to national habits: "The Welshman forsook his hunting; the Scot his companionship with vermin; the Dane his carouse; and the Norwegian his raw fish." p. 416. Among the distinguished personages who joined the first Crusade from our own Island, were Stephen the English-Norman Earl of Albemarle, Odo, Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent, (Dugdale, Baronage, vol. i. p. 23. 61.) and perhaps (L'Art de vérifier les Dates, vol. i. p. 642.) a son of Malcolm Canmore, King of Scotland.

§ The sacred and meritorious character of the warfare against the Spanish Saracens had been already recognised by the Popes. In the conquest of Toledo, (A. D. 1085,) Alfonso VI. had been assisted by many foreign Knights; and we have seen (p. 554 of this volume) that, when pressed in the following year by the African Saracens, he was rescued by the Chivalry of France. It has even been contended (Mauilly, Esprit des Croisades, vol. ii. p. 91.) that their auxiliary expedition should be numbered as the first of the Crusades; and there is no doubt that it was considered as a holy war, and must have familiarized the French Nobles with the idea of such enterprises; though its memory has been eclipsed by the superior importance of the subsequent design for the redemption of the Sepulchre.

* Willermus Tyr p. 638. Guibert, p. 482. Fulcherius Caruensis, (Gesta Dei per Francos,) p. 381.

† P. Pisan, Vita Urban, p. 353. Labbé, Concilia, vol. x. p. 499, &c.

History.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

Promise of plenary Indulgence for sin, the most powerful motive.
Mingled, in the Nobility, with temporal views of ambition and glory.

Secondary impulses of the Clergy.

and People.

Prodigious efforts of this universal passion of Europe

martial zeal were fed by various impulses of action. The chief inducement beyond doubt was a Canon of the Council of Clermont, by which the performance of the Crusading vow was accepted as a full equivalent for all Ecclesiastical penances. This decree is memorable in itself as having first suggested, or at least rapidly extended, the idea of granting plenary Indulgences: the sale of which for money was afterwards converted by the cupidity of the Popes into so profitable an expedient for replenishing their coffers, and became the most scandalous practical corruption of the Romish Church.*

To the Feudal Nobility and their followers, the commutation of penances for a military enterprise was peculiarly grateful. The anathemas of the Church against private wars, the enforcement of the Truce of God, and the prohibition to bear arms, or to mount on horseback, which the Clergy often employed as a form of penance, were all grievous to an Order, in whom the love of arms and rapine struggled with the terrors of superstition. An injunction to Religious warfare, which relieved their fears, while it promised free indulgence to their favourite pursuits, was gladly embraced as the very easiest mode of reconciling their usual course of life with expiation for its disorders; and so admirable, in the judgment of the Age, appeared this discovery of a mode of atoning for its prevalent crimes by their very repetition, that a Chronicler emphatically enlarges it as a new kind of salvation.† Nor were there wanting the worldly incentives of avarice, ambition, and renown, still further to animate the mistaken sense of Religious duty. The exaggerated tales of pilgrims and traders were filled with pictures of oriental wealth; the subjugation of Asia seemed an easy and glorious achievement; and the Chivalry of Europe already shared in imagination the countless treasures and fertile Provinces of the gorgeous East;‡

By the remaining classes of Society the same mingled influence of spiritual and temporal motives was equally felt. While numbers of the Clergy sincerely shared the general fanaticism, the conquest of Asia opened prospects of wealthy establishments to the higher order of Ecclesiastics; the Monks found at least a meritorious occasion of escape from the irksome restraint of the Cloister; and the Peasantry from Feudal bondage to the soil. Under the pretence of a holy purpose which it was decreed sinful to prevent, debtors were protected both from the present demands of their creditors and the accumulation of interest during their absence; criminals were permitted to elude the pursuit of justice; and offenders of every degree, under the special safeguard which the Church threw over the performance of their vows, were enabled to defy the vengeance of the secular law.§ Lastly, even the speculations of an infant commerce assisted the general excitement; and the merchants of Italy, in particular, engaged with avidity in enterprises from which, in effect, they alone, by the establishment and extension of a lucrative maritime trade, derived any solid and durable advantage.

Yet all these were but the secondary motives of that one mighty impulse, under which all the ordinary considerations of life, all the ties which bind men to home and Country, to kindred and possessions, were alike disregarded. To obtain funds for so distant and expensive an enterprise, Princes and high Nobles mortgaged, or even alienated their vast domains; warriors of inferior rank either wholly abandoned their Feudal estates and obligations, or prepared to follow their Lords in voluntary service; lands were every where converted into money; horses, arms, and means of transport were collected at exorbitant prices; and valuable property of all kinds was recklessly sacrificed on the most inadequate terms to colder or craftier dealers. Yet even among such, the irresistible force of example often prevailed; the awakening conviction of duty, the thirst of glory, or the dread of reproach, was gradually imparted to every bosom not wholly insensible to Religion and Honour; and the prudent or designing purchaser in one hour was himself the deluded seller in the next. Nor was the contagion of fanatical adventure confined to the Chivalric order. Not only Ecclesiastics deserted their benefices, and Monastic recluses their cells, but mechanics and rustics forsook their occupations, and exchanged their implements of industry for weapons of offence; and women of all ranks, with an abandonment of the more timid and becoming virtues of their sex, which produced equal misery and scandal, either left their husbands behind them, or with their children swelled and encumbered the unwieldy masses of helpless pilgrims.¶ Moreover, the superstitious confidence of atonement for past crimes, and the expectation of license for future enormities, equally attracted the vilest portion of mankind. Robbers, murderers, and other criminals of the deepest dye, professed their design to wash out their guilt in the blood of the enemies of God.† The aggregate of the immense multitudes who thus assumed the Cross could scarcely be accurately computed, in an Age so unfavourable for collecting the details of statistical calculation. By one Chronicler it is vaguely estimated at six millions of persons;‡ by a less credulous contemporary it is decried that all the Kingdoms of the West could supply so vast a host;§ but even the exaggeration proves that the original design of enthusiasm would have totally depopulated Europe; and after making every deduction for the influence of delay, returning reason, and the accidents of life, in cooling the first burst of fanatical fervour, the numbers which actually fulfilled their purpose justify the assertion that whole Nations, rather than the mere armies of Western Christendom, were precipitated upon Mohammedan Asia.

Long before the season, the end of Spring, fixed by the Pope for the departure of the Crusaders, had expired, the impatience of the ruder multitudes of people grew too violent for restraint. Soon after the commencement of the new year, an immense concourse of pilgrims

* Guibert, p. 481. Albertus Aquensis, (Gesta Dei per Francos) p. 185. Guibert has a passage which too curiously illustrates the madness of the prevalent fanaticism to be passed without notice in this place. Deluded rustics yoked their oxen, shod the horses, to carts, in which they placed their families and goods to perform the sacred journey; and it was plene joco apertissimum, to hear the children inquiring, as they approached any city, whether that were Jerusalem, p. 482.

† Willernus Tyr. p. 641. Albertus Aquensis, ubi supra.

‡ Fulcherius Carnot. p. 386.

§ Guibert, p. 556.

¶ And not the "Feast of the Assumption in August," as Gibbon has stated. See the interesting version of the speech of Urban in the Council of Clermont, as given by William of Malmesbury, (p. 410—415.)

* Labbé, Concilio, vol. x. p. 507. Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. Cent.

xii. P. 2. c. 3. Muratori, Antiq. Med. Aevi, Diss. lxxvii.

† "Novum salutis genus," Guibert, p. 471.

‡ Idem, p. 554, 555.

§ See Du Cange, on c. Cruces Privilegium, and the authorities there cited.

History. chiefly of the lowest orders, had thronged around Peter the Hermit on the Western frontiers of France, and urged him, as the original Preacher of the sacred enterprise, to assume its conduct. Apparently unconscious of his utter unfitness for command, the Fanatic rashly accepted the perilous charge; and under his guidance, the accumulating torrent began to sweep over Germany.* Its immense tide overflowed the ordinary channels of communication; and devastation marked its course. The roads were obstructed by the multitude of passengers; the country through which they moved was oppressed by their excesses; the means of subsistence were exhausted by their wants; and Peter was compelled to exhort them to separate into smaller masses. Under the command of Gualtier, or Walter, a Burgundian Knight, whose poverty procured for him the surname of Sans-Avoir, or the Pennyless, and who accepted the office of Lieutenant to the Hermit, a body of twenty thousand pilgrims preceded the march of the main host through Hungary and Bulgaria towards Constantinople. The wretched quality of the adventurers who composed this advanced guard is sufficiently indicated by the fact that there were only eight horsemen in the whole number; and their conduct was as reckless as their condition was deplorable. Through Hungary, they were indebted for a safe though toilsome passage to the friendly disposition of its King, Carloman, and a Christian People; but on their entrance into the still wilder regions of Bulgaria, which were governed by a Lieutenant of the Byzantine Empire, they encountered every possible obstacle, both from the treacherous policy of the Imperial officers who forbade the supply of their necessities, and from the ferocious temper of the natives. Hunger compelled the Crusaders to resort to violence; the Bulgarians flew to arms; and the route of Walter and his followers was tracked in blood and flames. But in every day's march, the natives cut off hundreds of the miserable rabble; and the destruction of the whole host, before it reached the Southern confines of Bulgaria, was so complete, that only Walter and a few survivors succeeded, by a flight through the forests, in reaching the Court of Constantinople.†

Their destruction in Bulgaria.

* Before we accompany the disorderly march of the mob which thus commenced the First Crusade, it behoves us to specify our principal guides throughout the expedition. These are the original authorities contained in the great collection of Bongarsius, which he printed at Hanover, in two folio volumes, in 1611, under the general title of Gesta Dei per Francos; a designation which Jortin pitifully proposed to change into Gesta Drolab, &c. The actual eye-witnesses of the First Crusade, whose relations are to be found in the collection of Bongarsius, were, 1. Robert the Monk; (Hist. Hierosolymitana); 2. Raymond de Agiles, Chaplain to the Count of Toulouse, during the Crusade; (Hist. Francorum); and 3. Fulcher, also a Chaplain, who accompanied the Count of Chartres, and afterwards attached himself to Baldwin, brother of the great Godfrey, and second King of Jerusalem; (Gesta Peregrinantium Francorum); 4. next in the order of testimony is the work of an Archbishop, Balduic, (Hist. Hierosolym.) who assisted at the Council of Clermont, and whose relation, although he did not himself accompany the expedition, is declared to have been revised by an Abbot who did so; 5. Albert of Aix, (Hist. Hierosol. Expeditionis); and 6. Guibert, (the title of whose Chronicle, Gesta Dei per Francos, it was that Bongarsius adopted for the whole collection,) were contemporaries; and the latter was a keen observer and lively narrator; 7. and lastly, William, Archbishop of Tyre, already so often quoted, whose History, although he was not contemporary with the First Crusade, is, perhaps from the materials of information to which he had access, and the judgment with which he compiled them, the most valuable document in the whole collection.

† Fulcher, p. 384. Albert Aqueensis, p. 185. Guibert, p. 483. Willermus Tyr. p. 642.

The second division of the Crusading mob, under Peter the Hermit himself, amounting to forty thousand men, women, and children, followed on the traces of the first body. Aided by the good offices of the Hungarian King, their march through his Country was abundantly supplied and tranquilly pursued, until they reached Malleville, the modern Zemlin, on its Southern confines: where the triumphant exhibition on the walls of the spoils of some of their precursors who had been slain in an affray with the inhabitants, roused them to a furious vengeance. The ramparts of the city were scaled; thousands of its people were slaughtered; and for several days the survivors were exposed to all the horrors of violation and rapine. The approach of Carloman with a large army to punish their perfidious ingratitude, accelerated the departure of the Crusaders; and their hasty and disorderly passage of the Save exposed them to a heavy loss from the attacks of the savage hordes, who awaited their landing on the Bulgarian bank of that river. Though they finally repelled these new enemies, they found Bulgaria a wasted solitude. The natives had retreated to their fastnesses and strong holds; the fortified towns were closed against them; and the purchase of provisions for their march, under the walls of these places, was the only intercourse which the Imperial officers would permit the inhabitants to hold with them. Their excesses again provoked a more open and fatal hostility. Enraged at some outrages, the people of Nissa pursued and unassisted their rearguard: the efforts of Peter could not dissuade the whole host from returning to avenge this quarrel; and in an ineffectual attempt to renew the same scenes as at Zemlin, the assailants were repulsed from the walls with immense slaughter. The triumphant garrison and inhabitants issued forth upon them; a general and total rout ensued; and in the onset, the sally, and the pursuit, above ten thousand of the Crusaders perished. Their camp was abandoned and plundered; and despoiled of their baggage, of their money, and of their arms, the wretched herd of fugitives continued its journey towards Constantinople.*

When they had ceased to be formidable, their helpless misery extorted some compassion; Alexius interposed his protection; and their remains at length reached his Capital, where they were reunited to Walter and the survivors of the first division. But they were no sooner refreshed, than they repaid their hospitable benefactor by new acts of insolence, licentiousness, and pillage; and Alexius gladly acceded to their desire to be transported across the Bosphorus. Under the conduct of Peter and his Lieutenant, Walter, they were landed in Asia Minor: but here neither the exhortations of the Hermit could restrain their outrages against the Religion and property of the subjects of Alexius; nor the advice of the Emperor himself to await the arrival of the more disciplined Chivalry of Europe, prevent their headlong advance. Peter finding himself totally unable to control them, used a decent pretext for escaping back to Constantinople: but Walter, whose more martial spirit was really associated with qualities for command deserving of a better fate, was compelled to yield to their clamorous demand to be led against the Infidels. Despite of his prudent warnings, they divided their forces to plunder the Turkish Provinces; and reunited only on a report artfully

* Albert, Aqueensis, p. 186—188. Guibert, p. 484. Willermus Tyr. p. 643—645.

The First Crusade.

From A. D. 1095, to A. D. 1099. Second division under Peter the Hermit.

Their excesses and losses in Bulgaria.

Arrival at Constantinople;

landing in Asia Minor;

History.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

and destruction by the Turks in the plain of Nice.

Third division of the mob, massacred by the Hungarians.

Fourth and last division.

Their shocking superstition,

circulated by the Sultan of Roum, that Nice, his Capital, had fallen into the hands of an advanced body of their associates. Allured by the prospect of sharing in its spoils, they blindly rushed into the heart of a hostile Country: but when they descended into the plain of Nice, instead of being welcomed by the sight of the Christian banners on its walls, they found themselves surrounded by the Turkish cavalry. In the first onset, Walter fell bravely, covered with wounds, while vainly discharging, by intelligence and example, the twofold duties of the leader and the warrior. The disorderly multitude of his followers was immediately overwhelmed and slaughtered; a remnant, no more than three thousand, escaped the general destruction by flight to the nearest Byzantine fortress; and a huge mound, into which the savage victors piled the bones of the slain, formed an ominous monument of disaster for succeeding hosts of Crusaders.*

The disorders and destruction of these first two divisions of the Crusading rabble were indeed but a prelude to more atrocious scenes of guilt, and more enormous waste of human life. Stimulated by the example of Peter, a German Monk, named Godeschal, preached the Crusade through the villages of his native land with so much effect, that he allured about fifteen thousand of the peasantry to follow him to the East. This third division took the same route as the two preceding: but on their arrival in Hungary they experienced a far different reception from its Sovereign, who was justly exasperated at the outrages with which his hospitality had been repaid. At first he prudently supplied them with the means of accelerating their passage through his Kingdom: but their march was attended with an aggravated repetition of the worst crimes which had been perpetrated by the followers of the Hermit; the whole population of Hungary rose in arms against them; and Carloman was at length provoked to deliver them over to the vengeance of his subjects. For this purpose he had recourse to a cruel act of perfidy, which deeply sullied the merit of his earlier forbearance. Before the walls of Belgrade, his promise of forgiveness and protection induced them to lay down their arms; and this act of submission was immediately followed by their ruthless massacre.†

But the numbers, the gross superstition, the licentious wickedness, and the miserable extirpation of these fanatical hordes, all sink into insignificance before the features displayed in the composition and conduct of the fourth and last division of the rabble of Europe. From France, from the Rhenish Provinces and Flanders, and from the British Islands, there gathered on the Eastern confines of Germany one huge mass of the vile refuse of all these Nations, amounting to no less than two hundred thousand persons. Some bands of Nobles, with their mounted followers, were not ashamed to accompany their march, and share their prey: but their leaders are undistinguishable; and the most authentic contemporary records of their proceedings compel us to repeat the incredible assertion that their motions were guided by a goat and a goose, which were believed to be divinely inspired. If we impatiently dismiss a circumstance so revolting to every pious mind, and so degrading to the pride of human intellect, we find their actions as detestable as their superstition was blind and unholy. The unhappy Jews in the Episcopal Cities of the Rhine and Moselle were the first victims of their ferocity. Under the protection of the Ecclesiastical Lords of these commercial places, colonies of that outcast race had long enjoyed toleration and accumulated wealth. Their riches tempted the cupidity of Fanatics, who professed a zeal for the pure Religion of the Gospel only that they might violate its most sacred precepts of mercy and love. Under the pretence of commencing their holy war by extirpating the enemies of God in Europe, they sought the blood and spoils of a helpless and unoffending people. To the honour of the Romish Church, the Bishops of Mayence, Spire, and other cities, courageously endeavoured to shield the Jews from their fury and rapine: but their humane efforts were only partially successful; and thousands were either barbarously massacred, or, to escape the outrages and disappoint the cupidity of their enemies, cast themselves, their women and children, and their precious effects, into the waters or the flames. Sated with murder and spoliation, the ruffian host pursued its march from the Rhine to the Danube; and the continued indulgence of its brutal sensuality attested that it needed not the impulse of fanaticism for the commission of every atrocity. But it was at length overtaken by the vengeance of God and Man. In the hour of danger, the unruly and wicked multitude proved as dastardly against an armed enemy as it had been ferocious towards the defenceless Jews. It effected the passage of the Danube only to encounter a tremendous defeat from the Hungarian army, which had collected for the national defence; some sudden and inexplicable panic produced a general flight, and unresisted slaughter; and so dreadful was the carnage, that the course of the Danube was choked with the bodies, and its waters dyed with the blood of the slain. The contemporary Chronicler, who was apparently best informed of their execrable crimes and well-merited fate, asserts that very few of the immense Crusading multitude escaped death from the swords of the Hungarians or the rapid current of the river; and it is certain that whatever remnant survived, saved their lives only by flight and dispersion.*

Before twelve months had expired since the spirit of Crusading was roused into action by the Council of Clermont, and before a single advantage had been gained over the Infidels, the fanatical enthusiasm of Europe had already cost the lives, at the lowest computation, of two hundred and fifty thousand of its people.† But such were the stupid ignorance and headlong folly which misguided these wretched multitudes, and still more, so dark and grovelling was their superstition, so cruel and demoniacal their fanaticism, and so flagitious their licentiousness, that all pity for their fate is lost in the disgust and horror with which we recoil from the contemplation of brutality and guilt. The picture is relieved by no exhibition of dignified purpose or heroic achievement; the myriads who had perished in Hungary, in Bulgaria, and in Asia Minor, were animated by none of the loftier sentiments of the Age; they were composed chiefly of the coarser rabble of every Country; and in their destruction we behold only the offscouring of the popular ferocity of Europe. But while the first disasters of the

* Albert, p. 189—193. Baldricus Archiepiscopus, p. 89. Guibert, p. 485. Willermus Tyr. p. 645—647. Anna Comnenus, p. 226, 227.

† Albert, p. 194. Willermus Tyr. p. 648.

* Albert, Apennis, p. 195, 196. Fulcher, p. 386. Willermus Tyr. p. 649, 650.

† Milis, History of the Crusades, vol. i. p. 81.

The First
Crusade
from
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099. and the capture of Jerusalem by the Crusaders.

The total defeat and destruction
of the Crusaders in this expedition.

Referred to the last division
of the rabble.

Crusade were sweeping this mass of corruption from the surface of Society, the genuine spirit of Religious and martial enthusiasm was more slowly and powerfully evolved. With maturer preparation, and with steeper resolve than the half-armed and irregular rabble, the mailed and organized Chivalry of Europe was arraying itself for the mighty contest; and a far different, a splendid and interesting spectacle, opens to our view. In the characters, the motives, and the conduct of the Princely and Noble leaders who achieved the design of the First Crusade, we are no longer presented with the revolting sameness of a mere brutal ferocity. Their zeal, although mingled with superstition, and not unstained by cruelty, was also elevated by the generous pursuit of martial fame; their resolves were inspired by the twofold incentive of spiritual duty and temporal honour; and their fanaticism was regulated by foresight and prudence. In entering on their purpose, they had indeed been more or less infected with the general madness of the Age; but in the guidance of the Holy War many of them proved themselves as politic in counsel, as skilful in expedients, and as patient and constant under difficulties, as they were adventurous in danger and courageous in combat. The wildness of their enterprise is condemned by our calmer reason, the justice of their cause may be impeached on every true principle of divine and human law; but from the magnanimous devotion of their spirit, and the fearless heroism of their exploits, it is impossible to withhold our sympathy and admiration.

It has been deemed worthy of remark that none of the principal Sovereigns of Europe engaged in the First Crusade; but their absence was determined by the accidents of individual character and position. Pope Urban II. declined the personal command of the expedition, on the plea of his engrossing functions in the general government of the Church, and his duty of repressing the schism created by the Anti-pope Clement; or perhaps on the more reasonable excuse of his age and infirmities;* but he deputed his spiritual authority to his Legate Adhemar, the Bishop of Puy. The Emperor Henry IV., the personal enemy of Urban, and protector of the Anti-pope, of course refused to recognise the authority by which the Crusade was preached. Philip I. of France was absorbed in sensual indulgence; and to renew the excommunication already passed upon him was, as we have seen,† one of the acts of Urban at the very Council of Clermont. The crafty and irreligious character of William II. of England also led him rather to minister to his brother's reckless enthusiasm, by purchasing the mortgage of Duke Robert's Norman dominions, than to join himself in the Holy War. But the cause rejected by these Monarchs was eagerly embraced by the most distinguished Feudal Princes of the second order: by Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of the Lower Lorraine or Brabant, with his two brothers, Eustace and Baldwin, and a kinsman also of the latter name; Hugh, styled the Great Count of Vermandois, and Robert, Duke of Normandy, brothers of the French and English Kings; Robert, Stephen, and Raymond, Counts of Flanders, Chartres, and Thoulouse; and the Norman Boemond, son of the Guiscard, Prince of Tarento, with his cousin Tancred, whom History and Romance have equally delighted to exhibit as the brightest exemplar of knightly virtue.

In dignity and character, however, in the conduct and the results of the Crusade, the highest place of honour must be conceded to the Duke of Brabant. Godfrey of Bouillon was descended through females from Charlemagne; and ranked, alike by his great possessions and personal qualities, among the most powerful Feudatories of the German Empire. His reputation for wisdom in counsel and prowess in arms was deservedly high; and during the war between the Empire and Papacy, in which he adhered to Henry IV., he had specially distinguished himself, both at the battle of Merseburg* and the siege of Rome. His political importance was increased by the position of his States on the frontiers of France and Germany; and his consequent familiarity with the popular dialects of both Countries, as well as his acquisition of the Latin, the customary language of the Church, facilitated his intercourse, and promoted his personal influence, among the principal Nations of Europe. But the severe integrity of his character disdained the selfish exercise of these advantages; and amidst the gross and violent disorders of the times, his life was regulated by the strictest principles of Morality and Religion. His manners were gentle, pure, and benignant; his conduct was just and disinterested; and his piety, though mistaken, was sincere and fervent. These virtues might have qualified him rather for the Cloister than the Camp, if they had not been associated with energies capable of the loftiest designs: with a head to conceive and a hand to execute the most arduous enterprises which his conscience approved; with resolution, tempered by reflection and judgment, which no difficulties could shake; and with valour, calmed only by moderation, which no perils could deter. Since the siege of Rome his frame had been consumed by a slow fever; his illness dictated the renewal of an early purpose of performing the pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and he no sooner heard of the projected Crusade, than, as if inspired with new life, he suddenly shook off disease from his limbs, and sprang with renovated health and youth from a sick couch to engage in so glorious and meritorious a work.†

The transcendent merits and accomplishments which adorned the principal Hero of the First Crusade have demanded an especial portraiture: the few features in the characters of the remaining leaders, which varied their general resemblance in devout zeal and warlike excellence, may be more briefly sketched. In Hugh of France these qualities, though supported by other attributes not unworthy of his Royal birth, were destitute of the Religious humility and modest demeanour of Godfrey; and the Great Count of Vermandois was remarkable chiefly for an arrogant and haughty deportment.‡ Robert of Normandy was generous and merciful, eloquent in debate, and well skilled in military expedients; but profuse in expense, dissolute in morals, and equally rash and unsteady in resolve. Although, therefore, his conduct during the Crusade was thought in some measure to atone for the irregularities of his earlier life, and his exploits often attracted the general admiration, his instability of mind prevented his maintaining the respect of his more illustrious compeers.§ His namesake of Robert of Flanders.

The First Crusade.
From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.
Godfrey of Bouillon.

* See p. 537.

† Malmesbury, p. 448. Guibert, p. 485. Willermus Tyr. p. 651.

‡ Anna Comnena, p. 227. Robertus Monachus, p. 34. Guibert, p. 485.

§ A well-known instance of Robert's careless spirit was the above-mentioned mortgage of his Duchy to his brother William for five years,

* Belli Sacri Hist. (by an anonymous Chronicler, in Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. i.) p. 135.

† See p. 530 of this Volume.

History. Flanders resembled him in headlong valour, without sharing any portion even of his abortive talents. The Count of Chartres, one of the wealthiest and most potent Feudal Princes of France, was also deemed the most learned in all the literate and practical knowledge of the Age, experienced and wise in his suggestions, clear and persuasive in discourse. These intellectual acquirements peculiarly fitted him for directing the general design of the war; and he was accordingly chosen to preside in the Council of its leaders. In the field, the superiority of his tactical skill was equally recognised; but he was deficient in vigorous enterprise; and in the eyes of the fiery champions of the Cross, his fame was tainted by the questionable quality of his valour.

Raymond of Thoulouse. The veteran and sagacious Count of Thoulouse,* whose youth had been habitually exercised in arms against his Saracen neighbours in Spain, had brought from that warfare a deadly hatred of the Musulman name, and was more fiercely animated than the other Crusading Princes by the spirit of Religious intolerance. His master passion was unmitigated fanaticism; and the devotion of his old age, the abandonment of his extensive dominions, and the appropriation of his great riches, to the service of the Crusade, might have protected his motives from the suspicion of worldly ambition and avarice: if their sincerity had not been attended by a cold and selfish nature, a proud and vindictive temper, which denied him the friendship of his noble confederates, and alienated the affections of his own native followers. To the purely fanatical zeal which predominated in the character of the Provençal Prince, may be opposed the unscrupulous ambition and deep hypocrisy of the Norman Boemond, the Ulysses of the war. To him alone, perhaps, of all the movers and warriors of the Crusade, may be attributed a systematic design of rendering the popular enthusiasm of Europe subservient to views of mere personal interest. If his versatile and unprincipled genius enabled him to feel or to feign,† some share in the prevalent sentiment of his time, the whole recorded tenour of his conduct betrays the settled and absorbing pursuit of temporal aggrandizement. Familiar with all the arts of dissimulation, and no less rapacious than perfidious, he exhibits among the Heroes of the Holy War, the singular spectacle of a cool and crafty Politician. His vices were odiously contrasted with the generous qualities of his youthful cousin Tancred;‡ whose frank and courteous bearing,

and Tancred.

at the inadequate price of ten thousand marks, to equip himself for the Crusade. Chron. Sax. p. 204. Will. Gemeticensis, p. 673.

* The history of this Prince is very obscure. His original title was Count of St. Gilles in Languedoc; whence Anna Comnena corrupted his name into Songolier, and under that appellation exaggerates his rank as if he had been the principal personage of the Crusade. In what manner he had acquired the extensive fields of Thoulouse and Provence, and arrogated the title of Duke of Narbonne, which he also bore, seems undetermined. L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, vol. ii. p. 289—294, &c.

† Boemond pretended to receive with surprise and admiration the news of the design of Urban, which it is more than probable (vide supra, p. 588.) that he had secretly prompted. At the siege of Amalfi, he embraced the Crusade in an apparent transport of zeal; excited the fanatical ardour of his confederates and followers by an eloquent harangue; and while their enthusiasm was at its height, rent his own robe into pieces in the shape of crosses for the soldiery. This curious and characteristic anecdote is told by Guibert, p. 485.

‡ Tancred was the son of Matilda, sister of Robert the Guiscard, and therefore the cousin of Boemond, (Radulphus Cadomensis, de Gesta Tancredi, c. 1.) and not either his brother or nephew, as no less than his love of glory and high-minded disdain of wrong and perfidy, rendered him the mirror of European Chivalry.*

Such were the leaders, under whom the warlike array of the Western Nations was marshalled for the First Crusade. Their confederated powers were collected, according to the local convenience or preference of the Chieftains, into four great divisions. The first Body, composed of the Nobility of the Rhenish Provinces and the more Northern parts of Germany, ranged themselves under the standard of Godfrey of Bouillon. That Prince was accompanied by the two Baldwins, and many other powerful Feudal Lords, whose forces numbered no less than ten thousand cavalry and eighty thousand foot. In the second division, under the Counts of Vermandois and Chartres, the two Roberts, and Eustace, Count of Boulogne, (brother of Godfrey,) were assembled the Chivalry of Central and Northern France, the British Isles,† Normandy, and Flanders; and their formidable muster can be estimated only loosely from the estimate of a contemporary, that the number of lesser Bann alone exceeded that of the Grecian warriors at the siege of Troy.‡ The third host, in the order of departure, was composed of Southern Italians under Boemond and Tancred, and formed an array of ten thousand horse and twenty thousand foot. The last division, which assembled under the Count of Thoulouse in the South of France, was originally formed chiefly of his own vassals and native confederates of Languedoc, Gascony, and Arles, comprehended under the general appellation of Provençals;§ with a small admixture of the Christian Knighthood of the Pyrenean regions of Spain: but in his route through Lombardy, his army was swollen by so great numbers of Northern Italians, that the combined host which marched under his banners amounted to one hundred thousand persons of all arms and conditions. Besides several Feudal Chieftains of distinction, Raymond was accompanied by three Prelates of high rank: the Papal Legate Adhemar of Pay, the Archbishop of Toledo, and the Bishop of Orange.||

Of all the principal leaders of the Crusade, the preparations of Godfrey of Bouillon were earliest completed; and his march from the banks of the Moselle was conducted with admirable prudence and order by the same route which had proved so disastrous to the preceding rabble. When he reached the Northern frontiers of Hungary, he demanded of its King by his envoys an explanation of the circumstances which had provoked their destruction. The reply of Carloman some of the writers in the Gesta Dei, less correctly informed than the biographer of the Hero, and Gibbon and Murton after them, supposed. The father of Tancred was an Italian Marquis, (Ab. Ralph of Caen was the personal friend and companion of Tancred in Palestine after the Crusade.

O più bel di maniere e di sembianti
O più receto ed interposto di core, &c.

La Gerusalemme Liberata, can. i. 43.

But the Poet has here only echoed the praises which the qualities of Tancred extorted even from the Greek Princess, never unwilling to detract from the virtues of a Latin, above all a Norman name. Anna Comnena, p. 277.

† For "neither surely," says old Fuller, "did the Irishmen feel stick in their bogs;" (Hist. of Holy War, lib. i. c. 13.) So also sings Tasso,

Questi dall'altre selve irruti mandati
La divina dal mondo ultima Irlanda.

‡ Guibert, p. 486.

§ Raymond des Agiles, p. 144.

|| Willermus Tyr. p. 660.

History.
From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

distance noted by his his impression valued of ent Eng-

his position
his position

exposed the crimes by which the vengeance of his People had been roused; and his just and amicable representations compelled the upright judgment of Godfrey to admit, that the wickedness of the Crusading mob had merited its fate. He accepted a friendly invitation from the Hungarian King; treated with him for a safe passage through his dominions with supplies of provisions on equitable terms; and left his own brother Baldwin and his family as hostages for the good faith and forbearance which he enforced on his followers. The noble sincerity of Godfrey won the confidence of the Hungarian Monarch, and disarmed the suspicion and hostility of his People. Carloman himself attended the movements of the Crusaders with a numerous cavalry, both to observe their behaviour and to protect their march; the whole of his Kingdom was traversed without a single act of offence on either side; and, when the Latin host had passed its Southern confines, the hostages were courteously dismissed with a friendly adieu. When the Crusaders entered the Byzantine Provinces, their virtuous and able leader still succeeded in maintaining the same strict discipline; the Emperor Alexius assisted and rewarded his efforts by liberally supplying the wants of his army in its toilsome passage through the desolate forests of Bulgaria; and the first division of the European Chivalry peaceably accomplished its entrance into the fertile plains of Thrace.*

But for the friendly succour of the Byzantine Monarch, it is acknowledged that the hosts of Godfrey must have perished in their route through Provinces imperfectly cultivated, and already exhausted by the feuds of their barbarous natives. The alacrity with which Alexius at first facilitated the approach of his Latin allies, was succeeded by illusions of a more dubious policy; and in the report of their Chroniclers, the conduct of the Emperor is branded with the reproach of deliberate perfidy and systematic hostility. In weighing the justice of these charges, some reduction from their truth must be made for the bigoted prejudice of the Latins against a schismatic Monarch and Nation; and a still larger share of extenuation for the suspicious conduct of the Emperor may be claimed for the difficulties and peril of his position. Instead of the reasonable aid which he had solicited from the Pope and the temporal Sovereigns of the West, he found his dominions overwhelmed, and his throne shaken from its foundations, by the deluge of European fanaticism. His hospitable reception of the first disorderly masses of pilgrims had been requited by the ravage of his territories and the spoliation of his subjects; the very numbers and formidable array of the better disciplined Chivalry of Europe might alone have justified a prudent apprehension of their power and disposition, which their fierce promptitude in resentment was by no means calculated to allay. Of the personal characters and real designs of most of their leaders he was utterly ignorant; and their alliance in the same enterprise with his ancient and dangerous enemy, Boemond, was at least an ominous conjuncture. The plea of delivering the Holy Sepulchre from the hands of the Turks, might easily cover a design of subjugating the whole Eastern World to the spiritual dominion of the Latin Church; the same pretext of fanatical zeal might be readily employed against the infidel Mohammedans and heretical Greeks; and to the confident valour and the envious cupidity of the Western warriors, thus animated by Religious hatred and temporal ambition, the rich spoils of Constantinople* and its Provinces might offer a more accessible and tempting prey, than the distant relief of Jerusalem and plunder of Syria. Moreover, the recent distraction and rapid decay of the Seljukian Power had terminated the alarm with which Alexius formerly anticipated the entire ruin of his Empire; and the subsiding of the Turkish energies had removed the immediate danger which induced him to implore the approach, and might have reconciled him to the presence of auxiliaries, in Greek estimation scarcely more civilized, and only less to be dreaded, than the Mohammedan enemy.

Under these critical circumstances, for the double purpose of averting the ruin with which he was menaced, and of obtaining the advantages which he might yet hope to extract from the oppressive aid of the Western Nations, the Emperor appears to have had recourse to the timid and tortuous policy habitual in the Byzantine Court. While he welcomed the approach of the army of Godfrey, his fleets in the Adriatic were prepared to dispute the passage of the French and Norman Crusaders from the Italian to the Grecian ports. That second grand division of the European Chivalry, led by Hugh of Vermandois, the two Roberts, and the Count of Chartres, had traversed France and Italy for the purpose of embarkation. At Lucca, where these Chiefs, prostrating themselves at the feet of the Pope, piously received his benediction, Urban II. committed the standard of St. Peter into the hands of the Great Count of France;† and here the arrogance of that Prince furnished Alexius with a first occasion of offence. Twenty-four Knights, in armour gorgeously inlaid with gold, were despatched by Hugh to Durazzo, with a haughty intimation to Alexius himself of the approach, and a command to the Imperial Lieutenant to make Royal preparation for the arrival, of the brother of the King of Kings, and standard-bearer of the Pope.‡ The terms of the letter and the message were resented as an insult; and the Governor of Durazzo, instead of offering the desired reception, stationed his navy to prevent the egress of the Great Count and his followers from the Italian harbours. The Duke of Normandy and the Counts of Flanders and Chartres, with their followers, after consuming the Autumn in luxurious pleasure, resolved to defer their departure from Italy until the return of Spring; but Hugh, regardless alike of the dangers of a wintry passage and the ambiguous dispo-

The First
Crusade.
From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

His tortuous policy.

He opposes the passage
of the French Crusaders from Italy.

* Of the astonishment and envy with which the splendour of Constantinople struck the rude Latins, we may form a lively idea from the burst of admiration which the remembrance of its magnificence recalls to the mind of one of their Chroniclers, the chaplain and companion of the Count of Chartres: "O quanta civitas nobilis et decorata! quæ monstratur quinquæ palatii, in eis, opere miro fabricata! quæ trium platorum vix in vicis operæ, ad spectandum mirabilis! Tardius est quidem magnam recturæ quantæ ut dicitur opulentiæ honorum omnium, mris et argenti." &c. Fulcherius, p. 386. The emotions excited by the contemplation of such wealth, however innocent in the breast of the good chaplain, were likely to prompt dangerous wishes and designs to the bold and unscrupulous imaginations of fierce and rapacious warriors.

† Fulcherius, p. 384. Robertus Monachus, p. 35.
‡ Anna Comnena, p. 228. Du Gange, with the true complacent vanity of a Frenchman, has amused himself by proving (Dissert. sur Jeanville, xxvii, and note ad Alexand. p. 352.) that the title of King of Kings thus arrogated by Hugh for his brother, was conceded through the respect of Europe during the Middle Ages par excellence to the Monarchs of France.

* Albert. p. 198, 199. Willermus Tyr. p. 652.

History.

From

A. D.

1095.

to

A. D.

1099.

and makes prisoner of the Count of Vermandois.
Indignation of Godfrey's army.

Reprimand;

continued
disputes;

and open war of the Crusaders against Alexius;

A. D.

1097.

sition of the Greeks, impatiently put to sea. His fleet was dispersed in a storm; his own vessel was wrecked on the hostile shore; and in lieu of the magnificent descent which he had announced, he entered Durazzo as a suppliant, and found himself a captive. He was indeed treated with outward demonstrations of respect; but his person was for some time detained, until the commands of Alexius were received for his removal to Constantinople.*

When intelligence of the captivity of the Count of Vermandois reached the camp of Godfrey in Thrace, it roused the violent anger of the Crusaders; and after an ineffectual demand for his release, the Duke of Brabant was compelled to gratify the eager desire which was felt by his followers to punish the Imperial perfidy with the ravage of the fine Province in which they were quartered. This severe retaliation speedily produced the submission of Alexius. He had already soothed the captivity, and seduced the pride and vanity of the French Prince, by his pompous reception at the Imperial Court; and Hugh was induced to despatch two of his own attendants to Godfrey with the assurance that, on the Duke's arrival at Constantinople, he would find their master not a captive, but a guest. This message produced a cessation of hostilities; but the awakened suspicions of the Crusaders prepared them to fly to arms on the slightest provocation; the Greeks were equally distrustful; and the mutual contempt and hatred of two races, so dissimilar in manners and spirit, inflamed every misunderstanding. On the near approach of Godfrey and his host to the Byzantine Capital, the refusal of the Duke and his fellow Chieftains to trust their persons unattended within the Imperial walls, provoked Alexius to forbid all intercourse between his subjects and the Crusaders. The Latin camp was immediately straitened for provisions; and Godfrey was again compelled to indulge the rapine of his followers, and the Emperor to arrest the sufferings of his People by conciliatory measures. A third and more dangerous quarrel was produced by the belief of the Crusaders in a perfidious design of the Emperor to blockade and starve them in their camp, which was enclosed by the waters of the Bosphorus, the Black Sea, and the river Barbyses. To anticipate this suspected treachery, the troops of Godfrey possessed themselves, by an impetuous attack, of the bridge of the Blachernæ, the only outlet and key of their communication with Constantinople and the open country. The hostile seizure of this important post disappointed the intentions of the Greeks; or it more probably excited their apprehension against the ulterior purpose of the Crusaders themselves. The Imperial troops issued from the gates of Constantinople to dispute the passage of the bridge; after a bloody conflict they were repulsed and pursued to the City; and the Crusaders, inflamed with success and resentment, even attempted a headlong assault upon the walls. But the ramparts of Constantinople were strong and lofty; the Latins were unprovided with any battering engines; and the Greek archers, securely directing an unerring aim, galled them with an incessant flight of arrows. An indecisive contest was maintained until the close of day; but at nightfall the assailants, after setting fire to the suburbs, withdrew from the walls.†

To a state of hostility so inconclusive in its objects and injurious to both parties, a stop was now put by the mediation of the Count of Vermandois. If Alexius had ever really meditated the destruction of the Crusaders, experience had shown the fruitlessness of his efforts; and his desire of an accommodation might be increased by the approach of Boemond and his army. Renouncing, therefore, his earlier designs, or more probably only shifting the jealous expedients of a policy which had prompted him in self-defence to restrict, not to ruin the dreaded power of the Crusaders, he proposed to their Chiefs as a condition of his friendship that they should take an oath of fealty to himself; and swear either to restore to the Empire, or to hold in Feudal dependence,* such of its ancient Provinces as they might recover from the Infidels. Upon these terms, he engaged vigorously to support the Crusade with the Imperial forces and wealth; and he had prepared the way for their acceptance by inducing the brother of the French King to offer an influential precedent.‡

So overcome was that vain and inconstant Prince by the blandishments and presents of Alexius, that he not only stooped to the performance of the desired homage himself, but undertook to obtain the same submission from his confederates. The proposal was at first received in the Latin camp with the indignation natural to the free and fiery spirit of high-born warriors, who spurned the idea of all allegiance or subjection to a foreign Lord. Godfrey himself reproached the baseness of Hugh in having consented to a degradation alike unworthy of his haughty pretensions and real dignity, of his ostentatious bearing and Royal birth. But the Count of Vermandois excused his own compliance, and enforced its propriety on Godfrey, by arguments best adapted to the disinterested principles of that single-minded and pious Prince: such as the paramount obligation of their sacred vows; the difficulty of reducing Alexius to more becoming terms; the impossibility of prosecuting the holy enterprise without the Imperial aid; the probable ruin of the cause by delay and warring hostility; and the very sinfulness of a contest with a Christian People. The reason of Godfrey was no sooner convinced, than all sentiments of worldly pride and honour yielded to the humbler dictates of Religious duty; and no subsequent persuasions, with which he was addressed by the messengers of Boemond and the Count of Thoulouse, to await their arrival, and chastise in arms the insulting demand of Alexius, could shake the sincerity of his purpose. He declared his resolution to take the required oaths of fealty; and the example of his self-denial secured the acquiescence of his compeers. To remove their lingering suspicions of treachery, Alexius delivered his son as a hostage for their safe return; and Godfrey and his principal companions repairing to Constantinople, prostrated themselves in homage before the Imperial throne. Their humiliation was relieved by a reception of studied honour; and in return for the vows of fidelity which he

* Anna Comnena, p. 235. The very circumstance of this proposal being made in a proof, which perhaps deserves more attention than it has usually attracted, that the idea of the Feudal relation, whencesoever received, was at this Epoch familiar to the Eastern Emperor. It is still more observable that the ceremonies with which the Latin Princes subsequently took the oaths of fealty to Alexius were also strictly Feudal; and though their ready adoption on this occasion in the Byzantine Court, need not shake our belief in the exclusive Barbarian and not Roman origin and essence of the System from which they were borrowed, yet the whole fact is curious.

† Anna Comnena, p. 229.

* Anna Comnena, p. 228, 229.

† Albertus Aquensis, p. 300—202. Balthicus Arch. p. 91. Willermus Tyr. p. 653, 654. Anna Comnena, p. 232—234.

History.
From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

the army Godfrey loses the Emphorus.

successive real and action of the remaining divisions.

repeated on his knees with clasped hands, Alexius distinguished the virtue and dignity of Godfrey by the ceremonies of filial adoption, and investiture in Imperial robes.* But these empty recognitions faintly conceal the real triumph of Greek pride and policy; and it was no fanciful degradation which converted the brave and Chivalric Princes and Nobles of Western Europe into the vassals and liegemen of a Byzantine Despot.†

After this ceremony, Alexius urged his adopted son, and his new dependents, to exchange their threatening position near his Capital for more eligible and abundant quarters on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus; and their passage of that strait was apparently hastened through his dread of their being reinforced, while still under the walls of Constantinople, by the other divisions of the Crusading hosts. Before the departure of Godfrey, the Count of Flanders and his followers had already reached the Byzantine Capital from Italy; and their arrival was speedily succeeded, at short intervals, by that of the Duke of Normandy, the Count of Chartres, and the scattered residue of the great army which had originally assembled under Hugh of Vermandois. By the dexterous application of flatteries; and bribes, each of these potent Chiefs was persuaded in his turn to perform the same homage as his precursors, and was then hurried off to join them on the Asiatic shore.‡ The embarkation from the Apulian ports of the third grand division, under Boemond and Tancred; their passage of the Adriatic into Greece; and their march through that Country; were all regulated by those able leaders with higher martial conduct and discipline. Large bodies of the Imperial troops, with dubious intentions, hovered over their route, and sometimes even attempted to obstruct their passage, and cut off their detachments; but the skilful dispositions of Boemond frustrated their attempts; and the impetuous valour of Tancred more than once punished the secret perfidy, or open aggression of a pusillanimous enemy. The whole march to the vicinity of Constantinople was triumphantly completed; and here Boemond, being met by Godfrey himself with persuasions to satisfy the Imperial demand of fealty, left his army in charge of his gallant kinsman, and with a small train proceeded to the Capital of Alexius.*

The belief of that Monarch's duplicity in his reception of the other Latin Princes is increased by the equal cordiality with which he welcomed this hateful enemy. He alluded to Boemond's earlier invasion of his Empire only to extol the valour which he had displayed in that enterprise, and to express his own satisfaction at the pacific union which now effaced every feeling of enmity. With as consummate hypocrisy, Boemond on his part professed his self-reproach at the injustice of his former hostility, and his desire to prove his gratitude for so gracious an oblivion of injuries. But Alexius, as well aware of his ambitious and greedy character, as of his habitual faithlessness, designed to secure his allegiance, by the only motives of selfish interest which could be binding on a nature so sordid. After causing him to be lodged and entertained in the most magnificent style in one of the Imperial palaces, the cunning Monarch ordered the door of a chamber filled with heaps of gold and jewels to be left, as if accidentally, open while he passed. The Norman was ravished with delight and envy as he gazed at the glittering hoards; and his ruling impulses were betrayed in the involuntary exclamation, that, to the possessor of such treasures, the conquest of a Kingdom might be an easy achievement. He was immediately informed that the gift of the Emperor made them his own; and after a slight hesitation, his avarice swallowed the bait. His performance of homage to Alexius was succeeded by dreams of ambition, which perhaps aspired to the Imperial throne itself; and his expressions of devotion to its service were accompanied by a proposal that he should be invested with the office of Great Domestic of the East, or General of the Byzantine armies in Asia. A pre-emptive compliance with this audacious demand, which shocked the pride, and might well startle the suspicions of Alexius, was prudently avoided with hollow assurances that the highest dignities of the Empire should be the reward of future services; and the baffled or sanguine adventurer was persuaded to join the Asiatic camp of his confederates. The opposite conduct of his high-minded relative had meanwhile excited equal alarm. Disdaining, on his arrival at Constantinople, to imitate the baseness of Boemond, Tancred had quitted the Capital unobserved, and crossed the Bosphorus in disguise. By this flight he had only designed to escape the degradation of owning himself the vassal of a foreign Prince; but the suspicion and resentment of the Emperor were not allayed until Boemond unscrupulously pledged himself by oath for the homage and allegiance of his cousin.†

The First
Crusade.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

Transactions of Alexius with Bo-
mond;

* Anna Comnena, p. 235—238. Albert p. 203. Willermus Tyr. p. 656, 657.

† That the humiliation was keenly felt may be inferred from the sullen brevity with which the Latin Chroniclers dismiss the transaction; but the daughter of Alexius has related an anecdote, which more plainly marks the struggling emotions of the proud warriors, while it amusingly illustrates the manners of Western Europe. During the ceremony of performing homage, a private French Baron, conjectured by Du Cange, with great probability, to have been Robert of Paris, was so little disposed to repress his disgust at the pride of the Greek Despot, and the compliance to which Religious or Political motives had induced the more responsible leaders of the Crusade to submit, that he audaciously seated himself beside Alexius on the Imperial Throne. When the brother of Duke Godfrey attempted to remove him for this rude disrespect, he coolly retorted his contempt; and the Emperor was so astonished by his insolence, that he could only demand through an interpreter his name and condition. "I am a Frenchman," was the reply, "and of noble birth; and I care only to know that in the neighbourhood from which I come there is a church, whither they who design to prove their valour repair to pray until an adversary be found to answer their defiance. There have I often worshipped, without finding that man who dared to accept my challenge." Alexius, because he well knew, says his daughter, the fierce spirit of the Latins, dissembled his resentment; and rather treated it in an ironical caution, that if the Frenchman still desired to maintain the same boast with safety in his Crusading warfare, he would do well to keep beyond reach of the Turkish arrows, by remaining in the centre of the Christian host. His taunt and his advice were alike thrown away; and his daughter betrays some satisfaction in proceeding to record that the insolent Barbarian fell in the foremost ranks of the Crusaders at the battle of Dorylaeum. Anna Comnena, ubi supra.

‡ Even the politic Count of Chartres was deluded by the arts of Alexius, who contrived to make each of the Latin Princes in turn believe himself preferred to all his confederates. There is extant a curious and apparently authentic epistle from Stephen to his Countess, in which he unconsciously shows how completely he was duped by the wily Greek. The Emperor had inquired how many were his children; spoken much of the love he bore towards him and his unknown Home; pretended that the Count must send for one of his sons to be educated at the Byzantine Court; and laud him reckon on his Imperial favour to provide for the youth; in all which the wise Count religiously confided. Mahillon, Man. Ind. vol. i. p. 237. § Baldric, p. 92. Albert p. 204. Willermus Tyr. p. 656—660.

* Robertus Monachus, p. 36, 37. Baldricus Archiepiscopus, p. 92. Guibert, p. 489. Willermus Tyr. p. 658.

† Baldric, p. 92—94. Albertus Aquensis, p. 204. Guibert, p. 491.

History.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

and with the Count of Thoulouse.

The arrival of the last army of Crusaders under the Count of Thoulouse, exhausted the artifices of the Imperial policy. After traversing Northern Italy, that skilful and veteran commander had led his forces into the Byzantine Provinces, through the wild passes of Dalmatia. His march, though distressed by the noxious climate and rugged obstacles of that mountainous region, and successively harassed by the savage Dalmatians, and by the no less hostile Greeks, had been prosecuted with so much energy and vigilance, that his host, after exercising a passing vengeance on their treacherous assailants, reached the shores of the Bosphorus in unimpaired strength and discipline; and the news of his formidable approach at the head of one hundred thousand Provençals and Italians, revived the liveliest apprehensions in the Imperial Court. At some distance from Constantinople, the army was met by messengers both from Alexius and from Godfrey and his associates, with a united request to the Count of Thoulouse to repair to the Capital. Raymond complied with the invitation; but on his arrival neither the arts of the Emperor, nor the solicitations of his confederates, could induce him to kneel before the Imperial Throne. Once more is the Emperor accused, on his failure in this negotiation, of having directed a treacherous surprise of the Provençal camp: and whatever was its origin, a furious collision ensued between the troops of Raymond and of Alexius. The Greeks were defeated with signal carnage; and in the first suggestions of vengeance, the Count of Thoulouse was with difficulty restrained from vowing war to the utterance against so perfidious a race. He repelled with contempt the menaces both of Alexius and of Boemond, who now ostentatiously avowing himself the most faithful champion of the Empire, proclaimed his resolution to turn his arms in its succour even against his reculant confederate. To the milder expostulations of Godfrey, the aged Count so far yielded as to tender an oath that he would abstain from all enterprises against the life and dignity of Alexius: but beyond this concession his cold and stubborn pride was equally impenetrable to threats and entreaties. He declared that he had quitted his native dominions to devote the residue of his life to the service of God alone, not to submit himself to any earthly master; and Alexius, either awed into personal respect by the firmness of his spirit, or desirous of conciliating so powerful a Chief, suddenly changed his whole demeanour, loaded him with assiduous attentions, and treated him with such real or affected confidence as to impart his secret hatred and suspicion of Boemond. The old Provençal Prince listened with pleasure to these complaints of a rival whose interference had already irritated his jealous and vindictive temper; and his heated passions unguarding the usual wariness of his politic judgment, made him an easy dupe to the superior craft of the wily Greek. Alexius so completely gained the ascendancy over his mind, that he lingered at Constantinople after the departure of the other Chieftains; and the Count of Thoulouse, who had been loud in his denunciations against the perfidy of the Byzantine Court, was among the last to quit its seductive hospitalities for the Asiatic camp of the Crusaders.*

Before the arrival of the Provençal forces, all the Willermus Tyr. p. 659. Anna Comæna, p. 238—241. Radulphus Cadomensis, de Gesta Tancredi, p. 289, 290.

* Raymond de Agiles, p. 140, 141. Robert, p. 38. Guibert, p. 490. Willermus Tyr. p. 660—662. Anna Comæna p. 241.

other great divisions of the Crusading levies had already completed their junction on the plains of Asia Minor; and their wants rather than their strength had been increased by the wretched remnants of the preceding mob who, with Peter the Hermit himself, had, in recovered confidence, found their way from various places of refuge to the general muster. The enormous numbers of the congregated hosts of Christendom can be estimated with little hope of precision: either from the tumid metaphors of the Grecian Princess, who has described their desolating course; or from the positive assertions of the Latin writers, whose ignorance of military affairs might easily mislead their computations, and whose astonishment at the view of so prodigious an array, was sure to be vented in exaggeration. If we were to credit some of our usual authorities, six or even seven hundred thousand warriors were present in arms: besides an innumerable multitude of ecclesiastics, women, and children.† But the report of the same parties in other places,‡ and every evidence of reason and probability, are alike inconsistent with this conclusion; it may be suspected that the leaders of the war were themselves unable to ascertain the real numbers of a disorderly herd of irregular infantry; and we can rely with safety only on the statement of the most judicious Chronicler of the Crusade, that the mailed cavalry, which, according to the rude tactics of the Middle Ages, formed the nerve of armies, amounted to one hundred thousand men:‡ This superb body of heavy horse was composed of the flower of the European Chivalry: Knights, Esquires, and their attendant Men at arms, completely equipped with the helmet and shield, the coat and boots of chain and scale armour, the lance and the sword, the battle axe and the ponderous mace of iron. The crowd of footmen fought principally with the long and cross bow, and were used indifferently as occasion required for archers, scouts, and pioneers: but their half-armed and motley condition formed a miserable contrast to the splendour of the Chivalric array, which glittered in the blazonry of embroidered and armed surcoats, shields and headpieces inlaid with gems and gold, and banners and pennons distinguishing the princely and noble rank of Chieftains and Knights.§

From their first camp on the Asiatic shores of the Bosphorus, the advance of the Christian hosts, in bold disregard of minor objects of attack, was immediately directed against Nice, the Capital of the Sultan of Roum, situated in a fertile plain on the direct route to Jerusalem. Resting on the waters of the lake Ascanus, the defensive capabilities of that City had been sedulously improved by art. It was surrounded by a double wall of stupendous height and thickness, provided with a deep ditch, and flanked at intervals by no less than three hundred and seventy towers; its garrison was numerous and brave; and the Sultan Solyman, (or Kilidge Arslan,¶) who had retired to the neighbouring mountains with his Turkish cavalry, preserving his communication with the place by the lake, might with equal facility reinforce its defenders, and harass the quarters

* Fuleher, p. 387. Willermus Tyr. p. 664.

† Willermus Tyr. p. 693, &c.

‡ Guibert, p. 491.

§ Albert, Aquisensis, p. 103, 212, 241, 392, &c. This writer fondly dwells on the splendid array of the Crusading hosts, and affords more information than any of the other Chroniclers on the armament, composition, &c. of the troops.

¶ De Guignes, vol. i. p. 215.

The First Crusade.From
A. D.
1095,
to
A. D.
1099.History.
From
A. D.
1095,
to
A. D.
1099.
page.

of the besiegers. Nothing deterred by these difficulties, the Crusaders, on their arrival before the City, undertook the siege with an energy suitable to the obstinacy which was anticipated in the defence. Notwithstanding their numbers, the immense circumference of the walls prevented a complete investment; but each independent leader, successively encamping on the first quarter which he found unoccupied, from thence directed and prosecuted his attacks. Contrary to the impression which later Historians have sometimes given, that a chief authority over the Crusading hosts was conceded to Duke Godfrey, it is here observable that no traces of such a recognition of supremacy can be discovered in the narrative of contemporary Chroniclers. The general plan of operations was sometimes debated and determined in a Council of Princes; but the details and choice of execution were abandoned to the uncontrollable will of the different Chieftains and their respective followers; who were alike too proud of personal rank, and too jealous of national distinctions, to brook any submission to a foreign command. But the same feelings, which were repugnant to all subordination and unity of action, in a great degree supplied their want with a generous emulation of glory; and in the leaguer of Nice, the Latin Princes contended with rival valour and industry who should be foremost in urging his approaches to the walls. On the Northern side were encamped Duke Godfrey and his Rhenish and German division; Eastward extended the quarters of the Counts of Vermandois and Chartres and the two Roberts, with the French, Norman, English, and Flemish Crusaders; on the same front the Provençal and Italian host of the Count of Thoulouse took up a continued alignment; and towards the South the City was enclosed by the troops of Boemond and Tancred. Two thousand men who had attended the march of the Crusaders, under Taticeus, as Imperial Lieutenant, were the only Byzantine forces in the confederate camp.*

From their respective quarters each of these divisions pushed forward its attacks, with all the mechanical expedients which the Middle Ages had imperfectly preserved out of the martial science of classical antiquity. Among the principal machines of the besiegers were lofty wooden towers of several stories, termed belfreys,† or belfrois, which were moved forward on rollers or wheels; protected against conflagration by coverings of boiled hides; filled with archers to dislodge the defenders from the ramparts; and supplied with drawbridges, which on a nearer approach, being let down upon the walls, afforded a passage for the Knights and their followers to rush to the assault. The advance of these belfrois was sometimes preceded, the road levelled, and the ditch of a fortress filled up, by means of a movable gallery or shed of similar materials, but lower structure, called indifferently a fox or cat;‡ or chat-chatil when surmounted also by a tower. Under cover of these galleries, the walls could either be undermined by the slow operation of the sap, or breached by the violent blows of the battering ram. Balistic engines of various sizes and denominations for hurling masses of rock, beams of timber, stones, and darts, composed the ordinary artillery both of the assailants and besieged; and the most effectual means of defence were afforded by the use of the Greek fire in destroying the hostile machines.*

The mechanical operations of the Crusaders were for a while arrested by the gallant efforts of the Sultan of Roum, who, descending from the mountains which overhang the plain of Nice with a swarm of fifty thousand horse, endeavoured by a sudden and impetuous attack, with the assistance of the garrison, to overpower the Eastern camp of the Christians. But his hope of surprising their quarters was frustrated by the capture of the messengers who were intrusted to convey his purpose to the City; he every where encountered a determined resistance and a bloody repulse; and his first experience of the valour of the Western Christians compelled him to abandon Nice to its fate. The defence of the City was not the less resolutely maintained; and the attempts of the besiegers to breach the walls were repeatedly foiled, their projectile engines disabled, and their towers and galleries crushed by fragments of rock, or burned by the Greek fire. Some weeks had already been consumed in fruitless labour and slaughter, when the position of the City on the lake Ascanius suggested to the besiegers a more successful expedient. At their desire, Alexius caused a number of small vessels to be prepared in his arsenals, transported over land, and launched upon the lake. This flotilla, manned by seamen and archers in the Imperial pay, ensured the command of the lake, alarmed the City on that side with desultory attacks, and intercepting all its communication by water with the exterior country, completed the investment of the place.†

Meanwhile the besiegers continued their works with renewed spirit. The veteran Count of Thoulouse, whose approaches had been conducted with most skill and pertinacity, at length succeeded, by the science of a Lombard engineer, in attaching with safety a chat-chatil, or castellated gallery, to one of the towers of the City, which had been injured in a former siege and was bent forward from its base. The inners of the besiegers propped the superincumbent mass with strong timbers while they loosened the foundations; and the supports being then fired, the whole fell with a tremendous crash, and left a yawning breach. But instead of seizing the first moment of consternation by which the garrison were paralyzed, the Provençals imprudently delayed the assault until the following morning; and an artful Greek contrived in the interval to rob them of the fruits of success. The wife and sister of the Sultan, whom he had left in the City until this moment, endeavoured on the first alarm to escape over the lake; they were captured by the Imperial flotilla; and Botonite its commander immediately offered, not only their honourable release, but protection to the people of Nice against the fury of the Latins, if the City were surrendered to his master. The now despairing inhabitants accepted his terms; the troops of the flotilla disembarking were admitted into the City; and when the Crusaders with returning day were prepared to mount the breach of the fallen tower, the first spectacle which they beheld was the Imperial banner floating on the walls. In their wounded pride and disappointed cupidity at being thus cheated of the honour and spoils of victory, the first

* Robert. Mon. p. 39, 40. Albert. Aquevis, p. 204, 205. Willelmus Tyr. p. 666. Anna Comnena, p. 247.

† Du Cange, v. Belfredus.
‡ Idem, v. Cutus, Fuipra, &c.

* Muratori, Antiq. Med. Ævi, Diss. xvi.

† Albert. p. 205, 206. Willelmus Tyr. p. 667. Anna Comnena, p. 245.

History. peeted discovery of these qualities in an Asiatic Nation is evinced in the assertion, that they alone of all Eastern people were worthy of contending in arms with the Christian Chivalry, and of sharing with the warriors of the West a common superiority in martial virtues over the despotic Greeks. The conduct of the Sultan of Roum after the battle of Dorylaeum afforded a more unequivocal testimony of the respect and fear with which the prowess of the Crusaders had impressed the Infidels themselves. Abandoning all further hope of successful resistance to the conquerors, Solyman hastily evacuated his Kingdom with the wreck of his army, every where ravaging the land in his flight; and the Crusaders were left without opposition to continue their advance through a desolated and deserted Country. Their march over the wasted plains of Asia Minor skirted the base of the great mountain range which stretches across that celebrated region from the sea of Marmora to the Syrian Gates; and their route may be traced on the modern map by the Cities of Kara Hissar, Aksheer, Konieh, and Erckli.

The horrors which attended the passage of so unwieldy a host, undisciplined and unprovided by any of the arrangements which are familiar to the military science and economy of our own times, admit but of imperfect description, and may only faintly be imagined. The towns had been swept both of their inhabitants and stores, the cultivated districts converted into a scathed and hungry solitude; and the more natural Deserts which frequently intervened were parched with sand and destitute of water. Of the poorer and worse provided among the Crusaders, hundreds died on every day's march, of want and fatigue, of raging thirst or its fatal gratification: war-horses, baggage-animals, and hounds and hawks—the indispensable incumbrances of a Chivalric camp—perished alike from the scarcity of water; and of the splendid cavalry of the Princes, Nobles, and their followers, which on the field of Nice had mustered one hundred thousand lances, nearly thirty thousand were dismounted before their arrival under the walls of Antioch. In a word, so completely exhausted and disorganized was the whole host before its approach to the Syrian frontiers that, in the tremendous pass of Mount Taurus, even a small band of resolute men might have successfully maintained the steep and narrow defile against the armed but feeble multitudes who, staggering under the oppression of toil, heat, and intolerable thirst, slowly wound in a lengthened and disorderly train through the mountain chain which here bars the Southern route. But the panic-stricken Turks, in the precipitation of their flight, neglected the opportunity of defence; the Crusading host was suffered, unassailed, to complete the most toilsome and dangerous portion of their march; and every natural obstacle of the Country and the climate being gradually surmounted, their straggling divisions were safely reunited in the same encampment on the Syrian soil.*

While the main army of the Crusaders prepared to penetrate through the Tauridian pass, two bodies of their cavalry had been separately detached in advance under Tancred and Baldwin, the brother of Duke Godfrey, to explore the neighbouring regions, and make a diversion against the Turkish power. After both had wandered in some uncertainty among the mountains, the division of Tancred first succeeded in effecting a passage, and continued its Southern descent into the coasts of Cilicia. The young Chieftain had already arrived before Tarsus, and granted a capitulation to the Turkish garrison, when the troops of Baldwin, who had reached the same vicinity by another route, unexpectedly made their appearance; and the jealous artifice of their leader succeeded, by opening an intrigue with the Infidel and Christian inhabitants, in obtaining possession of the City. The generous Italian, repressing his indignation, abandoned the place to his rival; and turning Eastward, pursued a new course of enterprise with so much rapidity, that several important towns submitted to his arms. But his forbearing temper was outraged beyond endurance when he learned that, after his departure from Tarsus, the selfish refusal of Baldwin to receive a party of his followers within the protection of the walls, had exposed them to be massacred by the retreating Infidels; and the Rhensish Chieftain, leaving a garrison in Tarsus, no sooner came up with his division, than Tancred, yielding to the natural impulse of resentment which he shared with his enraged soldiers, led them to a furious assault upon the forces of their treacherous confederate. After a bloody encounter, the Italians were repulsed by superiority of numbers; but feelings of mutual compunction at so irreligious a feud between brethren of the Cross having succeeded to their first emotions of anger, an accommodation was effected; and the two detachments together rejoined the grand army just before it reached the Syrian frontier.*

This quarrel of Baldwin and Tancred had one important consequence. The guilt of the original aggression lay so clearly with the former that, when the circumstances of his conduct became known in the Crusading camp, he justly incurred the execrations of the whole host; and respect for the virtues of his brother Godfrey alone saved him from condign punishment. A consciousness of the aversion in which he was held by his confederates, did not tend to lessen his selfish disregard for the general interests of the Crusade; and he gladly availed himself of the first advantageous opening to separate from the main army, and pursue an independent career of ambition. He learned that the Christian Cities of Armenia and Mesopotamia endured with impatience the Musulman yoke; and that the Turkish garrisons were few and feeble; and that the inhabitants were ripe for revolt against their oppression. At the instance of a fugitive Armenian Noble, and at the head of only two hundred of his own lances, and a more considerable body of infantry, he quitted the Crusading camp; boldly directed his march Eastward; and victoriously overran the whole country as far as the Euphrates. Encouraged by the sight of the banners of the Cross, the Christian population everywhere rose in arms; opened the gates of their Cities on his approach; and assisted him in expelling the common Infidel enemy. After a slight and ineffectual opposition, the Turkish Emirs either fled or submitted to his arms; the fame of his successful exploits soon spread beyond the Euphrates; and the people of Edessa, the most considerable City of Mesopotamia, who though still governed by a native Prince had long groaned under the exactions of Turkish tribute, obliged their aged Duke to implore his aid in delivering them from subjection to the Infidels. Baldwin

The First Crusade.

From A. D. 1095. to A. D. 1099

Conquests of Baldwin, brother of Godfrey.

* Albert. p. 215. Guibert, p. 495. Fulcher. Caroot. p. 389. Baldricus Arch. p. 99. Willermus Tyr. p. 675.

* Albert. Apensia, p. 214—219. Radulphus Cadomensis, p. 297—301. Willermus Tyr. p. 677—689.

History.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

FOUND-ATION OF THE LATIN PRINCIPALITY OF EDESSA.

Continued advance of the main Crusading host.

eagerly accepted the invitation; he was received with enthusiasm by the Edessenes; and though his disposable Latin forces were now reduced to eighty horse and a small band of foot, he was so vigorously aided by these new allies, that he found no difficulty in establishing the independence of their State. The means by which he next possessed himself of its Government are variously related: but under their most favourable construction, the event may justify the darkest suspicions of his guilty ambition. Excited by the dread that their deliverer would forsake them, the people of Edessa first compelled their Duke to adopt* him as his son and successor; and the old Prince was then murdered in a popular insurrection. If Baldwin was really innocent of his death, he profited not the less by the catastrophe. He received the Ducal Crown on the following day; and thus became the founder of the first Latin Principality in the East. Under his able and vigorous Government, his new subjects soon discovered that they had chosen a severe and absolute master, as well as a formidable champion: but he at least completed their emancipation from the hated tyranny of the Infidels; extended the limits of their State by his conquests from the Turks of the intermediate territory between their City and Antioch; and rendered the PRINCIPALITY OF EDESSA, by its position beyond the Euphrates, for above fifty years one of the most important outworks of the Christian power in the East.†

While Baldwin was engaged in establishing his power on the banks of the Euphrates, the main host of the Crusaders had advanced to Antioch, and undertaken the siege of that ancient Capital of Syria. The City, which still presented the appearance of pristine grandeur, and contained a numerous Christian population, was possessed by Baghasian, a Prince of Seljukian lineage; whose power was maintained by a Turkish garrison of about ten thousand horse and twice as many infantry; and whose courage and energy were worthy of his station. After some brave but ineffectual efforts to impede the approach of the invaders, he retired within the walls; and the iron gates of the bridge over the Orontes, which commanded the access to the City from the North, having been forced by the advanced guard of the Crusaders under the Duke of Normandy, their whole host passed the river and overspread the adjacent plain. At this epoch, Antioch, occupying an irregular site of precipice and valley, was embraced, within a circumference of about four miles, by a strong wall, which, wherever the natural obstacles of the ground did not afford a sufficient defence, rose to the height of sixty feet. Part of the circuit was covered by the river and a morass which received the torrents from the neighbouring hills; and the remainder by a deep and wide ditch. The formidable aspect of these works at first dispirited the leaders of the Crusade; the lateness of the season—for the Summer and Autumn had been already consumed in the passage of Asia Minor—was unfavourable for the commencement of an arduous siege; and a proposal to defer the enterprise until the return of Spring was only rejected in their Council through the energetic remonstrances of the Count of Thoulouse against the dangers of delay and inaction.*

As soon as the exhortations of that Prince renovated the ardour of his confederates, the City was invested and operations against it were commenced: but, of the five gates in its circumference, three only were blockaded; and by some unexplained negligence or necessity, the communication of the garrison with the exterior country through the other two was left open. From these the resolute and active Baghasian harassed the rear of the besiegers with perpetual sallies, frequently cut off their supplies, and burned the materials which were with difficulty collected for their operations. The want of all warlike stores for the siege, the consequent tardiness of the approaches, and the unskillful attempts to which the Crusaders were reduced, all betray the extent of their obligations at the preceding siege of Nice to the aid of Alexius and his Greek engines and artificers. The few battering and projectile machines were now used without effect; and the single movable tower, which they were enabled to construct with assistance from some Italian vessels lately arrived on the coast, was no sooner advanced to the walls, than the Turks, suddenly issuing from one of the uninvested gates, set it on fire, and reduced it to ashes. While this and other partial successes raised the courage of the garrison, and their intercourse with the country secured the constant renewal of their supplies, the besiegers themselves were beginning to suffer the most grievous distresses from want and disease. At first they had found abundant food in the fertile district which was commanded by their camp; and their whole host had ranted in plenty: but the improvident waste and wanton destruction both of provisions and forage speedily exhausted the means of support in the vicinity; and when the approach of Winter increased the difficulty and expense of transporting distant supplies, the more indigent of the Crusading multitude fell a prey to all the horrors of famine. Even the rich were glad to purchase the most disgusting fare at exorbitant prices; and their horses were either starved or killed for food in so great numbers, that of the seventy thousand cavalry with which they commenced the siege, before its third month was completed not more than two thousand remained. The ravages of hunger were, as usual, followed by those of pestilence. The plain of Antioch was deluged with the wintry rains, and the putrifying effect of moisture in an Asiatic climate upon the filthy condition of the Christian camp, produced a contagious disease, which swept off thousands of its squalid population.†

From this scene of accumulated misery, numbers of warriors of inferior rank fled to the establishments of Baldwin in Mesopotamia, and to the delivered Christian towns in Cilicia: but the shame of their desertion was exceeded by that of some of the leaders themselves. The Duke of Normandy having withdrawn to the coast, re-

* For the particulars of the singular ceremony by which this adoption was declared, we are indebted to the lively narrative of Guibert. In full assembly of the people, Baldwin was first made to enter in a state of nudity under the same shirt with his new father, who then folded him to his breast and gave him the filial kiss. He was next obliged to submit to precisely the same forms of adoption by the wife of the Duke of Edessa. Guibert, p. 496. It is supposed that the Emperor Alexius, in honouring the homage of Godfrey with the filial relation, had also received him between the shirt and the skin. But see Du Cange, Hist. nor. Joazeffii, xxii.

† Fulcherius Carnotensis, p. 389, 390. Albert, Aquisensis, p. 220—222. Guibert, p. 496, 497. Willermus Tyr. p. 682, 683.

* Albert, p. 225, 226. Radulph, Cœd. p. 303. Raymond des Agiles, p. 142. Baldric, Arch. p. 101. Guibert, p. 498. Willermus Tyr. p. 684—689.

† Robertus Monachus, p. 45, 46. Albert, p. 227—232. Radulph, Cœd. p. 304, 305. Raymond des Agiles, p. 143—145. Baldric, Arch. p. 101. Fulcher, Carnot. p. 390. Guibert, p. 499, 500. Willermus Tyr. p. 690—693.

The Fm Grande
—
Fm
A. A.
1695;
to
A. J.
1695, beginning of history.

Form of proposals the (sub-ing City)

Desertion of inferior rank.

History.
From
A. D.
1093,
to
A. D.
1099.

quired several citations and a threat of excommunication to induce his return; and the Count of Chartres at a later period, under the excuse of illness, confirmed the suspicion of his cowardice by retiring from the camp with his division to Alexandretta. But the sacred cause was still more deeply disgraced by the flight of the valiant Viscount of Melun,* together with the great fanatic Peter the Hermit, who, after exciting the warriors of Europe to devote themselves to the imaginary service of Heaven, was foremost in attempting to abscond from the privations of the enterprise. The dangerous effect of this example was prevented by the activity of Tancred, who intercepted the escape both of the Hermit and his companion, and their desertion was only pardoned in the Council of the indignant Princes upon their swearing never to abandon the holy expedition. The retreat of Tatcius, the Imperial Lieutenant, with the small body of Greek auxiliaries which he commanded, was permitted with mingled emotions of hope and contempt. He could scarcely obtain full credit for the assertion that his motive was to impress Alexius, by his personal influence, with the necessity of forwarding immediate supplies of provisions for the Syrian war; though he offered the pledge of his oath that he would himself return with the convoys: but if the Princes were not deluded by this shallow pretext, they prudently dissembled their suspicions and dismissed him in peace.†

Renewal of the Siege.
A. D.
1098.

With the return of Spring the sufferings of the Crusaders were in some degree mitigated by the arrival on the coast of supplies from Europe: but the activity of the Turks in harassing their convoys was undiminished; and the continued freedom of intercourse between the garrison of Antioch and their Syrian confederates, perpetually exposed the besiegers to desultory attacks in front and rear. On one occasion, early in February, an army of twenty thousand men, under the three Emirs of Aleppo, Cæsarea, and Emis, was intercepted in an attempt to enter the City, and defeated with signal slaughter by Count Raymond and Boemond. But, in the following month, the same Crusading leaders, while escorting a supply of provisions and military stores from the coast, were suddenly assailed and routed by an ambuscade of the Infidels. Godfrey, who had lately risen from a sick couch, was compelled to fly to their succour with the remains of the Latin Chivalry; and the ever-enterprising Baghasian, seizing the occasion of this absence of the best troops of the Crusaders from the beleaguering, made an impetuous sally from the walls and forced the Christian lines. The bravery and conduct of the Duke of Brabant were never more vigorously displayed than on this occasion. He retraced his march to the camp with so great celerity, and posted his forces with so much ability, as to intercept the retreat of Baghasian; and a furious conflict ensued under the walls of Antioch.

feat of Turks.

* This Worthy was surnamed the Carpenter: not because he followed that mechanical occupation; but, as the Chroniclers are careful to tell us, by reason of the weighty strokes with which his battle-axe hammered the heads of his antagonists. Robert, p. 47. Guibert, p. 501.

† Robert, p. 47, 48. Raymond, p. 146. Balric, p. 103. Guibert, p. 501, 502. Willermus Tyr. p. 694. Anna Comæna, p. 252. The Grecian Princes, indeed, refers the flight of Tatcius to the arts of Boemond, who fearing interruption on the part of the Imperial Lieutenant in his scheme for acquiring the Sovereignty of Antioch, terrified him into a belief that the Latin Princes designed to massacre him and his troops on some suspicion that Alexius had betrayed them to the Turks. But all the Latin Writers agree in giving the account copied in the text.

The Infidels fought with desperation, but their courage was unequally opposed to the heroic spirit and sinewy force of the Christian Knighthood, animated by the individual prowess of its leaders: among whom the two Dukes, Godfrey, and Robert of Normandy, and the gallant Tancred, are recorded to have performed the most incredible feats of corporeal strength and valour.* Of the infidels, a son of Baghasian, many other Emirs, and two thousand warriors of inferior degree, fell in this sanguinary flight; of the Christians, not more than half that number were slain; and encouraged by their victory, they formed and successfully accomplished the design of barring the egress of the garrison from the two gates which had hitherto been left unblockaded, by the construction of a fortified mound or intrenchment opposite to each. Tancred and the Count of Thoulouse severally undertook the honourable duty of guarding the new posts; the garrison of Antioch was thenceforth effectually confined within the walls; the supplies of provisions which their brethren had hitherto introduced by these gates were cut off and diverted to the refreshment of the Latins; and the whole surrounding Country being now in unmoleted possession of the besiegers, abundance again reigned in their camp †

The First
Crusade.
From
A. D.
1095,
to
A. D.
1099.

Still, little or no impression had been made upon the Project of Boemond! defences of the City; seven months had already been ineffectually consumed in the siege; and the Council of Princes was disturbed by intelligence that the Sultan of Persia was collecting a large army for the relief of the garrison. At this dangerous crisis, the alliance of an apostate and a traitor served the cause of the Crusaders more beneficially than their arms. Among the Christian population of Antioch, was a man of noble birth, but unprincipled and sordid character, named Phirouz, who, abjuring his Religion, had been received into the Turkish ranks, and intrusted with the command of three towers. Stimulated by avarice or disaffection from the service which he had embraced, he opened a secret correspondence with Boemond; and consented, on the promise of a large reward, to betray his post to the besiegers. The Norman made the use of

* Thus, we are gravely informed how Godfrey, with a single blow of his falchion, cleave a Turk in twain from shoulder to hip. The upper half of the miscreant fell into the Orontes; the legs kept their seat, and were borne by their good steed into the city. Nor was this the only feat of the hero. At one stroke of his sword, he slit an infidel down from the top of the head to the saddle, and even cut through both that and the back-bone of the horse. Again, after the capture of Jerusalem, he satisfied the incredulity of a noble Saracen, who had heard of his prowess, by sweeping off the head of a camel with his sword in a trice. The unbeliever still ascribing more virtue to the temper of the blade than to the strength of the arm which wielded it, Godfrey, to convince him, borrowed his own weapon, and with that in like manner decapitated a second camel. These stories are not related by some one obscure fabler only, but are avouched, the first two with minute particularity, by the Monk Robert, (p. 50.) and by Ralph of Caen; (p. 401.) and all confirmed by so dignified an authority as the Archbishop of Tyre. (p. 701, 770.) And Malinaluy, who made a careful collection of the feats of Godfrey, adds to the number, (p. 418.) the slaying of a lion in single combat near Antioch. The Chroniclers are eager in ascribing to Godfrey as great a superiority in bodily strength as in intellectual virtues over the other Chiefs of the war. But of some of these leaders, exploits scarcely less astounding are recorded. The Duke of Normandy, for instance, cut through the head and shoulders of a Turk at a blow; and Ralph of Caen was prevented from detailing the stupendous deeds of Tancred only by the silence which the modesty of that hero had imposed on his Esquire.

† Robert, p. 49—51. Raymond, p. 147. Balric, 104—107. Albert, p. 237—243. Guibert, p. 503—506. Willermus Tyr. p. 693—703.

History.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

this opening, which was to be expected from his selfish and intriguing spirit: he declared to the Council of his compeers his possession of a plan for the surprise of the place; but, before he would reveal its nature, claimed the Principality of Antioch for himself as the just recompense of his successful merit. The ungenerous preference of his own interest to the common cause of the Crusade, which was apparent through this reservation, disgusted those among his confederates who were actuated by loftier motives of conduct;* but it especially excited less dignified and splanetic feelings in the breast of the Count of Thoulouse, who entertained views similar to his own, and regarded his pretensions with the hatred of a rival. His stipulation was, therefore, at first indignantly rejected; but the increasing urgency of the danger with which the army was menaced by the approach of the Turkish succours, and the necessity of either acquiring possession of the City, or of suspending the siege before their arrival, prevailed over the reluctance of the Council to comply with the extortionate demand. The Count of Thoulouse was compelled by his brother Chieftains to stifle his jealousy and abandon his opposition; and Boemond received the solemn pledge of all the Princes that, if Antioch were gained by his means, he should be invested with its sovereignty.†

Surprise and capture of Antioch.

Upon this promise, the crafty Norman disclosed his project, and prepared its accomplishment. In the dead of night, he led his own troops to the base of the towers, where Phirouz held his watch; by the traitor and some associates of his plot, rope-ladders were lowered; and the future Prince of Antioch, to encourage his wavering followers, was himself the first man who ascended the walls. The escalade was effected in safety; the Turkish guards of several neighbouring towers were slain before they could give the alarm; and the gates of the City were opened to the whole Crusading host. A horrid and indiscriminate slaughter of the Infidel garrison and the Christian inhabitants ensued; until the Crusaders had exhausted the first burst of savage fury, roused by the remembrance of their own sufferings in the siege, and the obstinacy of the lengthened defence. The remains of the Christian population were then protected from further outrage; but the massacre of the Turks was still pursued with relentless vengeance; and the fugitives who escaped beyond the walls were immediately intercepted and slaughtered by the Latin detachments and Syrian Christians who held the surrounding plains. Such was the fate of the gallant veteran Baghasion himself: but numbers of the garrison effected their retreat into the citadel; and closing its gates before the victors bethought themselves of completing their success, the refugees there desperately maintained a protracted resistance.‡

The divided state of the Mohammedan world had hitherto favoured the progress of the Crusade. The dismemberment of the dominions of Malek Shah had fatally weakened the general power of the Turkish Empire. The Monarchs of Persia remained the nominal Chiefs of the Seljinkian race; but the Sultan of Roum had been unassisted in his struggle to arrest the invasion of the Latins by any succour from that kindred Dynasty; the numerous Emirs of Syria, Armenia, and Mesopotamia were disunited among themselves, and agreed only in the effort to throw off their dependence on the Court of Isphahan; and the Fatimite or Ommidan Princes of Egypt were the natural enemies of the whole Turkish nation, as the disciples, protectors, and tyrants of their fallen rivals, the Abbasidian Khalifs of Bagdad. Before the arrival of the Crusaders in Asia, the Khalif of Egypt, availing himself of the distractions of the Seljinkian Empire to recover the ancient possessions of his House, had already despatched an army into Palestine, and succeeded in wresting Jerusalem itself and other places from their Turkish conquerors. When, therefore, the strange rumour reached Cairo, of the Christian invasion of Asia, the overthrow of the Sultan of Roum, and the advance of the Crusading myriads into Syria, the Khalif endeavoured, by sending an embassy to their camp before Antioch, to discover their further designs, to ascertain their force, and perhaps to cultivate their alliance against a common enemy. It is not improbable that the news of their previous successes, as tending to precipitate the fall of the Turkish power, was grateful to the Egyptian Prince; and he is said, by one authority, to have encouraged their prosecution of the siege of Antioch, and even to have offered his cooperation. His envoys also expressed his readiness to admit the Christian pilgrims to worship in peace at Jerusalem: but this proposal was haughtily rejected by the leaders of the Crusade, who replied that the Holy Sepulchre was the lawful heritage of Christendom alone, and declared their resolution, by the Divine aid, to recover and preserve it from further profanation by the hands of whatever race. So bold and unreserved an avowal of their hostile purpose was not calculated to secure the friendship, or to allay the jealousy of the Khalif. The negotiations which he had opened were not indeed broken off, and he accepted an embassy from the Crusaders; but his conduct in the vicissitudes of the siege alternately betrayed his enmity and his fears. When he heard of the destruction with which the besiegers were threatened by famine and pestilence, he imprisoned their envoys; when their Princes despatched the heads of the slaughtered Turkish Emirs to Cairo as the trophies of victory, he released the Ambassadors, and loaded them with presents for the principal leaders of the Crusade.§

The report of the danger of Antioch was received with

* Even the good Godfrey himself, usually so ready to sacrifice his own interests and feelings to the advancement of the sacred cause, could not escape a collision with the selfish meanness of Boemond; nor was his own magnanimity always proof against the sense of a petty injury. This is amusingly shown in a story related by Albert of Aix. (p. 242.) A superb Turkish pavilion, which the Prince of Edessa had captured and sent as a present to his brother Godfrey, was intercepted by an Armenian Chieftain, and despatched as his own gift to Boemond. Godfrey, accompanied by his friend, the Count of Flanders, paid an angry visit to the quarters of Boemond to demand the restitution of the tent. The covetous Norman refused compliance; and Godfrey complained to the Council of Princes. Boemond was at last compelled to deliver up the disputed property: but not before, as Mr. Mills has publicly observed, (Hist. of the Crusades, vol. I. p. 129) a "piece of silk excited the passions of thousands of men who had despised all worldly regards, and had left Europe in order to die in Asia." The whole scene may recall to the reader's mind some of the squabbles of the Homeric heroes; but the impatience of Godfrey in endangering the harmony of the camp for so frivolous a cause, is at variance with the dignified forbearance of his general conduct.

† Robert, p. 54. Albert, p. 241. Radulph, p. 303. 309. Baldric, p. 108, 109. Guibert, p. 503, 510. Willermus Tyr. p. 704-707.

§ Robert, p. 55. Albert, p. 245-247. Radulph, p. 305, 309. Baldric, 109-112. Guibert, p. 511. Willermus Tyr. p. 709-712.

† The Guignee, vol. i. p. 249.

‡ Robert, p. 49-52. Albert, p. 236, 237. Kayumard, p. 146. Willermus Tyr. p. 696.

The Crus.
True
A. D.
1095
to
A. D.
1099 Desires of the Mohammedans Since it this par-tate.

History. other emotions by the Sultan of Persia; and the alarming progress of the Christian arms had the effect of exciting the Turkish States into a transient union against the invaders. From the banks of the Euphrates and the Tigris, twenty-eight powerful Emirs with their swarms of cavalry obeyed the summons of the Sultan to range themselves under the standard of their Prophet, and to avenge the cause of their Faith and Nation. The supreme command was assigned to Kerboga, Prince of Mosul on the Tigris, as the Lieutenant of the Persian Monarch; he was joined by Kilidge Arslan, the Sultan of Roum, with the remains of his forces; and the whole host, which some of the Latin writers are contented to describe as innumerable,* is estimated by others at two, three, or even four hundred thousand cavalry.† The first operations of this overwhelming multitude were directed against the new Christian Principality beyond the Euphrates: but the undaunted heroism with which Baldwin defended his Capital, delayed their advance until the fall of Antioch; and the startling intelligence of that disastrous event roused Kerboga to break up from the unsuccessful siege of Edessa and hasten his march to the relief of the Syrian citadel.‡

On the approach of his host towards Antioch, the leaders of the Crusade withdrew their diminished forces within the defences of the City: and the Turkish cavalry, filling all the surrounding plains, reinforced the garrison of the citadel, enclosed the Latins in their position, and cut off all their communications with the sea-coast, and exterior country. By these measures, the Crusaders, now besieged in their turn, were immediately subjected to a second and far more grievous famine than that which they had endured in the preceding Winter. A repetition of the same narrative of distress, with many aggravated horrors, would be equally revolting and profane; and the reader will gladly be spared the shocking and loathsome details of misery which reduced a famishing host to satiate the cravings of hunger with leaves and weeds, with the hides of animals, and the old leather of belts and harness, to devour greedily the vilest offal of slaughter-houses and sewers, and even to prey upon human flesh. For five and twenty days, the ravening and perishing multitudes suffered every frightful extremity of want which Language may paint, or imagination conceive; the princely, the noble, and the fair, were exposed to privations only less horrid in their intensity than those of the inferior herd of soldiery and camp followers; and the whole host was stricken with one universal sentiment of weakness and despondency. Desertions again became numerous; and the fugitives, who, letting themselves down by ropes at night from the walls, were fortunate enough to escape the scimitars of the Turks, spread their dismal tale of the impending ruin of the Crusading cause throughout the few Christian establishments on the sea-coasts and in the interior, in which they could find refuge. Among these apostates to their vows were many persons of distinction, including that Lord of Melun, William the Carpenter, who had lately so publicly renewed his devotional oaths; and the numerous companions of his shame are consigned to indignant oblivion by one Historian, only under the conviction that their unworthy names were eternally blotted from the Book of Life.*

The conduct of the fugitives was indeed calculated to extinguish the faint gleam of hope which the Crusaders might have felt in the knowledge, that the Byzantine Emperor was now on his march with a large army through Asia Minor to support their operations, and claim the paramount sovereignty of their conquests. The pusillanimous Count of Chartres, who had hitherto lingered at Alexandretta, was so terrified by the wretched aspect and more deplorable report of the deserters who had reached his quarters, that he immediately continued his retreat; and meeting Alexius in Phrygia, communicated the panic to that Monarch. Though the Emperor had been joined, in addition to his own forces, by numerous squadrons of fresh Crusaders from Europe who were still eager to advance to the relief of their confederates at Antioch, the suggestions of his selfish policy, or the baser influence of fear, made him resolve not to risk his resources or the safety of his person for the deliverance of his Latin allies; and abandoning them to their fate, in despite of the remonstrances and reproaches of their Countrymen in his camp, he enforced a general retreat upon Constantinople.‡ The evil tidings of his retrograde movement were not slow in reaching the Crusaders at Antioch: and the first burst of fury at his treacherous or cowardly desertion of his engagements was succeeded by a general apathy of hopeless resignation or sullen despair. Neither the dread of the enemy, nor the threat of punishment, could rouse the soldiery to the requisite exertions for the common defence; they shut themselves up in gloomy expectation of death; and in one quarter of Antioch it was necessary to fire the houses over their heads before they could be driven out to man the ramparts.‡

Amidst this prostration of mental and corporeal energies, which levelled the proud distinctions of spirit between the gallant Chivalry and the meaner multitude of the Crusading host; the names of five only of the leaders of the war deserved the honourable record of its Chroniclers, by their unshaken constancy and courage: Godfrey of Bouillon, Raymond of Thoulouse, the Papal Legate Adhemar of Puy, Boemond, and Tancred. The fortitude of Godfrey was sustained by the purest strength of a Religious mind; that of the Count and the Bishop might be inspired by the fiercer confidence of fanatical zeal; the vaulting ambition and cupidity of Boemond were unextinguishable save with life; and in the generous soul of Tancred, the love of glory still shone through the darkest adversity with a steady and unflinching light. But the example, the exhortations, and the valorous resolves of these master spirits of their cause, would have proved alike ineffectual to reanimate the hopes and efforts of their desponding confederates and followers, if they had not invoked the all-powerful aid of superstition. When every prospect of earthly succour aided by heroic constancy of some of their leaders, had vanished, it required the belief of a special interposition of Heaven in their behalf to rekindle the expiring fanaticism of the multitude; and the character of the Count of Thoulouse, as well as his share in promoting the popular delusion, may indifferently justify the pre-

The First Crusade.

From A. D. 1095, to A. D. 1099.

The Greek Emperor abandons their relief.

Their consequent despair.

Heroic constancy of some of their leaders.

aided by superstition.

* Robert, p. 56. Fulcher, p. 392. Guibert, p. 512. Willermus Tyr. p. 714.

† Albert, p. 242. and Radulphus, p. 319. give the lowest and highest estimate in the text.

‡ Albert, p. 243. Baldric, p. 112. Guibert, p. 502. VOL. XI.

* Robert, p. 57—59. Albert, p. 248—251. Raymond, p. 163. Baldric, p. 113—117. Guibert, p. 512—517. Willermus Tyr. p. 714—717.

† Robert, p. 60. Albert, p. 253. Baldric, p. 119. Anna Comnena, p. 255—257. Willermus Tyr. p. 716—720.

‡ Albert, p. 253. Guibert, p. 517. Willermus Tyr. p. 720. 41

History. assumption that he was the original mover, or the willing dupe of a pretended revelation.

From In the Provencal division of the Crusaders, was a
A. D. Priest of Marseilles, Peter Barthelemy by name, who 1095. presenting himself before the Council of Princes, declared how St. Andrew had shown him in a vision, that the steel head of the very Lance which had pierced the side of the Crucified Redeemer, might be found buried beneath the High Altar in the Church of St. Peter at Antioch; that the Count of Thoulouse was appointed to bear the sacred weapon against the Infidel enemy; and that its mystic presence in the battle should penetrate the hearts of the Unbelievers, and ensure a complete victory to the People of God. The minds of the Crusaders had been prepared for the reception of this tale, and perhaps the expedient itself had been suggested, by rumours of several previous apparitions of the Saints both to clerical and lay individuals in the army, all leading to the expectation that some visible act of Almighty favour for their deliverance was at hand. If the Count of Thoulouse was not privy to the original imposture, he at least eagerly lent his countenance to its success; the policy or conviction of the other Chiefs gladly accepted the tale; and Raymond himself, with his chaplain and ten select companions, were appointed to search for the sacred relic. Two days of solemn preparation were spent by the whole army in Religious exercises: and early on the third the Princes, attended by the Clergy and lay multitude, went in procession to the Church of St. Peter. The doors were closed against the impatient crowd; and relays of workmen dug until nightfall to the depth of twelve feet under the High Altar, without discovering the promised instrument of victory. But as soon as the increasing darkness favoured the deception, Peter Barthelemy himself descended into the pit, and, after a plausible delay, exclaimed that he had found the precious object of their search. The steel head of a Lance was then brought up from the excavation, and reverently displayed in a web of cloth of gold to the enraptured gaze of the multitude. All previous incredulity was drowned in a general burst of superstitious enthusiasm; and the devout and firm assurance of approaching victory succeeded with wonderful rapidity to the abject despair with which the starving host had previously been overwhelmed.*

Its success. The first measure, by which the leaders of the Crusade showed the sincerity of their renovated hopes, affords a curious picture of fanatical confidence. It was charitably resolved to offer the Infidels one opportunity of escape from the destruction to which they were otherwise doomed, in the alternative of withdrawing altogether from the sacred land of Syria, or declaring their conversion to the Christian Faith. The Ambassador selected to convey these proposals to the camp of Kerboga was Peter the Hermit; and the astonishment, rage, and contempt, which their nature provoked, were if possible increased by the arrogant deportment and language of the fanatic. The ebullition of furious indignation which prompted the reply of the Emir will excite less of our surprise, than the forbearance which enabled a Turkish Barbarian to respect the character of an Ambassador, and to dismiss in safety the bearer of a message so insulting to his pride and Faith. The destance of the Christians was hurled back upon them; and the Hermit was fiercely admonished that there remained for them the choice only between submission to the Law of Mohammed, or servitude and death.*

Renovated spirit of the Crusaders.

On this reply, the Crusaders entertained no further doubt that the vengeance of Heaven had delivered the whole obstinate host of the Infidels into their hands. But the Latin Chieftains, with that admixture of politic wisdom which generally tempered their fanaticism, spared no exertion to excite the Religious ardour, and refresh the physical strength of their followers for the approaching combat. The horses of their cavalry, now reduced from seventy thousand to no more than two hundred in number, were carefully fed on the last remains of their provender; the leaders and soldiery freely shared with each other their last meal; their rusted arms were whetted anew with grim desperation, and the whole army betook themselves to prayer, made confession of their sins, and received the absolution of the Sacrament. Thus nerved in body and mind the host was arrayed, in honour of the Apostolic number, twelve divisions; the dawn of the Festival of St. Peter and St. Paul was chosen for the reopening of the gates of Antioch; and preceded by a body of the Clergy chanting a Psalm, the army issued from the city and formed in order of battle on the plain. It is singular that the Count of Thoulouse, the destined bearer of the Holy Lance, was left within the walls with a detachment of his Provencals to watch the citadel: but his place was supplied by the martial Legate who, in complete armour, bore aloft the sacred weapon at the head of one division, and accompanied its display to the eyes of the whole host with the thrilling exhortation to fight that day as became the chosen champions of Heaven. Of the other eleven divisions one, the vanguard, was led by the Count of Vermandois, as bearer of the Papal standard; one respectively by Godfrey, the two Roberts, Tancred and other Chieftains of renown; and the reserve was intrusted to Boemond.

The distress and consequent weakness of the Christians had been so well known in the Turkish camp, that Kerboga, notwithstanding their late haughty embassy, was lulled into a delusive security that their necessities must compel them to a speedy submission; and he was so little prepared for their assault, that the foremost corps of his army was cut to pieces before the main body could hasten to support it. But as soon as the Turks recovered from their consternation, they fell impetuously upon the advancing line of the Christians; and the brave Sultan of Nice wheeling round his flank, gained the rear of the reserve under Boemond, and began to inflict a bloody vengeance for the rout of Doryleum. Thus enveloped in a cloud of Tartar cavalry, the extrication of the Crusading army from imminent peril is as usual marvellously referred to personal prowess of its Chiefs; and eulogies of their valour supply the place of more intelligible details. In the confused pictures of the Chroniclers, and perhaps in the disorderly tactics of the Age, it is a hopeless attempt to follow the fluctuating tide of battle, or discern the real causes of victory. Yet, with every allowance for stupendous deeds of heroism in the Europeans, and enormous exaggeration in the reported numbers of the Asiatics, for the desperation of one army and the surprise of the other, the astonishing issue of the struggle

* Robert. p. 60—62. Albert. p. 253, 254. Raymond, p. 150, 151. Radulphus, p. 316, 317. Baldric. p. 119. Fulcher. p. 291—293. Guibert, p. 517—520. Willermus Tyr. p. 721.

* Robert. p. 62. Guibert, p. 520. Willermus Tyr. p. 722.

History. can only be explained by the supposition of some gross misconduct or fatal dissension among the Moslem leaders. If we are to believe the narrative of their own Chroniclers, two hundred Latin horsemen, supported by the unwieldy array of dismounted Knights and men at arms, charged, routed, and put to flight the myriads of Turkish cavalry; the pursuit was as sanguinary as the combat had been obstinate; and the whole immense host, which had been permitted for twenty-five days to hold the Crusaders besieged in famine and despair within the walls of Antioch, was suddenly destroyed or dissipated in a single morning. While the victory yet hung in suspense, the fanatical ardour of the Crusaders was assisted by a new accident or stratagem. Several figures of horsemen in bright armour became visible on the adjacent hills; and the Papal Legate pointing them out as the holy Martyrs St. George, St. Maurice, and St. Theodore, bade the army, with a loud voice, behold the promised succour of Heaven. Responsive shouts of "It is the will of God," burst from the Crusading ranks; and the last triumphant charge was inspired by the imaginary presence and aid of these celestial champions.*

The defeat and dispersion of the host of Kerboga was immediately followed by the capitulation of the citadel of Antioch. By the recovered command of the surrounding territory, the Crusaders were enabled for a time to relieve their wants with plentiful supplies of provisions; and the captured horses of the Turks served to mount the cavalry of the victors. The general joy was interrupted only by the obstinate ambition and quarrelsome temper of the Count of Thoulouse; who still prosecuting his rivalry against the stipulated claims of Boemond to the sovereignty of Antioch, availed himself of the absence of that Prince and the duty with which he had been intrusted of watching the citadel, to hoist his own standard on the walls. He was again compelled by the other confederate Chieftains to forego his pretensions; and Boemond was formally installed in his new Principality; but the rankling jealousy of the Provençal continued not the less to disturb the harmony of the common cause, and to embarrass the ulterior operations of the Crusade. In the Council of Princes, discord, desertion, and the selfish pursuit of private interests now succeeded to the unity of purpose, which was originally produced by devotional feelings and had been supported by the pressure of imminent danger. The resentment which the Crusaders cherished towards the Greek Emperor for his failure of succour in their hour of need, was vented in an embassy of remonstrance and reproach; and the Great Count of Vermandois being selected for this mission, took advantage of the opportunity, on his arrival at Constantinople, to escape the further perils and privations of the Crusade, by returning to France.* Baldwin and Boemond were wholly engrossed in securing the establishment and extension of their new States of Edessa and Antioch; the envious ambition of the Count of Thoulouse led him to imitate their example by undertaking the abortive conquest of some Syrian towns; the death of the Papal Legate, Adhemar, shortly deprived the Crusading cause of one of its most popular and zealous supporters, and most skilful and politic counsellors; and even the pious Godfrey himself suffered his ardour for the deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre to be suspended by the temptation of gratifying his troops with the more accessible spoils of adjacent districts.†

The delays thus generated by disunion and diversity of objects among the leaders of the Crusade were not without some plausible pretexts: such as the necessity of repose and refreshing the army after the fatigues and distresses of the siege of Antioch; the difficulty of advancing to Jerusalem through the intervening Desert during the drought of a Syrian Summer; and the prudence of consolidating the dominion which had already been won, that the arduous conquest of the Holy City itself might be the more surely effected. But the losses and calamities which flowed from division and inaction, far outweighed any attendant advantages. Numbers of the bravest Knights and best soldiers were seduced from the general service of the Crusade by the prospect of a profitable establishment in the new Christian States; many gallant lives were consumed in the fruitless or unsuccessful assaults of detached corps upon the Turkish garrisons; and the usual improvidence of the Crusaders occasioned a third famine and consequent pestilence, the combined effects of which were so terrific that no fewer than one hundred thousand persons are declared to have perished.‡

* It is a remarkable proof of the disunion which, in the Chivalric ideas of the Age, attended such an abandonment of the Crusading vow, that both the Counts of Vermandois and Chartres found in their high rank no exemption from contempt and obloquy; and to relieve their fame they were compelled to undertake a second expedition to Palestine, in which, as we shall hereafter observe, they were both slain.

† Albert, p. 260—263. Baldric, p. 122, 123. Fulcher, p. 394, 395. Guibert, p. 525. Willermus Tyr. p. 729—732.

‡ The practices to which the multitude were driven by hunger are almost too horrible for belief; yet the evidence afforded by Chroniclers contemporary with, and many of them eye-witnesses to the circumstances, so unanimously attests the prevalence of cannibalism throughout the First Crusade, as to make it impossible to doubt the fact. This loathsome indulgence of hunger was sometimes associated with that of an aversion almost equally disgusting. We are told that the Turks on the eve of battle were used to swallow their money, and that the human savages into whose hands they fell often ripped open the bodies of the slain, or of murdered captives, to search for gold, and afterwards devoured their flesh. The cannibalism of the Crusaders was not confined to one season of distress, but had become familiar to the rabble of the camp, and reached its height during the third famine of Antioch, when in

The First Crusade.
From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

Calamitous effects of these circumstances

Third famine, attended by pestilence, among the Crusaders.

* Robert, p. 63—66. Albert, p. 254—258. Raymond, p. 154, 155. Baldric, p. 120—122. Fulcher, p. 393—395. Guibert, p. 520—524. Willermus Tyr. p. 723—726.

A belief in the reality of the apparition and aid of the three celestial warriors seems to have been universal among the Crusaders. But their credulity with regard to the discovery of the Holy Lance was less general or lasting. The Archbishops Baldric and William of Tyre, indeed, with several of the other Chroniclers, betray no distrust of the genuineness both of the vision and the relic; but political jealousy overcame the superstition, and sharpened the intellect of some of the Princes and their adherents; and while Raymond des Agiles, the Chaplain of the Count of Thoulouse, is loud in maintaining the authenticity of a miracle of which his Patron was the appointed instrument, Ralph of Caen, in the cynical interest of Tancred and Boemond, boldly exposes the fraud. Fulk of Chartres also evinces more than one suspicion of the imposture. The sequel of its history is curious. After the victory of Antioch, the efforts of the Count of Thoulouse and his Provençals to perpetuate a delusion which conferred a sort of spiritual superiority upon the chosen guardians of the Sacred Lance, provoked the envious rivalry of Boemond and his friends to proclaim their disbelief. The example of their scepticism shook the faith of the whole army; and to maintain the truth of the revelation, Peter Berthelemy, as its original publisher, was rashly induced to appeal to the judgment of Heaven by the fiery ordeal. Two burning piles being prepared with a narrow path between them, the wretched impostor, or fanatic, rushed through the flames, and was so dreadfully burned in his passage that he expired on the next day.

History.

From
A. D.
1095.to
A. D.
1099.Morals of the host.

The ravages of this Plague were assisted by the previous excesses in which the whole host had indulged since the victory of Antioch; and in the pages of their Chroniclers charges of universal intemperance and debauchery are intermingled with the dreadful picture of their distress. Nor can the feeling be condemned as an irrational superstition which ascribed the calamities of the Crusaders to the anger of offended Heaven: for, of all the miseries which they endured throughout the war, the greater portion were only the faithful consequences of their crimes; and the union of fanaticism and profligacy in men who believed themselves the chosen champions of a sacred cause is among the most curious objects of contemplation in the spirit of the times. At the outset of their enterprise, while the sense of pious duty was fresh and uncorrupted, the morals of the Crusaders were comparatively pure; and, during the siege of Nice, the same authorities which are loudest in reproaching the subsequent disorders of the host, bear testimony to the prevalence of virtue and decorum in their camp. The leaders of the war, in general, presented an edifying spectacle of humility and fraternal concord; the obedient soldiery, emulating their example, were sober, chaste, and vigilant; and from the proudest Chieftain to the lowest warrior, all shared alike with undistinguishable zeal and devotion in the labours, privations, watches, and perils of the siege. These sentiments of mutual charity and forbearance did not indeed extend to their common enemies: for their fanaticism was fierce and cruel; and mercy to the Heathen was an article excluded from their mistaken creed. But among themselves they dwelt in Christian brotherhood, and their conduct was such as became warriors who had devoted their lives to the service of God, and patiently expected the crown of Martyrdom which they as firmly believed would be the reward of the slain.* But both the license and the sufferings of the march through Asia Minor first tended to relax the bonds of this voluntary discipline; and the previous self-denial of all ranks degenerated, under the hardening effects of want and danger, into rapacious and selfish brutality. The transition from scarcity to luxurious abundance on the arrival of the army before Antioch; the enervating influence of the Syrian climate; the absence of any unity of command or disciplined restraints over a host composed of various and independent nations; and the temptations offered by a rich and fertile district to the riotous indulgence of every sensual passion; all assisted in producing a general corruption of morals. Among great masses of men, the alliance of misery and vice is proverbial; and the subsequent calamities of famine and pestilence gave a frightful completion to the public iniquity. In the hourly contemplation of death and in the extremity of despair, the multitude, so far from being awed into virtue, became utterly deaf to the voice of Religion and conscience; every divine and human law was disregarded and violated; the Religious exhortations of the Clergy,† and the authority of the Princes

Spectacle of enormous vice and misery.

their desultory attacks upon the Turkish garrisons, they regularly ate the dead bodies of the Infidels, and even of their own slain companions. See Robert. p. 69, 70; Radulphus, p. 315. Baldric, p. 125. and Albert. p. 267, 268: the first three of whom record these brutalities with horror, and the last with indifference.

* See particularly the two Archbishops, Baldric, p. 95. and William of Tyre, p. 667—672, &c.

† As long as Ecclesiastical discipline was preserved by the authority of the Legate Adhemar, whose virtues are extolled by all were equally despised, and the most licentious and enormous crimes were openly perpetrated. The only hold which their spiritual and temporal rulers could exercise over the minds of the multitude was through their gross and extravagant superstition; and if pretended revelations were successfully employed to animate the fanatical courage of the soldiery, or served to excite a transient ebullition of remorse, denunciations of the Heavenly wrath always failed to correct the public depravity, and truth and imposture were equally powerless in effecting any permanent reformation of manners in the Crusading camp.

Amidst all the demoralization of the multitude, no decay of fanatical zeal in pursuing the great ultimate object of the war is justly chargeable upon them. They indeed were ever clamorous against the delays which the caution, the declining ardour, or the private views of their leaders opposed to their impatience. After the first burst of enthusiasm had expended itself in the sieges of Nice and Antioch, the latter, with the exception perhaps of the single-minded Godfrey, the gallant and disinterested Tancred, and a few congenial spirits, evinced no desire to indulge their love of pleasure and rapine, but mutual enmities and personal ambition, than to complete the purpose of the Crusade. But the people discovered and regarded their selfishness with indignation and disgust; and the soldiery and pilgrims who had survived the third famine and pestilence of Antioch, were loud in their demands to be led without further loss of time to the conquest of Jerusalem. The popular discontent at the continued procrastination of the enterprise was shortly displayed in a temper which it was no longer safe to provoke. The ramparts of the City of Marra, which, together with Albara on the Orontes, the Count of Thoulouse had captured and intended to retain, were razed to the ground by his own troops: that the place might not, like the possession of Antioch itself, be rendered an object of contention to the Chiefs, and of delay to the army. Raymond finding his prize untenable, was compelled to yield to the wishes of his Provencal followers, and declared his readiness to lead them to the deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre; the same tardy resolution was embraced by the other Princes; and, not until eight months had expired since the final reduction of Antioch, were the Crusading forces once more concentrated, and put in combined motion towards Jerusalem.‡

Of the immense host, perhaps seven hundred thousand men, which had originally formed the siege of Nice, so enormous had been the losses by the sword

the Chroniclers, and whose death, in the third pestilence of Antioch was lamented by the whole army, the Clergy set an edifying example of pious resignation and morality; but the Archbishop of Tyre acknowledges (p. 763.) that, after the loss of their spiritual chief, their conduct in general relaxed into indifference and dissoluteness, and that they became, with some bright exceptions, as vicious as the people.

* Among other things, a Monk was assured in a vision that the anger of God was specially kindled against the Crusaders, because Paynim women were the partners of their amours; and the far Infidels were accordingly far a time sent away from the camp. The good Adhemar went further on another occasion: he considered that he was procuring an acceptable sacrifice to Heaven by obliging the warriors to separate not only from their paramours but from their wives; and all the women, virtuous as well as vicious, were confined in a remote quarter of the camp. Albert. p. 234. William of Tyre. p. 695.

† Robert. Mon. p. 69, 70. Albert. p. 267, 268. Raymond des Agiers, p. 160—164. Baldric, p. 125, 126. Guibert. p. 525—527. William of Tyre. p. 731—736.

The Crusades
From
A. D.
1095
to
A. D.
1099The
Crusades
From
A. D.
1095
to
A. D.
1099The
Crusades
From
A. D.
1095
to
A. D.
1099

History. and the climate, by famine and pestilence, desertion and conquest, that the total force which advanced from Antioch amounted to only fifteen hundred cavalry and twenty thousand foot soldiers, with about an equal number of unarmed pilgrims and camp followers. But this remnant of the myriads who had assumed the Cross was composed of veteran and devoted warriors, and led by those renowned Chieftains and champions of the Sacred War, whose zeal and constancy had triumphantly surmounted the fiery trials of peril and temptation: Godfrey of Bouillon, the two Roberts of Normandy and of Flanders, Raymond of Thoulouse, and Tancred. Boemond, pleading the cares of his new Principality, did not accompany their march far beyond its confines: but he freely rendered his contributions and support to the success of the common cause; and his confederates, whatever contempt and indignation they might feel at this personal abandonment of his vows, received his excuses and accepted his aid. From Antioch to Jaffa, a distance of about three hundred miles, the Crusaders, for the convenience of supplying their wants from the Italian vessels which traded on the coast, chose their route along the sea-shore. Their advance was easy and unopposed: for the Turkish Emirs of Gabala, Tortosa, Tripoli, Beritus, Tyre, Sidon, Acre, and other intervening places, despairing of successful resistance, either fled from their strong holds, or, deprecating assault by submission, purchased the forbearance of the invaders with large contributions of money and provisions. At Jaffa, turning from the coast, the exulting host struck into the interior country, and directed their march upon Jerusalem itself. With devout and awful curiosity, the rude warriors of Europe now traversed a region filled with places which hourly recalled some sacred association; the Clergy successively directed the Religious attention of their more ignorant brethren to the memorable scenes of Ramula, Bethlehem, and Emmaus; and at length the Holy City burst upon their enraptured gaze. In that glorious sight, the long cherished object, promise, and reward of their hopes, every toil was forgotten, every suffering repaid. The single mighty passion of a host suddenly broke forth in joyful exclamations and embraces; and these first gladness emotions which filled every heart with pious thanksgivings were as quickly succeeded by feelings of deep humiliation and self-abasement. The proud Noble, the fierce Solhier, and the lowly Pilgrim, confessed their common unworthiness even to look upon the scene which had witnessed the sufferings of the Redeemer of Mankind; and the whole armed multitude, as with one impulse, sinking on their knees, prostrated themselves and poured out their tears over the consecrated soil.*

But the deliverance of the Holy City and Sepulchre from Infidel bondage and profanation still remained to be achieved. By the admixture of truth with imposture, the Musulmans themselves had been taught to revere Jerusalem as inferior in sanctity only to Mecca and Medina;† and every motive of Religion, Honour, and Policy, forbade the Khalif of Egypt to yield to the Christians that ancient possession which his arms had recently recovered from the Turks. Finding, therefore, his repeated offers of alliance and peaceful admission into Jerusalem as unarmed pilgrims contemptuously spurned by the haughty warriors of the West, he had prepared for the vigorous defence of the City. No less than forty thousand of the best troops of Egypt, under Istakar, his most distinguished and favourite Lieutenant, were assigned for its regular garrison; and this force was swollen by twenty thousand Musulman citizens and peasantry of the surrounding district, who on the approach of the Christian invaders took refuge within the walls. It was abundantly supplied with provisions; and its ancient fortifications, which increased the natural strength of the site, had been diligently restored or repaired. As Mount Sion was no longer embraced within their circuit, the City, including the hills of Acra, Moria, Bezetha, and Golgotha, presented the form of a parallelogram; but on the Southern and Eastern faces, the craggy precipices equally defied assault and obstructed any sally; and the two remaining sides presented the only accessible points of operation.

Before these fronts the besiegers impatiently pitched their camp. The Count of Thoulouse chose his station from Mount Sion along the Western side; Eustace of Boulogne extended his troops from the conclusion of the Provencal lines towards the North, until he adjoined the quarters of his brother, Duke Godfrey, whose standard was planted on the North-Western angle at the foot of Mount Calvary; and the two Roberts and Tancred continued the blockade from that point to the verge of the Eastern precipices. In the first confidence of their fanatical valour, the Crusaders, fully expecting the miraculous aid of Heaven, rushed, on the fifth morning after the investment, to a furious assault of the walls of Jerusalem, without battering engines, without scaling ladders, without any of the ordinary applications of the besieging art. The astonishing impetuosity of their rash onset, despite of every probability and obstacle, had nearly delivered the City into their hands. Disregarding the superior numbers, the safe position, and the deadly missiles of the garrison, they burst through the barbican, or lower outward gate, and even penetrated to the foot of the main rampart. But here they were arrested, less by any efforts of the panic-stricken Infidels, than by the mere inaccessible height of the bulwarks and the absence of all means of escalade. The Musulmans, perceiving the inability of the assailants to approach them, recovered their courage; hurled down every destructive variety of projectiles on the heads of the exposed and devoted Christians; and finally beat them back with slaughter and confusion to their Camp.

The leaders of the Crusade, awakened from their fanatical delusion by this repulse, now prepared to prosecute the siege by the rules of art. They resolved to construct the usual machines for breaching or over-towering the walls; but the immediate vicinity of Jerusalem afforded no timber sufficiently large for these works; and the surrounding country was explored for materials. It was only at the distance of thirty miles, that, in the grove of Sichem, trees could be found of suitable dimensions; and, under the direction of the indefatigable Tancred, these being felled, were transported by the painful but zealous labour of the soldiery to the camp. Competent artificers were yet wanting, when the fortunate arrival of some Genoese galleys at Jaffa, supplied this deficiency. So general a superiority in mechanical skill had the commercial people of Italy attained over the ignorance of the times, that the whole Latin host were dependent on the fortuitous

The First Crusade.

From A. D. 1195. to A. D. 1099.

Its investment by the Crusaders.

First unsuccessful assault.

More regular prosecution of the siege.

* Robert, p. 71. Albert, p. 269—274. Raymond des Agiles, p. 165—173. Baldric, p. 127—131. Radulphus Cad. p. 317—319. Willelmus Tyr. p. 736—745.

† D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, v. Al Coda, p. 269. Al Coda, or the Holy, was the Arabic designation of Jerusalem.

History.

From
A. D.
1095,
to
A. D.
1099.

Horrid sufferings of the besiegers from thirst.

Preparations for a second assault.

services of these mariners. The crews were landed at Jaffa; an escort of troops was despatched to bring them up from the coast; and as soon as they reached the camp, they undertook the construction of three great movable towers, with proper engines for throwing missiles, undermining the ramparts, and battering or scaling the walls. The army awaited the completion of their labours in anxious suspense: for now again were the sufferings of their former Sieges repeated under a new variety of horror. The country round Jerusalem was destitute of water; the rocky soil yielded few springs; the fountains and reservoirs had been destroyed by the Infidels; and the streams of Siloe and Kedron were dried up by the intense heats of Summer. The besiegers were agonized by thirst; a scanty supply of water could be procured only at a distance of several miles; and the poorer multitude, who could not pay for its transport in gold, were obliged to wander in quest of the springs, at the hazard of being cut off by the fleet Musliman hordes which scoured the whole country. Numbers by abstaining from food endeavoured to lessen the intolerable thirst which consumed them; and so extreme was the distress, that many gasping wretches were fain to lick up the dews of night from the rocks, and to excavate holes in the earth that they might hut press their lips against the moiester soil.*

For forty days, amidst this horrid drought, had the Siege endured, before the readiness of their engines of assault enabled the Crusaders to put a triumphant consummation to their labours. When the lofty movable towers, each of three stories, were completed, two, respectively manned and worked by the troops of Godfrey and Raymond, were slowly moved forward towards the walls. The former leader chose his point of attack where the rampart had least elevation, and the great depth of the ditch had rendered the garrison negligent of its defence. Three days were laboriously consumed in filling up this fosse; and the tower was then successfully rolled over the new level. Meanwhile the Provençals had been less skilful or fortunate: for their tower was repeatedly damaged by the besieged with projectiles and fire. But several approaches were prepared against different fronts of the main ramparts of the place with battering and mining engines; and the eager warriors only awaited the signal of final attack. On the eve of the day appointed for a general assault of the City, the whole host in full armament, and preceded by the Clergy, made a Religious procession round the walls to invoke the Divine aid. Instead of banners, crucifixes were borne aloft at the head of the troops; every instrument of martial music was hushed; and the only sounds to which the army moved were sacred chants of Psalmody. Ascending the Mounts of Olives and of Sion, the Crusaders halted on each of those holy places, and knelt in prayer; and when these solemn rites had elevated the devotional and warlike enthusiasm of the soldiery to the highest pitch of excitement, the spectacle which was presented from the walls still further inflamed their fanatical feelings with a deadly thirst of revenge against the Infidels. The garrison, displaying crucifixes on the ramparts, derided those revered emblems of salvation and covered them with filth; and the Crusaders with shouts of fury vowed to wash out these impious insults in the blood of the perpetrators.

Thus animated by every incentive of natural valour Religious hope, and fanatical vengeance, the Crusading host advanced on the following dawn to the assault of Jerusalem. While showers of arrows and stones from the archers and ballistic engines were directed against the defenders on the ramparts to cover the principal operations, the battering and mining machines and huge movable towers,—all the stages of the latter filled with chosen bodies of Knights and men at arms,—were impelled towards the walls. But the onset was received by the Moslems with a courage guided by skill, and sustained by confidence or despair. From behind the defences, their incessant flights of missiles replied with murderous effect upon the more exposed bodies of the Latin archers; masses of rock were successfully hurled upon the machines of the besiegers; and the dreadful Greek fire was poured in liquid streams against the movable towers. During the day the struggle raged without intermission, and the eve still hung in tremendous suspense. But at even, the slaughter among the Crusaders far exceeded that of the Infidels; the great tower of Count Raymond had been partially burned and disabled; many of the other engines of assault had been destroyed; and the besiegers were reluctantly compelled to desist for the night from further efforts. Yet their heroic spirit was undimmed, their confidence unabated, their labour indefatigable. Though the Provençal tower had been arrested in its advance, that of Duke Godfrey was undamaged, and had been brought into threatening contiguity to the rampart; and on other fronts of attack the walls of the City were shaken, and already imperfectly breached in several places, by the violent strokes of the battering-rams and the more insidious use of the sap. At daylight, the assault and defence were renewed with increased fury; at noon, the desperate conflict was still balanced in appalling indecision; but at the third hour of the evening, the barbarian, having been beaten down, the tower of Godfrey was forced sufficiently near to the inner rampart to enable the iron-nerved Chivalry of Europe to close hand to hand for the mastery with the less vigorous warriors of the East. In that moment so critical for the suspended cause of Christendom and Islam, the spirit and strength of the Musliman defenders of Jerusalem, despite of their superior numbers and securer footing, quailed before the personal prowess of the champions of the Cross. The frail drawbridge of the tower was let down upon the solid rampart; two brothers, Letoldus and Englebert, of Tournay in Flanders, were the first and second of the Crusading warriors who sprang upon the battlements; and Godfrey of Bouillon, himself the third, planted his banner on the walls. His victorious example was followed with irresistible energy; in quick succession the Duke of Normandy, the Count of Flanders, and Tancred, burst through the gate of St. Stephen into the City; and at every breach in the works a passage was impetuously forced by their emulous associates and followers. Meanwhile the Count of Thoulouse, disdaining to enter the place in the train of his more successful confederates, gallantly inspired his Provençals to carry the rampart in their front by escalade; the defenders, appalled by the defeat of their brethren, wavered and fled; and in all quarters the ensigns of the Cross floated over the towers of Jerusalem.

Abandoning all further hope, the fleeing multitude of the Moslems thronged to die under the sacred domes of

* These expressive proofs of the height of the people's sufferings are given by Robert the Monk, p. 73

History. their Mosques. The victors pursued them with a relentless fury, which consigned men, women, and children to indiscriminate slaughter. The passive and unresisting despair with which the helpless and miserable crowds awaited their fate, neither awakened the pity nor satiated the bloody vengeance of their savage destroyers. The outrages which the Infidels had formerly inflicted on the Christian pilgrims, and the insults with which they had recently derided the Cross, were sternly remembered and fearfully avenged; the very sight of the sacred places which they had profaned with their false worship served to heighten the fanatical rage of the conquerors against the fugitives who sought shelter in those edifices; and it was the boast of the Latin Princes, in a public letter which they addressed to the Pope,* that, in the splendid Mosque erected by the Khalif Omar on the site of the Temple of Solomon,† they rode up to their horses' knees in the blood of the Infidels. In that principal sanctuary alone, ten thousand persons were massacred; every minor retreat in the City was explored with equally fierce diligence by the swords of the Crusaders; and the horrid computation of the total carnage on the battlements, throughout the streets, and in the Churches and houses, has been variously extended to an incredible number of both sexes and all ages.‡

These dreadful scenes of fanatical cruelty, from which Reason and Humanity equally revolt, were followed by a sudden transition of passion, as strangely but less painfully characteristic of the times; and the events of the single day on which Jerusalem was stormed forcibly exemplify the unnatural union of those motives of martial achievement, ferocious intolerance, and fervent piety, which produced the Crusade. The mailed warriors who had sworn and accomplished the deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre in arms, hastened, as humble and repentant pilgrims, to complete their vows of adoration, at that hallowed monument of Redemption. Duke Godfrey, after himself staining the example of heroic courage with merciless slaughter, threw aside his reeking sword, washed his bloody hands, exchanged his armour for a white linen tunic, and with bare head and feet repaired in pious humiliation to the Church of the Sepulchre. The same Religious impulse was quickly communicated to his fellow-warriors; the inhuman fanaticism which had so lately steeled their hearts against every softer emotion, was all at once relaxed into a flood of contrite and tearful devotion; and the whole host in turn, discarding their arms and purifying their persons from the signs of recent slaughter, moved in procession to the Hill of Calvary, and in mingled penitence for their sins and thanksgiving for their victory, wept over the tomb of the Saviour of the World. After these Religious exercises, a loose was given to the general joy both of the Latin conquerors, and the native Christians, who had either been retained in the City during the siege, or had gathered in the Crusading quarters. Among the latter was the Patriarch of Jerusalem, who, after seeking a retreat from the Musulman tyranny in Cyprus, had lately arrived in the camp. He instructed his flock to honour, in the person of Peter the Hermit, the faithful missionary whose indignation and piety had been moved by the spectacle of their bondage to the Infidels, and whose holy zeal had roused the Nations of the Western World to undertake their deliverance. The grateful multitudes prostrated themselves before the poor Solitary of Amiens as a revered and chosen servant of God; and if the sincerity of the fanatic, who, to perform this service, had twice traversed Europe and Asia, may be measured by his indefatigable labours in the imaginary cause of Heaven, the spiritual triumph which rewarded his success must have surpassed the most exquisite enjoyment of temporal ambition.*

Among the conscious offences which humbled the souls of the Crusaders in contrition and prayer before the Altar of the Sepulchre, they were so far from numbering their cruelties to the Infidels, that they deemed the late work of slaughter a meritorious offering to the God of Mercies. To every pious and enlightened mind, there can be few subjects of contemplation more offensive and painful than this alliance of a devotion, which though mistaken was sincere, with so ferocious and dark a superstition. Scenes of bloodshed similar to those which had preceded, also followed the interval of worship; and on the morning after the capture of Jerusalem, the Crusaders deliberately renewed the massacre of the Infidel garrison and inhabitants. The Jews of the City were buried alive in their synagogues; the Musulman captives who had been spared by the lassitude, and the fugitives who had eluded the first search of the victors, were now dragged from their prisons and hiding places, and remorselessly butchered. All—even women, children, and infants at the breast—shared the same fate: except a few wretched Musulmans, who owed their escape from the general slaughter, not to the humanity but to the covetousness of the Count of Thoulouse, who rescued them for sale as slaves, and incurred the censure of the army by preferring the indulgence of his avarice to that of his fanaticism. With the rest of the Crusaders, the former passion was only second to their cruelty; and the work of pillage proceeded simultaneously with that of bloodshed. By previous agreement, the rich plunder of the Mosques, which abounded with lamps and vases of gold and silver, was dedicated to the service of the Church and the relief of the poor: but each house became the property of the first warrior who burst its door, and suspended his shield from its walls.†

The Infidel inhabitants of Jerusalem had been extirpated; and the law of conquest supplied a new of the Latin Kingdom. When the victorious soldiery had divided the possession of the Holy City, her streets were cleansed from the horrid pollution of

The First Crusade.
From A. D. 1095. to A. D. 1099.

Second massacre of the Moslems.

of the City.

Foundation of the Latin Kingdom.
OF JERUSALEM.
SALEM.

* Martene, Thesaurus Novus, vol. i. p. 281.

† D'Anville, Diss. sur l'Antiquité de Jérusalem, p. 42—53.

‡ By the Musulman writers (De Guignes, vol. ii. p. 99, and Abulfida, apud Reiske, vol. iii. p. 319.) the numbers massacred are stated as high as seventy or even one hundred thousand souls: but these were traditional estimates long after the event; and the last probably exceeds the amount of the whole population of Jerusalem at the period. William of Tyre, who alone of the Latin Chroniclers attempts a precise enumeration, gives twenty thousand as the number of victims in the first massacre, of whom one half fell in the Mosque of Omar.

* It is singular that, after his reception of this public homage, the name of the Hermit occurs not again in any contemporary or authentic record; and History has altogether forgotten to notice the subsequent fate of the man who had moved the population of Europe from its foundations.

† In the Mosque of Omar, no fewer than seventy massive lamps of gold and silver were found by Tancred, and surrendered to the prescribed uses of Religion and Charity; but not, if we may believe Maimsbury, (p. 443.) before the costliness of the prize had seduced the hero, in a moment of unwonted frailty, to forget the usual purity of his virtue. He attempted to secure the spoils for his private profit: until he was driven, either by the reproaches of his own conscience, or dread of public censure, to make restitution of his booty to the Ecclesiastical Treasury.

History.

From
A. D.
1095. to
A. D.
1099.

recent slaughter by the labour of some Musulman slaves; the Churches and Mosques were delivered up to the Clergy and dedicated afresh, or now first converted to the purposes of Christian worship; and, tenanted by the various population of her martial citizens from every Western Nation, Jerusalem presented the novel aspect of an European settlement. After the occupation of the City, the earliest care of the leaders of the Crusade was given to the duty of securing their conquest. The establishment of a Feudal Kingdom in Palestine was obviously suggested by the familiar example of the same form of polity in the Western Monarchies, and by the necessity of organizing a martial system of tenures for the defence of the Christian State and the protection of the Holy Sepulchre. On the eighth day, therefore, after the capture of the City, the Princely and Noble Chieftains of the Crusading host assembled to confer, by their free voices, the Feudal Sovereignty of Jerusalem, with its future dependencies, upon one of their Body. The accidents of war had diminished the number of those great leaders of the European Chivalry who, by their hereditary rank, the strong array of their retainers, or the influence of personal character, were entitled to aspire to this honour. Boemond and Baldwin were already seated in the Principalities of Antioch and Edessa, and had withdrawn themselves from immediate participation in the crowning glories of the Holy War; the Great Count of Vermandois and the Count of Chartres had, with deeper reproach, altogether deserted the sacred expedition; and although, in Chivalric fame, Tancred was at least their equal, the Princes of Sovereign rank who remained with the army were four only in number: the two Roberts, of Normandy and of Flanders, the Count of Thoulouse, and the Duke of Brabant. Of these Princes, if we may believe our Anglo-Norman Writers, the crown of Jerusalem was offered first to the brave but prodigal son of the Conqueror, and declined by his modest distrust of his own merits, by his less praiseworthy indolence, or by his preference of his European Duchy. If, on the other hand, we credit the Provençal Chroniclers of the Crusade, the same proffer and refusal of the regal dignity must be ascribed to the Count of Thoulouse.* But the tale of Robert's election is entirely discredited by the silence of every immediate Chronicler of the Crusade; and the grasping ambition and selfish cupidity ever displayed by the Count of Thoulouse, both before and after the fall of Jerusalem, are not only incompatible with the disinterestedness imputed to him by his adherents, but are expressly stated by a better authority to have occasioned the rejection of his claims. Between Robert of Flanders and his friend the Duke of Brabant, if there existed any rivalry in pretension, there was at least no equality of merit; and, in opposition to the intrigues of the wily and jealous Provençal, the general voice of the assembly proclaimed Godfrey of Bouillon as the most deserving, both by his prowess and piety, amongst all the Princely Champions of the Cross, to receive the crown of Jerusalem and the guardianship of the Holy Sepulchre. The spirit of Godfrey was too magnanimous to shrink from the perilous and unquiet charge which intrusted to him rather the sword of the Crusader than the sceptre of a Feudal King. He was immediately conducted in solemn procession to the Church of the Sepulchre, and there inaugurated in his new office: but, with the pious humility which distinguished his character, he refused to have a regal diadem placed on his brows in that city, wherein his Saviour had worn a crown of thorns; and modestly declining the name with the decoration of a King, he would accept no prouder title than that of Advocate or Defender of the Tomb of Christ.

But from the election of Godfrey of Bouillon ^{not the less} is dated the foundation of the LATIN KINGDOM OF JERUSALEM. By that event, stability was given to the recent conquests of the Crusaders; and Jerusalem which, after a possession of more than four hundred and fifty years since its surrender to Omar, had been wrested out of the hands of the disciples of Mohammed, was converted into the Capital of a Christian State. After the worthy choice of a Sovereign to defend and govern their conquests, it remained for the Crusaders only to secure their maintenance and extension by regulating the Martial, Civil, and Ecclesiastical Institutions of the new Kingdom. The Religious zeal and the prudential policy of the conquerors were yet to be exercised in providing for its defence: but their vows were already accomplished; and the great design of the FIRST CRUSADE had been concluded in the triumphant recovery of the Holy Sepulchre.

* The title of Advocate or Defender of a Church or Monastery was familiar to the Age of Godfrey; when, under that term, it was customary for Ecclesiastical Bodies to purchase the protection of some Prince or powerful Noble. But see Du Cange, v. Advocatus.

† Robertus Mon. p. 74—77. Albertus Aqueensis, p. 275—289. Baldricus Arch. p. 132—134. Raymond des Agiles, p. 175—178. Radulphus Cad. p. 320—324. Fulcherius. Carnot. p. 396—400. Guibert, p. 533—537. Willermus Tyr. p. 746—763, &c.

These references embrace the original authorities for all the details given in the text of the siege and capture of Jerusalem. But, throughout the above narrative, the present compilation is also largely indebted to the labours of our modern English Historians of the same events: to the LVIIIth Chapter of Gibbon, which, though not exempt from some errors of fact and more oblique of sentiment, offers a masterly sketch of the spirit and transaction of the First Crusade; and to the more recent and ample Work of Mr. Mills, who (History of the Crusades, vol. i. c. 1—5.) has industriously exhausted the stores of the Latin Chroniclers, and executed his design with equal truth and ability.

* Raymond des Agiles, p. 179. Albert. Aqueensis, p. 283. Guibert, p. 537.

† Willermus Tyr. p. 763.

HISTORY

CHAPTER LXXIII.

ANNALS OF FRANCE, GERMANY, AND ITALY, DURING THE XIIIth CENTURY.

FROM A. D. 1108 TO A. D. 1199.

I. THE honourable title of l'Éveillé which Louis VI. had acquired by his activity in his Father's lifetime continued to be merited by him during a long and troublous reign, even after unwieldiness of body had affixed to his name another epithet, le Gros, by which he is better known to posterity.* In order to frustrate the persevering intrigues of his step-mother Bertrade, who still coveted the throne of France for one of her adulterous progeny,† he hastened the ceremony of his Coronation; which was performed five days after the decease of his Father, not according to custom at Rheims, the Archbishopric of which See was then under dispute, but in the Cathedral of Orleans;‡ his dominions were of narrow extent; they comprehended no more than the five Cities of Paris, Orleans, Etampes, Melun, and Compiègne; which with a few less considerable towns supplied the whole of his revenue. The remainder of France, and much of the Country intervening between these strong holds of Royalty, was occupied by nominal vassals; professing homage indeed to their superior Lord, but defying him at will in their Castles. Far more powerful than their Sovereign, many of them were habitually in revolt, exercised despotic power over their own Fiefs, and levied tribute and troops, which they employed in every service but that of their Feudal Master. Exclusive of the great Counts who bordered France in Champagne, in Flanders, in Anjou, and in Touraine, we read of numerous petty Barons in the heart of that Country, who singly or in alliance long employed the sword of the King. The little Castle of Puiset alone, which interrupted his free communication with Orleans, resisted the utmost force which Louis could command during three entire years; and the general temper of the Nobles may be described in the speech with which Eudes, son of Bouchard de Montmorency, darted from his Wife, to take the field against his Sovereign. "Countess, give your Count his sword; he who receives it from you as a Count will this day return it to you as a King." The boast indeed was idle, and Eudes perished on the very day on which it was uttered; but it is sufficient to illustrate the confident spirit with which Louis was defied.

In most of these conflicts with his subjects, Louis during the first two years after his accession was successful; but a more powerful foe than he had yet encountered was in preparation. When Henry I. of England wrested Normandy from his brother Robert, and immured him in the tower of Cardiff, by a singular oversight, he permitted his son, William (Cliton or Court-cuisse as he was named) to remain at liberty. Soon perceiving his mistake, and finding that the claims of the boy might be mischievously espoused by his own rivals in power, he sent orders for his transport to England. The Governor to whose care the education of the young Prince had been committed, found means however of escape to France, and threw him on the protection of Louis. This step naturally occasioned mutual suspicion between the Kings, and each party thenceforward sought to strengthen himself by alliances for the struggle which sooner or later would probably ensue. With this view, the King of England bestowed the hand of his daughter Matilda upon the Emperor Henry V.; but this very act which secured him the aid of a powerful distant friend, alienated from him one more important, because nearer the future scene of contest. Robert Count of Flanders, in return for a subsidy which enabled him to join the adventurers to the Holy Land, had for many years past enrolled himself as a Vassal of Henry; since his return from the Crusades he had been incessantly involved in war with the Emperor; and no sooner, therefore, did he receive intelligence of this Treaty of marriage with England, than he abandoned his alliance with Henry, and proffered himself to Louis.

Foulques V. of Anjou, who had recently succeeded his infamous Father, Foulques le Réchin, alarmed by numerous demonstrations of Henry's ambition, had likewise closely connected himself with France; and Louis, seconded by these powerful associates, was well prepared to meet that conflict with Normandy to which singly he must have proved altogether unequal. The immediate and ostensible cause of hostilities was the refusal of Henry to fulfil a Treaty by which he had bound himself to demolish the border fortress of Gisors; and Louis and the Count of Flanders joining their forces marched to its investment. The King of France proposed a single combat to his adversary; and some France.

From

A. D.

1108.

to

A. D.

1199.

Causes of hostility with Henry I. of England.

A. D.

1109.

introduction of the allies.

* William of Malmesbury contemptuously styles Louis VI. homoem apudiculi pondere alim lectum forentem, sed nunc pro disimulatione aut nimis auro oneratum. v. 18. Henry of Huntingdon writes with equal bitterness. *Quid de Philippe Rege Francorum, et Lodovico filio qui tempore nostris regnavit, quorum Deus venter fuit, immo sanctus hostis fuit? Adco corruerunt ut impio pinguedine amitterent, nec sustinere se possent. Philippus alim pinguedine defunctus est. Lodovicus adhuc juvenis pinguedine tamen jam mortuus est. Epist. de contemptu. Mundi ap. Recueil des Historiens des Gaules, xiv. 265. Louis VI. was also termed Thubaut and le Batailleur.*

† L'Art de vérifier les Dates, i. 573.

‡ Id. Ibid. 573.

§ Suger, Filia Lud. Grossi, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 37.

VOL. XI.

War in Normandy. A. D. 1110.

History. light gallants of the Camp, with no small failure of respect to their Sovereigns, named as the most fitting lists a shattered bridge on the river Epte, which at every moment was threatened by the stream with entire destruction.* The King of England replied that the stakes were manifestly too advantageous to his enemy. For himself, the Castle was already in his possession, and he could not therefore win any thing even if he should conquer; his rival on the contrary, if successful, would add substantial gain to his glory. A war of little interest and various fortune succeeded; in its progress Louis was deprived of his most faithful ally the Count of Flanders, who was killed by a fall from his horse; and deserted by Fouques of Anjou, for whom had been spread the glittering snare of an intermarriage between his daughter and William, her apparent of England. Thibaud, Count of Meaux, Blois, and Chartres, a nephew of Henry, was devoted to his interests; Baldwin the new Count of Flanders was yet in extreme youth, and fully occupied in his own dominions; the remoter Vassals of the French Crown remained neutral and unconcerned spectators; and many of the petty retainers in the County of Paris were in open revolt. Thus straitened, Louis consented to a disadvantageous Peace, the chief provisions of which were the abandonment of Maine and Brittany.

Louis compelled to a disadvantageous Peace.

A. D.
1114.
Renewal of war.

A. D.
1117.

Fouques of Anjou Grand Seneschal of France.

It was not likely that a Treaty thus unequal would be observed by the losing party whenever he felt sufficiently strong to venture upon its infraction; and accordingly within three years hostilities recommenced. The Count of Flanders promised his aid; Fouques of Anjou was disgusted with Henry by a breach of faith respecting the promised marriage; the Norman Barons for the most part were discontented, and readily listened to the King of France when he offered to restore their legitimate Prince, William Cliton, now sufficiently old for the active cares of Government. In the first campaign, Louis invaded Normandy; but found it so well guarded that he passed but a single night within the hostile territory, and retired without offering battle. The cooperation, instead of the neutrality of Fouques was now most important to him; and it was purchased by a grant replete with the spirit of Feudalism. The Counts of Anjou claimed the high dignity of Grand Seneschal of France as hereditarily attached to their Fief from the time of Lothaire. By their own neglect, or by opposition to the Crown, the chief functions of that office, which were to place the dishes on the Royal Table on days of ceremony, had long been administered by other hands. A compromise however was effected; William de Garlanda, the executive officer, consented to pay homage as Deputy Seneschal to Fouques his Chief; and the Count of Anjou, Sovereign of a Principality scarcely inferior in extent to the Kingdom which Louis himself governed, obtained the high favour of being numbered among the principal household servants of the King of France, and engaged in return to assist him in attacking Normandy.†

* Suger, Vita Lud. Grossi, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 29.

† Du Cange, ad v. Seneschal has collected an infinity of lore respecting the Great Seneschal of France. Hugues de Cleris, one of the chief retainers of Fouques, and employed by him in this negotiation, has left an account of it, (De Majoratu et Seneschatu Francie, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 495.) from which we learn many particulars of the etiquette of French Royalty in the XIIIth Century. Whenever the Grand Seneschal came to Court, the King's Marshals were bound to provide him convenient lodging. The

The campaign opened with the loss of an advanced post on either side; Henry surprised the Castle of Sainte Claire, Louis mastered the Convent of Saint Ouen by stratagem. The few soldiers whom he headed were disguised as Monks, and no sooner had they presented themselves at the gates under that holy garb, than they were unhesitatingly opened; nor did the inmates discover their mistake till the King bared his sword from under his frock. The garrison with which he continued to occupy these walls was of material use in harassing Normandy.* The Count of Flanders, on the other hand, ravaged the North of that Duchy; till his rash ardour exposed him to a dangerous wound, which carelessness and intemperance rendered mortal. The savage and unnatural spirit of the times, or at least of some of the chief actors in them, was forcibly exhibited by the incidents of the year following. Henry had given the hand of an illegitimate daughter, Juliana, to Eustache of Breteuil; and the Count, profligate by the embarrassments of his Father-in-law, endeavoured to obtain from him a grant of the Castle of Ivry, a former possession of his Family. The King of England refused the demand; but in order to convince Eustache that the fortress was not retained with any evil intention, he placed in his hands the Governor's son as a hostage; and in return received two daughters of Eustache by Juliana. Eustache, fondly believing that no breach of faith which he might commit would be visited upon his innocent children by their grandfather, summoned the Governor of Ivry to surrender, and on his refusal tore out the eyes of his hostage, and dismissed him to his unhappy parent. The Governor demanded vengeance from Henry, and was permitted to exercise similar brutal

From
From
A. D.
1108
to
A. D.
1109. to
A. D.
1115.
Eustache of Breteuil.
A. D.
1118.

Seneschal (his Deputy) was to precede him to his apartment, announce his arrival to the King, conduct him to the Palace, and re-conduct him to his hotel. Whenever the King, wearing his Crown and in full state, dined in public, the Grand Seneschal sat on a chair covered with rich tapestry till the first course was served; then rising and taking off his robes, (se defabulans), he received the dishes from the Seneschal, and placed them before the King and Queen. The same he did also with the remaining courses. After the dinner was ended, the Grand Seneschal, attended by the Seneschal, rode home on a war-horse, which he presented to the King's Cook as his fee. His robes were the fee of the King's Steward. The Cook and Panier in return respectively brought him, the former a dish of meat and a draught of wine, the latter two loaves and a pat of wine, which the Seneschal distributed among the Lepers. Whenever the Grand Seneschal was in attendance with the King's army, the Seneschal was to furnish him with a pavilion capable of entertaining one hundred persons, to provide him with beasts of burden for his carriage, robes and pegs, a horseman and two footmen. If the Grand Seneschal pleased, he might, at the end of the campaign, give this pavilion to the Seneschal, but even if he retained it, he was not by so doing to bar his right to a new one in the campaign following. If the King advanced, the Grand Seneschal commanded the van, if he retreated the rear; and whatever might occur he was not to be visited with any reproach from the Royal mouth. Whatever judgement the Grand Seneschal should pronounce in France was to be irrevocable and without appeal. On the contrary, if a sentence of the French Judges were disputed, an appeal lay to the Grand Seneschal. If he could not obey the King's summons and decide in person, the documents on either side were to be forwarded to him, and his determination was to be final. Hugh de Cleris adds, that he has witnessed the Grand Seneschal's administration of every one of these rights. It can be no matter of surprise, therefore, that Fouques was desirous of so important an office. When the coronation of the House of Anjou with Richard transferred the Grand Seneschalship to the Royal line of the latter Country, Robertus de Monte states that on the Feast of the Purification, in 1169, Henry, son of the King of England, performed the duties of the office at the Royal table in Paris.

* Ordericus Vitalis, xi. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 711.

† Worse than similar, for the Governor mutilated the History.

From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.

reprisals on the daughters of the Count of Breteuil. When Enstache, on this outrage, had recourse to open hostilities, the inhabitants of his Capital opened their gates to Henry, and Juliana, who was in the town at the moment, scarcely succeeded in throwing herself into the citadel. Henry closely invested that fortress; and when her provisions began to fail, Juliana sought to capitulate, invited her Father to a parley, and treacherously attempted his assassination. The King in revenge destroyed the bridge which connected the castle with the town; and when he granted terms they were cruel, unmanly, and dishonourable. The Father refused his own daughter any other mode of exit than such as she could provide by lowering herself with her hands from the walls; and this indecorous and ignominious exposure took place amid the rude jests and licentious mockery of the besieging army. It was in the depth of winter, the ditch into which she dropped was filled to the brim with water, and shivering with cold and overwhelmed with shame and terror, she at length gained its outer brink.*

The nuptials of William, eldest son of the King of England, with Matilda, daughter of the Count of Anjou, were at length completed, and Foulques resumed his former engagements with Henry. Deprived of both his allies, Louis still continued an active and incessant warfare of pillage and incursions; and unable from want of sufficient numbers to perform the part of a skilful General, he enacted the full that of a brave and adventurous Knight. It was on the twentieth of August that the two Kings unexpectedly found themselves in each other's presence in the plain of Brenneville near Noyon. Henry's force amounted to no more than five hundred horse. Louis had about one hundred less. At the first charge, the English gave way, and Henry himself was wounded by a Knight named William Crispin. So forcible were the two blows which the Frenchman struck upon the King's helmet, that, although it was of good proof and impenetrable, blood flowed from his head. Henry in return, with a single stroke overthrew both horse and man, who were taken prisoners at his feet.† Then rallying the English, he succeeded in capturing eighty Norman Knights, the followers of William Cliton, whose horses had been killed under them. The second charge of the French was wholly unsuccessful, and as they were put to the rout, an English soldier caught the bridle of Louis, and shouted, "The King is taken!" "You are a bad gamester, my friend," answered Louis, "do you not know that at Chess the King is never taken?" and with the words he dealt a blow which struck the fancied captor lifeless from his saddle. Then clapping spurs to his horse, he galloped into an adjoining wood, in which he wandered for some hours, till the guidance of a peasant, ignorant of his person, placed him in security at Andely. The chief loss of the French was in prisoners, of whom one hundred and forty were taken; for so surely fenced were the Knights by their complete armour, that three only, both sides included, were killed in the battle. Henry made a generous use of his victory; he released many of his prisoners; sent back to Louis his Royal standard which had been captured;‡ and permitted his son William to restore his horse and arms to his Cousin of Normandy.

The quarrel between the Emperor Henry V. and the Holy See, of which we shall have occasion to speak elsewhere, was now at its height, and Calixtus II., unable to dispute the possession of Rome with the Antipope Gregory VIII., whom Henry had elected, found refuge in France, and assembled a Council at Rheims. Louis, smarting under his recent defeat, appealed to this Council for protection, and on the representations of the Pope, Henry consented to Peace. The conditions are unknown to us; but it is plain that they involved an abandonment of the claims of William Cliton on Normandy, since Louis received homage from William the Prince of England on investiture with that Fief.

The loss of his only son, that grievous calamity which embittered the remainder of Henry's days, immediately followed this Peace; and the Normans, emboldened by the uncertainty of the English succession, and by secret promises of assistance from France, proclaimed William Cliton their Duke, before three years had elapsed from the close of the late war. It seems probable that Henry I. destined the Crowns both of England and of Normandy for his daughter Matilda, Empress of Henry V.; and if this prospective increase of German power occasioned jealousy in France, it was a still more powerful motive for the union of the Imperial arms with those of England. The Emperor's pretext for hostility was the non-interference of the French King to prevent an excommunication which had been launched against him at the Council of Rheims; and burning to revenge that affront, he raised a powerful army for the invasion of Champagne. The forces with which Louis opposed him have no doubt been greatly exaggerated by the contemporary Historian of his reign; but it is plain from the result of the campaign that his levies were formidable, and that the French, esteeming the present war to be directed not personally against their King, but generally against themselves and their Country, placed at his disposal a much larger body of men than any former Monarch of his Race had commanded. Suger, Abbot of St. Denis, the Biographer and one of the chief Ministers of Louis, headed the Vassals of his Church, and presented to the King before the High Altar the Oriflamme, or sacred banner, which then for the first time accompanied the French armies to battle.† In the gathering at Rheims,

France.
From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.

Peace mediated by Pope Calixtus II. October.

A. D. 1124. Invasion of Champagne by the Emperor Henry V.

The Oriflamme.

as well as tore out the eyes of these wretched and unoffending children.

* A castello liberam nallatenis exitum adipisci potuit. Regio nempe junci coacta, una ponte et sustentamento de sublimi ruit, et nudus natus usque in profundum fossati cum ignominia descendit . . . dum fossa castelli brumalibus aquis plena retinebatur, et unda nimio gelu contracta tenera curia lapsa mulieris ingens frigus jure subministravit. (Ordericus Vitalis, xii. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 717.) M. de Sismondi, in his adaptation of the above passage, is not borne out by it when he says, elle se fit dévaler avec des cordes du haut des murs. She plainly was to get down sans sustentement, as fossa and ruit continue to imply; and we trust, in order to relieve Henry from additional obloquy, that nudus natus may be considered as the result of accident, rather than that il exigis, qu'après avoir relevé ses habits au-dessus de la ceinture, &c.

† Henricus Huntindoniensis, vii. ad ann. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 35. The fact is mentioned with some variation by Ordericus Vitalis, xii. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 722.

‡ Vol. II. 14. Her authority for the anecdote is not given. The authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates, i. 573. relate the story on the faith of une ancienne Chronique; and Mezeray says that a medal was struck to commemorate the event, bearing the Virgilian motto, Nec capti petere capi.

* Ordericus Vitalis, whose account of this Battle is very detailed, states that Henry kept the King's standard, but returned his horse. Hist. Eccl. xii. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 723.

† The Oriflamme was a square gonfalon of flame-coloured silk, with its lower part cut into three swallow-tails, without any banner, (although in a vignette representing the scene described in the text, prefixed to vol. xii. of the Nouvelles Histories des Gaules, is

History.

From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.

Peace.

Marriage of the Empress Matilda with Geoff-frey Plantagenet.

A. D.
1127.
Association of Philip,
A. D.
1129.
of Louis.
A. D.
1131.

says this inflated and grandiloquent Writer, so great was the number of warriors that they seemed to devour the surface of the earth, as if they had been locusts; and he raises his estimate to the incredible amount of between four and five hundred thousand combatants.* The hostile armies, whatever might be their true force, never came within sight of each other. The Emperor retired; the King of England addressed himself to the reduction of Normandy; a Peace, with the conditions of which we are unacquainted, terminated the quarrel without an engagement; and the death of Henry V. in the following year, and the consequent extinction of the House of Franconis, relieved France from all apprehension of any undue aggrandizement of the Empire, by the testamentary disposition of the King of England. The widowed Empress Matilda was reluctantly compelled by her Father to renew the marriage contract with Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of Foulques of Anjou; and thus at the expense of her domestic happiness to give to England some of the most illustrious of her future Princes.

Louis not less anxious than his rival to secure the succession to his Kingdom in his own line, and mistrusting his health, now greatly affected by excess of corpulence, proceeded to the association of his eldest son Philip. That Prince was unhappily killed by a fall from his horse two years afterwards,† and Louis his next brother was substituted in his place. The Sacre was celebrated with unusual magnificence, and the Youth was anointed and crowned by the hands of Innocent II. himself. The death of William Cliton, wounded in a petty skirmish in 1128; removed the is represented paruree with fleur de lis.) fringed with green silk, and suspended from a golden lance. Guelmus Brito has accurately described this standard:—

*At Regi autis est tenues crispare per aurum Furillum simplex, crenato amplexu textum.
Splendoris rubri, Lethæus quilibet uti
Ecce nana solet certis ex more diribus:
Quod cum Flamma habet vulgariter Aurea nomen,
Omnibus in bellis habet omnia signa præire;
Quod Regi præstare solet Dionysius Abbas, Ad bellum quousque emptis proficiscitur armis.*

Philippus, xi. 32.

De Cange (ad v. Auriflamma) prefers Flammula, or Flammulam, a word used by writers of the Middle Ages for any banner. Tradition assigned to it a divine origin, and it was commonly said to have been brought from Heaven either to Clovis or Charlemagne. It was, in truth, no other than the peculiar banner of the Monastery of St. Denis, carried in its Religious processions and private Wars, and borne by the Counts of Vexin, Fiducia and Amonia of the Abbey. Philip I. having united that County to the Crown, became seized of all its rights; and his warlike son therefore adopted the custom by which the Oryflamme was reserved from the Abbot, before the Altar, at which the King knelt, uncovered and unbelted. The Oryflamme was not used in the Wars of Charles VII. because the English were in possession of St. Denis; and the victories which were then obtained without its presence greatly diminished the reverence once paid to it. Felibien states, that after the entry of Henry IV. into Paris, in 1594, it was found in the Treasury of the Abbey covered with dust and half-moth-eaten.

* M. de Sismondi, perhaps inclining to the opposite extreme, diminishes them to twenty or twenty-five thousand. v. 177.

† This misfortune was asserted by the Ecclesiastics to be a judgment upon the King for a quarrel which he had dared to maintain with some of his Bishops, and was predicted to him by St. Bernard. (Acta Sanctorum, ap. Hist. des Gaulles, xiv. 374.) Philip's horse, frightened by a hog which ran between its legs in the suburbs of Paris, and rearing up, threw and rolled over the Prince, so much to his injury that he died in a few hours afterwards. Suger describes Philip as frigidus et ætenuus puer, honorum spes timorque matorum; and says that his horse was obtus porco diabolico effrenus. Ap. Hist. des Gaulles, xii. 58.

‡ William received his death-wound in an engagement with great pretext for dissension between France and England; and when Henry I. sank into the grave, in 1135, the cruel struggles which ensued both in his Insular and Continental dominions, strengthened the power of Louis by ensuring him repose. But a far more important acquisition than his fondest hopes could ever have contemplated awaited him by the marriage of his son. The Duke of Aquitaine, afflicted by family misfortunes and debilitated by sensual indulgences, viewed both his infirmities and his sorrows as so many chastisements from Heaven; and anxious to propitiate the Divine wrath, resolved upon a pilgrimage to Compostella. His feebleness permitted little hope of return from so arduous a journey, and before his departure, he offered the hand of his eldest daughter Eleanor to the Heir of the Crown of France. The dower of the Bride was to be the territory of Poitiers and Aquitaine, domains far surpassing in extent those which the young Louis (le Jeune) would inherit. But the policy of the Duke of Aquitaine perceived in the future Monarch of France a husband who would protect his daughter's rights; and his ambition coveted for her brows the Crown of a Kingdom rather than that of a Duchy. Scarcely had the young Prince entered the dominions which he was about to acquire before he received intelligence of the death of his intended Father-in-law; and while on his return after the celebration of his nuptials, that of his Father also called him to a second throne.

Few, if any, of the French Kings whom we have hitherto recorded, deserved, or obtained a greater portion of the love of their subjects than Louis le Gros. In the field, he was ever active and intrepid; in his Civil Government mild, just, and vigilant. The paring words with which he dismissed his Son when he set out to receive the hand of the Heiress of Aquitaine, deserve a record in gold: "Bear in mind that Crowns are bestowed upon us for the benefit of our People; and that He who dispenses them will demand a rigid account of their administration."* In policy, or rather in the craftiness of negotiation, he was inferior to Henry I., and thus frequently became the victim of that most astute Prince's tortuous diplomacy. But France derived inestimable advantages from his reign, by the repression of the tyranny of the Feudal Lords, to which in time of foreign Peace his views were invariably addressed; by the grant of chartered rights to many of the chief towns in which he shared a divided Signorage; and by the encouragement thus afforded to similar institutions in the Fiefs of his Vassals.† Hence the Tiers état, in pro-

Thierry of Alsace, his competitor for the Earldom of Flanders; the succession to which Fief was vacant by the assassination of its recent Lord, Charles the Good. The King of France supported the claim of the Norman Prince, after having punished the assassin with unparalleled barbarity. One of them was fastened to a wheel, his head and face exposed to birds of prey, and the lower parts of his body transfixed with spears and arrows; a second was suspended alive from a gibbet, with a ferocious dog chained close to his face, and beaten till it flew at him; the remainder, twenty-eight in number, were thrown headlong from a lofty tower. Suger, 55. ut sup. Galbertus, Vita Caroli Boni, id. xiii. 376.

* Velly, ii. 31.

† M. de Sismondi has successfully established the falsehood of the common opinion that Louis le Gros was the founder of Communes throughout France; since in the territories of his Vassals he possessed neither right nor power to grant Charters. They were instituted by the Vassals themselves. It is very possible, also, as the same Historian argues, that the object of Louis was far more to increase the power of the Crown by depressing the Barons, than to promote the enfranchisement of his People. But speculation is History.

From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.
Vise early slavery of Louis VII.

gress of time, insensibly attained a deliberative voice, and reared its head in the Assemblies of the Three Estates, on a par with the Nobles and Ecclesiastics.

Louis VII. on the death of his Father was scarcely more than eighteen years of age; yet notwithstanding his youth, so quiet and undisputed was his accession, that he thought it unnecessary to confirm it by celebrating a second coronation. He was the first of his race who had ventured to deviate from that established custom; and that he felt secure in declining it, affords strong evidence that the Royal authority had been largely increased under his Father's sagacious Government. A similar wise course was in the outset pursued by the Son; and if the remainder of the long reign of Louis le Jeune had resembled its first eight years, or if his life had terminated at their conclusion, he would have claimed a station of just repute in the Annals of France. Both in that Country and in Aquitaine he resolutely maintained his sovereignty against the encroachments of his restless Vassals; and even the usurpations of the Holy See, resistance to which demanded greater moral courage, were met by him with fearlessness and constancy. His refusal to sanction some Episcopal appointment made by Innocent II., without regard to the Royal authority, brought down upon him a Bull of Excommunication; and the several Cities in which his Court resided were laid under the privations of an Interdict. For more than three years, the King disregarded these anathemas; and if in the end he bowed to the decrees of the Church, his submission was far less the produce of a conviction of its paramount rights, than of a wounded conscience which sought relief from the only font of healing discovered by the darkness of his times. In a feud with one of his most puissant, and therefore most turbulent Nobles, Thibaud, Count of Champagne and Blois, Louis attacked and captured the strong Castle of Vitry; and willing to prevent the re-occupation by an enemy of a post so advantageous, he set fire to his prize. The flames spread widely beyond its walls; and the principal Church of the adjoining town, into which thirteen hundred of the inhabitants, of every sex and age, had sought asylum, was involved in the conflagration, and burned to ashes before any of the miserable victims whom it contained could find escape. The King, a spectator of this sad calamity, of which he had most unintentionally been the author, abandoned himself to the bitterest remorse; and employed the mediation of the two most distinguished Ecclesiastics in his dominions, Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, and Pierre-le-vénérable of Clugny,* to procure remission of the Papal

Journal with Pope Innocent II.

burning of Vitry.
A. D.
1143.

remise of 1118.

motives are endless; and it cannot be denied that the results of the policy of Louis, from whatever cause that policy arose, very greatly contributed to the relief, the freedom, and the consequent happiness of the large and degraded majority of his subjects.

* Pierre-le-vénérable, like the Monk of Jarrow, who bore the same distinguished epithet, was no small lover of the marvellous. He is cited by Nicolas Gilles (Chron. ad ann. 1120.) as evidence for an astounding event which occurred during the reign of Louis le Gros. A certain Count of Mayen had rendered himself infamous by the commission of every crime which can disgrace human nature, and among them was the frequent pillage of Churches and Religious Houses. Heaven at length weary of his atrocities, most fearfully chastised them. While he was revelling one day in the Hall of his Castle, surrounded by a numerous train of Knights and retainers, in the middle of the Banquet, a black man of gigantic stature mounted on a black horse, forced his way through the gates and guards, and riding up the centre of the Hall to the great terror of the company, commanded the Baron to follow him. The wretched man, as if constrained by some invisible power, and feeling that resistance would be useless, rose at the first word, and descended with trembling steps to the Castle gates, where another horse fully caparisoned awaited him. No sooner had he mounted, than his greasy visitor, seizing the reins, raised both himself and his companion in the air. The whole town ran out to see the wonder, and long as their eyes could distinguish, the pair continued riding and ascending upwards, while the cries of "Save me, friends, save me!" died faintly and more faintly on the ear. They at length disappeared, "and every one returned to his own home overcome with terror, and convinced in his heart that the God of vengeance will punish without pity all such as dare to violate the property of the Church."

The zealous, ardent, and energetic spirit of St. Bernard had hitherto directed its great natural powers and extensive acquisitions (the latter more than commensurate with the knowledge of his Age) to barren and perplexed questions of School Divinity. A long controversy on abstruse, and for the most part unintelligible speculations regarding the Trinity,* which he maintained with Peter Abelard, whose genius was in all points worthy of his rivalry, after an ineffectual reference to a Council, and even an appeal to the Pope, was adjusted only by mutual compromise. But a far wider theatre was now opening for the display of Bernard's great intellectual influence; and the fervid and impassioned eloquence of an individual, actuated by motives which, even if mistaken, claim our admiration from their piety and their purity, was once again to roll the tide of Christian war upon the shores of Syria. It is for another place that we reserve our narrative of the causes and events of the 11d Crusade; and we shall here confine ourselves to the exertions of St. Bernard and the preparations of France. No sooner was a Holy War proposed than Louis VII. ardently devoted himself to the enterprise. Still in the flower of youth, personally brave, hitherto successful, it can little surprise us that he contemplated with intense delight the new field of glory and chivalrous adventure which opened to him in the East. Numerous motives cooperated to strengthen his desire. His imagination was kindled by reports of the sufferings of the Christians and the oppression of the Infidels; he called to mind that his elder brother Philip, before the accident which deprived him of life, had bound himself by a vow to serve in Palestine; and as the inheritor of that brother's Crown, he felt that he inherited his vow also. The horrible calamity at Vitry was ever present to his memory, and to this remembrance was added compunction for his long resistance of the Papal Interdict; offences for which the assumption of the Cross seemed the only atonement. Thus resolved, he convoked a general Assembly of the French Nobles, a Parliament as it was styled in the summonses, to meet at Vezelay in Nevers, during the ensuing Easter; and neither the Abbey of that town, nor its Public Square, could contain the huge multitudes which thronged together at the appointed season. Overflowing even the suburbs, the

France.
From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.

St. Bernard preaches

the 11d Crusade.
A. D.
1143.

Parliament of Vezelay.

man, as if constrained by some invisible power, and feeling that resistance would be useless, rose at the first word, and descended with trembling steps to the Castle gates, where another horse fully caparisoned awaited him. No sooner had he mounted, than his greasy visitor, seizing the reins, raised both himself and his companion in the air. The whole town ran out to see the wonder, and long as their eyes could distinguish, the pair continued riding and ascending upwards, while the cries of "Save me, friends, save me!" died faintly and more faintly on the ear. They at length disappeared, "and every one returned to his own home overcome with terror, and convinced in his heart that the God of vengeance will punish without pity all such as dare to violate the property of the Church."

* Yet it was a desire to bring to the level of Reason that which Reason is inadequate to comprehend, which embarked Abelard in this very dispute on the Trinity. His scholars were not content simply to be taught;—Humanas Rationes requirebant, et plus quam intelligi quam quæ dici possent efflagitabant; dicentes quidem Verborum superfluum esse prolationem quam intelligentia non sequeretur, nec credi posse aliquid nisi primis intellectum; et ridiculum esse aliquem alius prædicare, quod nec ipse nec illi quos doceret intellectus capere possent. (P. Abelardi, Opera, p. 20.)

History. eager devotees adjourned to a neighbouring hill,* at the foot and on the ascent of which they ranged themselves as in an Amphitheatre. Eugenius III. had been invited to consecrate this Assembly by his presence; but detained in Italy by the troubles of his Pontificate, he delegated St. Bernard as his representative. The meagre and attenuated form of the Orator contrasted strongly with the vehement and fiery spirit of his address; but long ere he could bring his speech to conclusion, it was interrupted by shouts from the surrounding auditors, "The Cross, the Cross." The Crosses prepared for the occasion were accordingly distributed and rapidly exhausted; and when the zealous Abbot perceived the deficiency, he tore strips from his own clothes and presented the holy symbols thus rudely fashioned to those who needed them, in order that they might not appear without the badge which pledged them as associated in the proposed expedition †

LOUIS VII.
takes the Cross.

St. Bernard refuses the command, and protects the Jews.

Louis and his Queen were the first who contracted this solemn engagement; and when the names of the Knights, who promised companionship, had been rendered, the command of the whole armament was tendered to St. Bernard. He had the wisdom to refuse; he knew that the trumpet rather than the sword was the weapon which he could most fitly exercise; and he acknowledged that he possessed neither sufficient military science, nor physical strength, to array a host in battle. This self-knowledge is strong evidence of his good sense; and his charity is no less strikingly attested by a circular letter, addressed to the Crusaders, exhorting them to avoid the cruelty with which their predecessors in the former expedition had visited the undeserving Jews. It was not only the massacre of that unhappy people which he condemned, but even their plunder; a doctrine unheard of in those days, in which to spare the blood of an Israelite was considered almost supererogatory gentleness, to spare his gold approached to absolute sin. St. Bernard prohibited robbery no less than murder; but at the same time he very reasonably announced that those who assumed the Cross were not obliged to comply with any usurious bargain which they might have contracted with Jews who provided loans for their outfit. A mind which could thus discreetly and humanely distinguish the path of duty was very far from being impregnated with that blind fanaticism of which it has been often and unjustly accused. St. Bernard continued to preach the Crusade with equal success through the remainder of France, in Switzerland, and in Germany. Money was procured chiefly by subsidies and benevolences from Religious communities, rarely, it is to be feared, obtained without somewhat of compulsion. The Jews, for the most part, little trusting to the effect of St. Bernard's recommendation to mercy, withdrew and concealed themselves; and some of the richer towns in France bartered their wealth for privileges, grants of which were not always observed with scrupulous fidelity; A Council of War rashly determined that the route of the army should be by land, Regents were appointed to administer the Government during the King's absence, and the choice of the Assembly fell upon his brother-in-law Raoul of Vermandois, the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Abbot Suger. From 1108. to

From
A. D.
A. D.
1199.

Two years after the Assembly at Vezelay, Louis received the Oriflamme at the altar of St. Denis, knelt before the Pope for his benediction, was invested by him with the Pilgrim's scrip and staff, and then passed the remainder of the day in company with the Monks, eating in their Refectory, and sleeping in their Dormitory. At Whitsuntide he commenced his march from Metz, at the head of seventy thousand Knights, mounted and completely armed; and the remaining band of infantry, of camp-followers, of pilgrims and of women, so far swelled this immense host, that two hundred thousand souls are said to have crossed the Danube with him before the close of Summer. It was in October 1149, that accompanied by no more than three hundred followers, the remnant of his once magnificent war-train, and a fugitive in barks furnished by Sicily, he landed at St. Gilles on the Rhone. Mortified, disappointed, and humiliated by his ignominious failure, henceforth he displayed few of those popular qualities, which, before the Crusade, had won for him golden opinions. He became timid, suspicious, inconstant, and irresolute; whether Peace or War was the determination of the day, its course was equally liable to be interrupted on the morrow; and each of them seemed adopted not for itself, but as a preparatory step to the other. Rash in the conception of his projects, fickle in their pursuit, careless in their execution, even if he occasionally proved successful in the field, the advantage there gained was sure to be lost in the Cabinet. The ardour of devotion which in youth had animated him to undertake the Holy War, as life advanced degenerated into a narrow, monkish asceticism; and the two and thirty years during which he continued to fill the throne after his return from Palestine are dull, unattractive, and inglorious.

Many, indeed, of his most prominent contemporaries were snatched away by death not long after he reentered France. Geoffrey Plantagenet, ‡ Count of Anjou, second husband of the Empress Matilda, died in 1151, leaving usual severity upon those whom he had already defrauded. Many of the ringleaders were thrown headlong from the summit of one of their own towers; a cruel mode of execution of which we have before mentioned another instance, and which Du Gange has noted as affording precedent to the sentence of the usurper Mountbath, after the Latin conquest of Constantinople. (Obs. sur Villehardouin, § clixiii.)

* Odo de Duglois, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 93.

† Gibbon (ch. lvi. vol. x. p. 316.) and Muratori (Annali d'Italia, ad ann. 1149) believe the story of the capture of Louis by the Greeks on his return. Du Gange, in his notes on Cinnamus, (lib. i. c. 19. p. 49.) has examined the evidence for this incident; which M. de Sismondi absolutely rejects, on the authority of a Letter from the King himself to Suger, explaining the causes of his delay, which may be found ap. Hist. des Gaules, xv. 514. May not the words of Cinnamus, upon which Gibbon relies, αὐτὸς ἄλγιστος ἐστὶν ἄλλοις, be accepted from a Byzantine writer, as if they were αὐτὸς ἵππος, and rendered accordingly "narrowly escaped capture?" See a Paper by M. Butigny in the Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. iii. p. 615.

‡ The following are some of the merits in consequence of which Louis VIII. has sometimes been called le Preux. Il abattait tous Carêmes, s'abstenait de vin et de poisson tous les Vendredis, jeûnait régulièrement aux offices divins, et respectait les Ministres de l'Écart au point que dans les processions il feroit passer devant lui jusqu'au moindre Clerc. L'Art de vérifier les Dates, i. 577.

§ Geoffrey was "a mighty hunter," and his name is traced to his passion for the chase which detained him perpetually dans les bois.

* In l'altare ipsius montis Vezelacensis, juxta viam Autissiodorensis, ubi cū de consiliis montis fabricata est Ecclesia in honore Sanctæ Crucis. (Anonymi Chronicon, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 120.)

† Odo de Duglois, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 92.

‡ The town of Sens was thus deceived. In 1146 it purchased from the King, at a costly price, the rights of a Commune; which, however, were speedily resumed, by the advice of a neighbouring Abbot, himself a Crusader, whose extraordinary expenses required the exaction of all his former dues and customs. The Citizens rose and put the Abbot to death; and Louis hastening in person to repress the insurrection, inflicted capital punishment with very un-

History. his eldest son Henry in possession of Maine, Touraine, and Anjou, and rightful claimant to England and Normandy. The Abbot Suger fell next, in the year following; and the high station to which he had elevated himself from obscure parentage, the ascendancy which he maintained over two successive Kings, and his unblamed exercise of the Sovereign power while Regent, appear to justify the reputation for wisdom as well as goodness, which, in spite of occasional disparagement, he has very generally enjoyed. St. Bernard, the most distinguished personage of his time, whether we regard his talents or the influence obtained by them, closed his active career in 1153. Seldom has an Ecclesiastic intermingled so largely with Politics with less detriment to his spiritual character; few are there who after the attainment of Canonization have so long and so honourably continued to attract the notice of posterity.

Henry Plantagenet had already done homage to the King of France for the Fief of Normandy, and he was meditating the invasion of England when a more certain hope of increasing his power presented itself nearer home. During his expedition to Palestine, Louis, it is said, entertained suspicions of the fidelity of his Queen. Whether the charge which names a handsome Saracen as the favoured lover, or that which exposes her to still greater obloquy with Raymond, Prince of Antioch, her maternal uncle, be admitted or discredited, her subsequent history amply avouches that the temper of Eleanor was little adapted to promote conjugal happiness. Jealousy on the one side, contempt on the other, were easy preludes to an open quarrel; and when Eleanor complained that she had wedded a Monk instead of a Monarch, it was not probable that Louis would be backward in remembering that a forbidden degree of kindred had once been imputed to his marriage; and that such a plea ensured facility of divorce. A Gallican Council pronounced that the Royal pair were within the prohibited affinity; and the King, after sixteen years of marriage, acquiesced in this decision. How far Louis was politic in again disavowing Aquitaine and Poitiers from France, on account of a matrimonial discontent, need not be inquired; that he acted honourably when upon the repudiation of his wife he returned her dower, is not to be denied.*

So convinced was Louis that the infamy of his divorced Queen would be an effectual bar to her remarriage, that he is said to have expressed an assurance, in the simplicity of his heart, that the poorest gentleman in his dominions would spurn her for a wife. But the broad lands of Aquitaine were no shurers in her dishonour; Eleanor had not completed her thirtieth year; she was rich, high-born, and beautiful; and suitors accordingly were not wanting whom either love or ambition rendered incredulous of her frailty. As she crossed the domains of Thibaud, Count of Blois, (second son of the late similarly-named turbulent Count of Champagne,) in order to return to her own States, he demanded her hand; and on being refused, prepared for violence, which she escaped by a speedy flight to Tours. But there also a like danger awaited her from Geoffrey, younger brother of Henry of Normandy. Lord of but three poor Castles, that Prince dared not openly propose to the wealthy heiress; but stratagem might obtain the prize; and in this hope he laid a train for her abduction from the harbour of Piles. Her good fortune a second time preserved her; and no sooner had she arrived at Guienne than she wrote to Henry himself, proffering to him her hand and her Duchy. It is by no means improbable that a passion for that young Prince may have contributed to the disgust which she felt for Louis, and have inclined her to forward the divorce. Henry had twice visited the Court of France; he was in the flower of his age, brave, gallant, vigorous, handsome, and accomplished. Even exclusive of such attractions, to Eleanor, who needed protection, alliance with the existing Duke of Normandy, and the probable future King of England, gave all that she required; while the great augmentation of power which her territories conferred, could not but render the proposal most agreeable to Henry. The negotiation, therefore, even if not before arranged, was rapidly concluded; and six short weeks after Eleanor ceased to be Queen of France, she became Bride of Henry Plantagenet and Duchess of Normandy.†

The mortification felt by Louis at this unexpected aggrandizement of his Vassal at his own expense, no doubt laid deeply the foundation of that almost unceasing discord which marked the subsequent lives of these two Princes. More than half of the dominions which the King of France once ruled were now transferred to Henry; and Louis bitterly lamenting his great political mistake, sought everywhere to create enemies against that rival for whom he had unwittingly prepared so splendid a prize. Fortune, however, continued to heap her benefits on the Duke of Normandy; and an arrangement which left the usurper Stephen in quiet possession of the throne of England during his lifetime, equally secured it to Henry on his demise. That event was not long delayed, and within a year from the Treaty which fixed his succession, Henry II. received his Crown at Westminster. By the Will of his Father, the State of Normandy was to pass to the second brother Geoffrey whenever Henry became King of England, and the latter had sworn to the solemn observance of that condition. But the avarice of the Pope relieved him from the burden of perjury; the weak vanity of Louis, notwithstanding his many causes of resentment, was flattered when so great a Sovereign offered to do personal homage before his throne; and disregarding Geoffrey's rights, he confirmed the usurper in the Fief which he sought to retain.

The details of those frequently renewed hostilities which occurred between Louis VII. and Henry II. will find a more appropriate place in the Annals of England; and we shall here confine ourselves to such few matters as are more intimately connected with the Biography of the former. Although preparing to enforce by arms the pretensions which he advanced to the Counties both of Nantes and of Toulouse, Henry in a personal interview† succeeded in obtaining the assent of the King of France.

From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.
She marries Henry Plantagenet.

Treaty with Stephen.
A. D.
1153. and accession of Henry II. of England.
A. D.
1154.

* His title of le Jeune has sometimes been ascribed to this easy abandonment of a large territory. It was more probably given as a distinction from his Father, who bore the name Baptismal name, (Louis,) at the time of their association. The authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates speak of Louis's surrender of Eleanor's portion with straight-forward and most commendable honesty. Les Politiques Machiavélistes n'ont pas manqué de dire que Louis aurait dû renvoyer sa femme et garder la dot. Mais on ne connaît pas de Louis Devine ni Humaine qui autorise à retenir le bien d'autrui. i. 576.

* Gervanius, ad ann. 1152. Gul. Neubrigensis, i. 31.

† During this visit of Henry to Paris, Louis, as Radulphus de Diceto informs us, gave up his Palace to his Royal Guest, and went to lodge in the Cloisters of Notre Dame. Hence the authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates acutely deduce that in those times the Kings of History. France to the betrothal of Margaret, the issue of that Prince's second marriage,* to Henry Courtmantel, his own eldest son by the divorced Queen Eleanor. The Bridegroom had attained the ripe age of three years, the Bride that of twice as many months; her dower was to be the Vexin, which was intermediately consigned to the protection of the Knights Templars; and the infant Princess was intrusted to the hands of her Father-in-law, until, at a fitting age, a Papal dispensation should permit the nuptials to be solemnized. On this alliance, the King of England no doubt thought to found a prospective claim for his son to the Crown of France. The two elder daughters of Louis by his first marriage might easily be bastardized, and the Salique Law was not yet so firmly established in France as to prevent a very rational hope of its evasion in favour of the female issue of his second bed.

Henry II. makes an unsuccessful attempt on Toulouse.

A. D. 1159.

During this visit to Paris, the King of England obtained quiet possession of Nantes; and concluded a league with some powerful Barons who promised assistance in his design upon Toulouse. His chief force consisted of Brabançons, mercenary adventurers, issuing originally, as their name betokens, from Brabant and Flanders, and offering their swords, like the Condottieri of later times, to the most profitable market.† Of these soldiers Henry at one time had more than twenty thousand in his service, upon whom, so long as he could supply them with keep, pay, and hope of plunder, he rested far greater confidence than upon the ordinary feudal levies. After amusing Louis by repeated conferences, in each of which he profusely lavished vague expressions of friendship, Henry, believing his preparations to be fully adequate to their object, marched at once upon Toulouse. The first suspicion which Louis entertained of this design was generated by hearing of the approach of a hostile army under its walls, and he lost not a moment in throwing himself into the City. The English force was destined for a coup de main, by no means for a siege, especially as Toulouse was strongly fortified; and Henry dexterously concealing his weakness, sent a trumpet to inform Louis, that his respect for the Royal authority was too great to permit him to attack a garrison honoured by the presence of his Sovereign. No scruples of loyalty, however, restrained him from other and more defenceless portions of France, and having pillaged an France had but one Palace in their Capital, and that one, by no means of large dimensions. i. 577.

* With Constance, daughter of Alfonso VII. King of Castile and Leon. Louis married her in 1154, and in a few months afterwards made a pilgrimage to Compostella. The pilgrimage was only an ostensible motive; the real object of his visit was to ascertain whether there were any foundation for a malicious report that his Queen was an illegitimate daughter of Alfonso by a low-born concubine. The Archbishop of Toledo assures us that Louis returned equally overwhelmed with astonishment at the magnificence of the Spanish Court, and well satisfied that his consort, daughter of a sister of the Count of Barcelona, was on both sides of illustrious blood. Rodericus Toletanus, op. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 283.

† They were named also Cetteaux, from the long knives, provincially called cetteux, which formed part of their offensive arms; and Hostiers, for numerous reasons too unsatisfactory to deserve quotation, which the reader may find in Du Cange, ad v. Raptarius. Their character did not stand very high, if we may form a judgment on the report of the Chronique de St. Denis, cited by Velly, ii. 81. Gens de compagnie, brigands, pillards, voleurs, larrons, infâmes, Avolses, excommuniés. Ils ardoient les Monastères et les Eglises où le peuple se retirait, et tourmentaient les Pères et les Religieuses. The advantage which they offered over feudal troops arose from the permanency of their service. The latter were bound to keep the field during a certain number of days only; the former remained under arms as long as they received pay.

extensive range of Country with impunity, he consented to a brief and hollow Peace.

In the following year, on the death of Queen Constance in childbed, Louis espoused as his third consort Alice, daughter of the late Thibaud of Champagne. The indecent haste with which this engagement was completed, only fifteen days having elapsed since the demise of the former Queen, may have been occasioned by the anxious desire which Louis felt to confirm the succession by a male heir; and that Henry entertained some apprehension of such an event may be concluded from the step which he immediately adopted in consequence. Without waiting, as had been stipulated, till the children became of marriageable age, he solemnized the nuptials between Henry Courtmantel and Margaret of France; and demanded and received her dower from the Templars to whose custody it had been assigned. This family alliance, instead of cementing the interests of the contracting parties, was the signal for new war, and the part which during its course was taken by Louis as espousing the cause of Thomas à Becket when he sought refuge in France, contributed materially to heighten mutual irritation. "I am astonished," remarked Louis, when he heard of the confiscation and proscription which succeeded the Archbishop's flight, "that my Brother of England should have forgotten the words of the Psalmist, 'Be ye angry and sin not.' " "He would perhaps have remembered them," was the adroit answer of the Courtier to whom these words were addressed, "if he were in the habit of hearing Mass as frequently as your Majesty."*

It was in consequence of a Peace signed at Montmirail, after a lingering and inconclusive war of nine years' continuance, interrupted by frequent armistices and conferences, that Henry Courtmantel proceeded to Paris, and officiated, as we have before stated, as Grand Seneschal. But on the murder of a Becket, it seemed as if hostilities would be renewed more angrily than before. Indignation was at its height throughout France, and Louis wrote to Alexander III. complaining that "maliciousness rising up against a Saint of God had pierced the apple of Christ's eye, and the light of Canterbury," and exhorting him to unsheath the sword of St. Peter; for that the blood of the Martyr cried to the universal Church for vengeance.† Henry at the moment was in too critical a situation to venture upon braving any enemy whom he might hope to conciliate; and having obtained absolution from the Pope, he employed the offices of his Legate to reconcile him with France also.

When the sons of Henry II. arrived at manhood, and leagued in unnatural rebellion against their Father, they received open encouragement from the Court of France. Paris became their asylum and their strong hold; on giving audience to Henry's Ambassadors, Louis avowed that he recognised no other King of England than Courtmantel, who then sat by his throne; he invited his Vassals to arm in that Prince's behalf; and he swore never to abandon the support of his just rights. In the war which ensued, he treacherously violated a capitulation which had placed Verneuil in his hands under a solemn promise of immunity; fired the town when the English army hastening to its relief was already within sight; and by a forced march endeavoured to escape

* Hist. Quatre. ii. 7.

† Epist. Lud. vii. ccccviij. op. Hist. des Gaules, xvi. 153. Falters, London, 1816, i. 27.

History. its pursuit. But the haste with which the French were withdrawn filled them with an exaggerated apprehension of danger; the retreat soon became a flight; and overtaken before nightfall, while in disorder, fatigued, and dispirited, the whole army was disastrously routed by an enemy panting to revenge the late atrocious perfidy.* Henry vigorously pursued his success till he was recalled to England by a menaced invasion of Courtmantel; and it was at that time that he performed his memorable penance at the Tomb of à Becket. The siege of Rouen occupied Louis during the King of England's absence; and profiting by his great superiority in numbers over the garrison, he divided his army into three corps, which, relieving each other every eight hours, directed their attacks unremittingly during the whole four and twenty, on a single point of the City. The arrangement was soon discovered by the Governor; and being met by a similar division of the garrison, failed of success.† On the Festival of St. Lawrence, for whom the King affected especial devotion, he proclaimed a suspension of arms, and the majority of the Citizens, long pent within their walls, gave loose to joy by active sports and careless festivity, without their circuit. The Count of Flanders marked with a piercing eye the defenceless state of the city, and he suggested to Louis how easy would be its capture. At first the King revolted from so treacherous a proposition; but persuaded at length by the urgency of his less scrupulous ally, he ordered his Knights to arm secretly, and prepare for the assault.‡ A Priest who happened at the moment to be amusing himself by the fine prospect from the tower of one of the Churches, observed an unusual movement in the enemy's camp; and suspecting treachery, sounded the bell which was near him; the alarm soon became general; the citizens hastened back to their ramparts; the gates were closed; and when the French troops advanced as they believed to easy and certain conquest, they encountered a vigorous resistance and a disgraceful repulse.

Negotiations were once more commenced on Henry's return; the rebel sons submitted to their Father, and Peace with France was concluded at Montlouis, not again to be violated. Both Kings, now advanced in years, desired repose; and tacitly consented to lay aside their long existing rivalry. Frequently engaged in amicable conferences, they formed numerous devotional projects: at one time they proposed a joint personal expedition to the Holy Land; at another, to despatch powerful succours for its relief; and at a third, they determined upon a union for the extirpation of those Heretics, who, under the name of Henriciens, Bons-hommes, or Albigenses,§ were establishing themselves both in the French and Norman dominions. In the populous City of Toulouse it was calculated that more than one half the inhabitants were followers of the new doctrine; and among its most zealous partisans were counted numerous persons of large possessions, ancient pedigree, and dignified station.

But these and other similar propositions, often as they were discussed, were in the end abandoned; and to Louis, if he had been so willing, time was denied for their fulfilment. One son and two daughters were the produce of his last marriage; the former, Philippe—named Dieu donné, because he was born at a time at which his Father had renounced all hope of male issue, and Auguste, a title derived in the first instance from the mouth of his nativity, and continued afterwards on account of his distinguished qualities—had now attained his fourteenth year, and Louis, who approached his sixtieth, determined to associate him in Government. The day of coronation was fixed for the fifteenth of August, the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and the Prelates, Counts, and Barons of the Kingdom were summoned "as they cherished their Sovereign and their honour to attend without let or hinderance" at this solemn festivity. The three Princes of England were among the visitors to the Court, and Henry Courtmantel again claimed the feudal privileges of Dapifer. An untoward accident, however, prevented the ceremony upon which all thoughts were fixed. A few days before the morning of the Sacre, Philippe Auguste being engaged in a hunting party in the forest of Compiègne was separated from his retinue. Entangled in the depths of the wild, he continued to wander till nightfall; and then, when overpowered by cold, hunger, and fatigue, he was further harassed by a startling apparition. A wild figure of a man stood before him; of extraordinary stature, and coarse and savage features; blackened from head to foot with charcoal, bearing an axe upon his shoulder, and blowing into flame some smouldering embers which he carried in an iron vessel. The young Prince, although greatly terrified, mastered his fears sufficiently to address the innigred spectre; who proved to be one of the rough but harmless charcoal-burners inhabiting the

France.

From
A. D.
1109. to
A. D.
1199.

Intended association of Philippe Auguste.
A. D.
1179.

His adventure in the Forest of Compiègne.

* Before the birth of Philippe, his Father saw in a dream his future son, carrying in his hand a golden cup full of human blood from which he made his Nobles drink. The King conceived this fearful vision till on his death-bed he revealed it to the Bishop of Albi, at that time Papal Legate, who frequently mentioned it afterwards. (Chron. Regum Francorum, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii. 214.) Its key is given by Giraldus Cambrensis, De Instructione Principis, i. id. xviii. 124. But the entire History of the embryo Philippe Auguste is too curious to be omitted. His baptism is represented in a vignette to the XIVth volume of the Hist. des Gaules, and is accompanied by the following Interpretatio eius Exitus advenit pagana. Anno MCXCV, illustrissimus Ludovicus Pius, cum multis haberet filios et nullum filium, tempore quo Abbates Cisterciensis Ordinis conveniunt apud Cistercium ad Capitulum generale, venit ibidem, et protulit se ad terram coram cunctis Abbatibus ibidem congregatis: qui humiliter et devotè rogaverunt Regem, ut se erigeret ac surgeret. Et respondens Rex ait se nunquam de terrâ levare, donec promitterent ei in brevi heredem masculinum habiturum. Abbates verò renidebant petitiõnem Regis, dicentes talia ad Deum pertinere. Rex autem perseveravit protulitque in petitiõne sua. Tunc Abbates predicti orationi devoti cum lacrymis se dederunt. Qui surgentes ab oratione, divinis gratiis inspirante, certificaverunt Regi quòd in brevi prolem masculinam haberet. Et tunc piamus Ludovicus Rex, fide, spe, et caritate plenus, surrexit à terrâ, et cum gratularum actione et magnâ devotione recessit. Et eodem anno, quam miraculose in senectute sua, de uxore sua filium genuit, quem Philippum nominavit: qui postea dictus est Philippus magnanimus, alii Arctolabus. Hæc habetur in Tabularibus Claustrorum Monasteriorum Ordinis per Franciam, tom. xii. p. 133.

• Benedictus Abbas. Hoveden. Brompton, all ad ann. 1173. Gul. Neubrigensis is silent respecting the French defeat.

† Mohammed II., when besieging Scutari in 1478, divided his great force, exceeding eighty thousand men, in a very similar manner, and was also similarly repulsed by the Venetians.

‡ Non per vocem tubæ nec præconiis sed suis ducum suavis exercitus in iram suam ad iram suam præparabat exitum. Guillelmus Neubrigensis, ii. ad ann. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xiii. 117.

§ The Henriciens were disciples of Henry, an Italian Hermit, who preached in Switzerland, Potiers, Bourdeaux, Toulouse, and the neighbouring districts in 1147, was condemned by Eugenius III. at the Council of Rheims in the following year, and soon afterwards died in prison. Bons-hommes seems the French rendering of Cathari, a name which, like Albigenses, (originally given to the Paulicians of the IXth Century) became extended generally to almost all Heretics of every denomination.

VOL. XI.

4 L

History. forest, and who afforded prompt guidance to Philippe through its intricacies.* But the agitation which the youth had suffered powerfully affected him, and he awoke on the following morning raving and delirious with a fever, the rapid progress of which soon rendered the Physicians almost desperate as to his recovery.

From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.
Pilgrimage of Louis to the shrine of a Becket.

The chief hopes and affections of Louis were centered on this only son, and in his agony of grief, he vowed to undertake a pilgrimage to a Becket's shrine, already renowned for its sanctity and its many reputed miracles. The Martyr, during his lifetime, had been largely indebted to the King of France for protection, and if gratitude were a quality which survived in a state of Beatification, it was not too much to expect that the Saint would now intercede in behalf of the distracted parent. Moreover, he had appeared three nights consecutively to the King in his sleep to give an invitation.† Henry was in waiting at Dover;‡ to do honour to the Royal Pilgrim, whom he accompanied to Canterbury also; and there the French King performed his mournful devotions at the Shrine of the Martyr, and presented it with costly offerings. Among them was a gem of inestimable price, well known in France as La Royale;§ a golden cup embellished with the choicest workmanship; and a perpetual endowment of one hundred pipes of wine, to be selected annually from the Royal Cellars at Poissy, and sent over to England free of expense. At the same time he relieved the Monks of Canterbury for ever from all tolls and duties for such articles as they might purchase in France for the use of their Church; and in confirmation of this great bounty he presented them with a Charter countersigned and sealed by his Chancellor.¶

Not more than five days were consumed by the anxious Father in this devout expedition, and on his return he heard with delight that his son had recovered. No time was lost in renewing preparations for his Sacre, which was performed with a magnificence upon which the native Historians fondly dwell, but in the presence of Louis. He had been disabled by a stroke of palsy while attending Mass at St. Denis. He survived for many months afterwards in a state of im-becility; and his long reign of forty-three years was terminated in September 1180. The Government had virtually passed into the hands of Philippe Auguste from the moment of his Coronation; which had been speedily followed by a marriage peculiarly grateful to National feelings. Isabelle of Hainault, whom Philippe selected as his Consort, was lineally descended from Charles Duke of Lorraine, Brother of Lothaire II. and Uncle of Louis V.; and from this union of the blood of Charlemagne with that of Hugh Capet were drawn the most auspicious omens of future happiness and stability. A remarkable accident which occurred at the Coronation of the new Queen tended not a little to strengthen these favourable convictions. Philippe on the arrival of his Bride in Paris renewed his Sacre; and while the youthful pair were awaiting unction from the hands of the Archbishop of Sens, one of the attendants waving his wand of office to restrain the pressure of the crowd, broke three glass lamps suspended immediately over the heads of the King and Queen, and lodged them with their contents. There was no little skill and adroitness in converting this personally disagreeable mishap into a presage of good fortune; but some ready Wit declared, and the populace joyfully echoed, that those whom Providence had thus abundantly anointed would receive a double portion of his other bounties also.*

When the Royal power was virtually transferred to the hands of Philippe Auguste by the incapacity of his Father, the young King had scarcely exceeded his fourteenth year; but he already gave evidence of a spirit likely to brook control. The first acts of his Government must be attributed to the blind zeal of the Ecclesiastics who surrounded him; for Religious persecution is not the vice of Boyhood.† While the Jews on their Sabbath were assembled in worship, they were dragged at the same hour from all their Synagogues throughout the Kingdom, committed to prison, and sentenced to quit the French dominions within three months. Whatever ready money they might possess, and whatever movables they could transport, the wretched exiles were permitted to retain, but all their other property was confiscated; and such of their debtors as consented to pay into the Royal Treasury a fifth part of the sum for which they were bound to any Jew, were relieved from the remainder of their engagement. The ordinary calum-

* Rigordus, de Gesta Philippo Augusti, ap. Hist. des Gaulles, xiv. 5.

† It was delivered in the following words: Domina mater ihesus Christus misit me servum suum Thomam Cantuariensem Martyrem, ad te, ut scias, si credideris et amicos contrito adteris servum suum Thomam Cantuariensem Martyrem, Filium tuum convalescet de infirmitate illa quâ tenetur. On the third appearance the Archbishop was wroth and added menaces. Benedictus Petroburgensis Abbas, ad ann. apud Hist. des Gaulles, xii. 180.

‡ For this purpose Henry rode all night; and observed an Eclipse of the Moon while on his journey. Gervasius Durovernenis, op. Hist. des Gaulles, xii. 141.

§ To this jewel, allusion is probably made by Erasmus in his incomparable Dialogue, Peregrinatio Religiosa regis. When the coffin which enclosed the remains of the Martyr was exhibited to the pilgrim Orygus (one of the interlocutors of the Dialogue) with all its emblazony of gold and gems, Prætor candidi virgî demonstrabat contactu singulas gemmas, addens nomen Gallicum, pretium, et amorem domi. Non præcipuus Monarchæ dono muerant. The gratitude of the Monks in return may be seen in a Letter from their Chapter to the King promising him a variety of Ecclesiastical remembrances; and among them, that on the day of his death, whenever it may occur, they will perform no less full service for his soul than if he had actually been an Archbishop of Canterbury. Ap. Hist. des Gaulles, xvi. 167.

¶ This was the first time any King of France had landed upon the English shore either in peaceful or in hostile guise, vel hostis manu vel ingressus pacifico. Radulfus de Diceto, ad ann. ap. Hist. des Gaulles, xii. 202.

* Adfert signum abundantie, famæ, gloriæ et sapientie. Chron. Reg. Franc. ap. Hist. des Gaulles, xii. 215. See also Rigordus, ut supra, p. 7. The latter Historian terms the Queen Elizabeth, venerabilis Regina; probably she bore two names, for she is often mentioned by others as Elizabeth.

† Nevertheless Rigordus is loose in panegyricising that which he considers the early piety of Philippe Auguste. So offensive were oaths to his ears, that if a soldier, or any one else, happened to let slip an imprecation in his presence, he was forthwith thrown into the next pond or rivet; quando fortuito eorum males vel quidlibet aliud iudens, præsentem Regem, ex improviso juramentum incurritur, statim ad mandatum Regis in flumine vel in lacu aliquo proijciuntur. . . . Macte virtute! cujus talia erant principis, quanta erit finis! (p. 5.) Besides this symptom of precocious devotion, he manifested one other, that of refusing to give his old clothes to players, jugglers, and minstrels. Rigordus is grievously shocked at the profusion with which some Princes occasionally bestowed upon those ragged bands, richly embroidered vests, after six or seven days' wear, which perhaps had cost them twenty or thirty marks. Philippe Auguste was not thus idly lavish, but reserved his cast wardrobe for the poor, videns omnia ista esse vana et salutis contraria, instructo Spiritu Sancti reducere ad memoriam; quod a sanctis et religiosi viri quandoque dicerant, quod luxuriosus dare Darnobus est vitium. (p. 21.)

Death of Louis le Grand.

From
From
A. D.
1101
to
A. D.
1196
to
A. D.
1180 Consolidation and maxims of Philippe Auguste.

Persecution of Jews.

History. From A. D. 1108. to A. D. 1199. nies which have been circulated in every Country of Europe whenever it has been thought fit to direct persecution against this outcast nation, were now sedulously revived. It was affirmed that they had profaned a Crucifix and certain Sacramental vessels which had been deposited with them in pawn, and that at their Passover they had even crucified a Christian in mockery of the Saviour. Avarice as well as Superstition may have claimed its share in occasioning the cruelties inflicted upon this suffering but wealthy people; and relief from the future discharge of usurious contracts, and the attainment of present plunder, may have contributed, together with imaginary zeal for God's service, to cause their expulsion.*

The French Court was divided into two parties each struggling for ascendancy over the Royal minor; the one composed of the Queen Mother, Alice, and her four brothers of the House of Champagne; the other of the Count of Flanders, uncle of the Queen Consort Isabelle, and his adherents. The King's marriage, however approved by the Nation, had been strenuously opposed by his mother, who, jealous of the new influence which it introduced and deprived both of revenue and authority, hastily betook herself to Normandy, and solicited protection from Henry II., and his eldest son whom he had associated with himself in Royalty. The Kings met on their respective frontiers, in the presence of a numerous force on either side, to confer upon the dispute; and Henry, a veteran in diplomacy, and one of the ablest politicians who ever filled a throne, was astonished at the prudence which marked the boy-negotiator in these discussions. Without any manifestation of alarm at the great power of the mediator whom Alice had chosen, and without any cession of his own claims to the full enjoyment of Sovereignty, Philippe consented to his mother's return, and ensured her a maintenance adequate to the dignity of her station. In the Treaty which concluded this interview, the Princes mutually promised inviolable fidelity; Henry to son Seigneur, Philippe to son homme et son fidèle; feudal expressions singularly contrasting with their comparative years and power.

In the earlier part of his reign, during intervals of tranquillity, Philippe Auguste laudably directed himself to the improvement of his Capital. Two large Halls (halles) were erected in the market-place called Champraux, as a sort of Exchange for "merchants." But the merchants of those times, if we may judge from the narrative of Rigordus, were little superior to modern pedlars. The chief object of these buildings was to enable them to sell their wares undamaged (mundisime) in rainy weather, and to secure them also from pillage during night. For these purposes the circuit was walled round, and the gates were carefully shut after dark; moreover, between the Halls themselves and the outer wall, roofed stalls (stalla dauper aperta) were constructed, which allowed commercial intercourse on the very wettest day, without a chance of injury to the goods. Another and a much more important benefit conferred on the metropolis was the paving of its streets. The young King one morning, as we are told, while walking up and down the great Saloon of his Palace, anxiously meditating on the affairs of State, looked out at a window commanding the Seine, as was his wont for occasional recreation; and his attention was forcibly arrested by a grievous stench proceeding from the mud which had been disturbed in one of the streets by the passage of some waggons. All his predecessors had been deterred by fear of expense from remedying this nuisance; but Philippe Auguste at once assembled the Magistrates, and ordered every street and alley in the City to be paved. This improvement brought with it a change of name also; in which, while we give full credit to the derivation of the original title Lutetia, we hesitate perhaps in admitting that of Paris, which traces its founder to the line of Assaracus.*

Philippe, as we have seen, had extricated himself from bondage to his mother and her partisans: on the demise of Louis VII. he similarly shook off the guardianship of the Count of Flanders, from whom he claimed his wife's inheritance, now due to him by the death of her mother. The mediation of the King of England was again successfully employed. But the hostilities then prevented broke out two years afterwards, on the second marriage of the Count, by which Philippe apprehended that his promised succession to the Vermandois on that Prince's death might be impeded.† Few events in History are more utterly devoid of interest than the numerous short and petty wars occurring in the early part of the reign of Philippe Auguste; and the reader will gladly be spared the recital of mutual pillage, the capture and recapture of unimportant castles, and the hourly changes of military fortune, which, whatever misery they might inflict on their subjects, in no wise increased the strength or the glory of either of the contending parties. We hasten, therefore, in this instance, as we shall do in others also, to the result. Flanders had much to dread from the stagnation of commerce and the destruction of her manufactures which must be occasioned by a long continuance of War; and on that account, Philippe, without obtaining one decisive victory, was solicited to terminate it; and he added Amiens, Sancerre, and the Vermandois to the hereditary possessions of his Crown, as the price of this Peace.

This first and important success naturally encouraged a desire for further acquisition; and henceforward we shall perceive the many commanding qualities of

France.

From A. D. 1108. to A. D. 1199.

A. D. 1186.

Philippe claims the Vermandois.

A. D. 1182.

War with the Count of Flanders. A. D. 1185.

Advantageous Peace.

A. D. 1183.

* Rigordus compares the Jews in their profane usage of consecrated plate to Belshazzar; (p. 8.) in which parallel he is more fortunate than when he tells us that the unhappy exiles, when plundered on their expulsion, resembled their ancestors who spoiled the Egyptians left behind. Indeed he appears to make the one event a type of the other. Hoc ipso significata fuit futura reiectio qua procedente tempore, Duo disponente, secuta est. (p. 6.) The reputed victim, interfectus Judæus et crucifixus, at Paris, was buried in the Church of the Innocents, canonised as St. Richard, and reputed to work many miracles. Robertus de Monte in his Chronicle, ad ann. 1171, mentions others of whom a similar death is recorded: one a child at Blois, who after crucifixion was thrown into the Loire; another in the time of King Stephen, buried in the Cathedral at Norwich; and a third at Gloucester during the reign of Henry II. Lincoln has a similar story attached to the shrine of a St. Hugh. The Chronicle of Gilbert of Mons, perhaps, after all, gives the true reason for Philippe's treatment of the Jews, pro quorum expulsiōe a Christianis immensam pecuniam accepit. Ap. Hist. des Gaules, xviii. 364.

* Rigordus, ut sup. p. 13. 17. Ad hoc Christianissimus Rex conbator, quid nomen antiquum auferret civitati: Lutetia enim a luti satore prius dicta fuerat, sed gentiles quondam, hujusmodi nomen propter fatorem abhorrentes, a Pseudo Alexandro, filio Præmi, Regis Trojæ, Parisius vocaverunt.

† The Vermandois (on the death of her mother, first consort of the Count of Flanders) rightfully descended to Isabelle. The Count promised that it should devolve to her after his own death, but it was naturally feared that issue by a second wife might induce him to violate that promise.

History.

From

A. D.

1108

to

A. D.

1199.

A. D.

1186.

Causes of quarrel with England.

Philippe Auguste, his calmness and discretion, his sagacity and firmness, his valour and enterprise, directing themselves to the single purpose of extending the Royal dominion and prerogative. The Feudatory whom he next humbled was the Duke of Burgundy; but by a wise restitution of all that he had won, he firmly attached him to his service during the ensuing contest which he already contemplated with a far greater Vassal. Many circumstances indeed contributed to afford causes of dissension with England. On the death of Henry Courtmanteil in 1183, Philippe claimed the restitution of the Vexin, the dower of that Prince's widow, Margaret of France.* On the subsequent death of Geoffrey, third son of the King of England, he pretended also to the guardianship of his two daughters and of the Fief of Brittany, the inheritance of Constance their widowed mother, at that time pregnant. Henry, as the immediate Feudal Lord, asserted a claim in opposition to the Lord Paramount; but the dispute was terminated by the birth of a male heir, that Arthur whose wrongs and whose innocence have drawn tears from every reader of either our National History or Drama. Another grievance was easily and perhaps more rightfully made a subject of complaint. Alice of France, a sister of Philippe, had been educated in England from her infancy as the future bride of Richard Cœur de Lion, now heir to the Crown of that Kingdom. It was asserted (but it may be hoped on insufficient grounds) that the destined consort of his Son had fallen a victim to the Father's licentiousness;† but Philippe either discrediting the rumour, or as is more probable, advancing a demand which he believed could not possibly be granted, as a pretext for quarrel, insisted War.

A. D.

1187.

* She married, Beta III., King of Hungary, in 1185.

† Lord Lytellon is amusingly grave upon this piece of scandal. After speaking of the numerous delays which Henry interposed to prevent this marriage, and his perpetual refusal to restore Alice to her relations in the Court of France, he continues, "When wise men act unwisely, the cause must usually be sought for in their passions. I therefore cannot doubt that the real motive of his otherwise unaccountable conduct was a passionate love for that Princess. . . . Love too easily hopes what it ardently wishes; and the supposing him under the tyranny of that passion, which is commonly attended with a greater degree of dotage in elderly men than in young, unravels the whole mystery of his present and subsequent proceedings. For it is natural, if he loved Adalais that he should rather incline to risque a war (however dangerous it might be) than to think of parting with her and delivering her to her Brother, who might presently marry her to another Prince." Hist. of the Reign of Henry II. 4to. iii. 447. Henry II. was a crafty and violent Political intriguer, and at the time at which he is represented to have been thus enacting the part of Damon was fifty-five years of age. The young Princess, then only seventeen, was afterwards, in 1195, married to William Count of Ponthieu. The accusation against Henry, as it appears from Hoveden and Benedictus Petroburgensis, both ad ann. 1191, was made after his death by Richard I. when he refused to comply with Philip's request that he would complete the marriage. But Richard at that moment was on the brink of espousing another woman, and never at any time entertained much regard for his Father's reputation. By the Chroniclers he is made to affirm broadly that Alice had borne a child to his Father. In the Philippes, with more Poetical decorum, he conceals the shame of both parties.

Germanum tibi reddo tuum, causamque latratum

Quid compellor ad hoc, a me, rogo, querere noli.

iv. 128.

In another part of the same Work the author is more plain spoken. He says that Henry by his detention of Alice was as one

Se super incertis suspectum crimine reddens

Corruptis narum famâ vulgante notatus.

iii. 636.

upon the immediate consumption of their long delayed nuptials. In the war which ensued, Cœur de Lion, who held an important command under his Father, gave manifest proofs of a secret understanding with France; and when Henry, by an abandonment of territory, obtained a two years' truce, the hot-headed youth openly resorted to Philippe's camp, banqueting in his tent, drank out of the same cup, and even shared with him the same bed.

The usual spot of conference between the Kings of France and Dukes of Normandy was on a plain near Gisors, so divided between the frontiers that it might be considered almost neutral ground. There, under an ancient elm of extraordinary size and beauty, they were sheltered from the Sun during their parleys. The English, on one occasion, during this short interval of tranquillity, preoccupied the shade, and with great courtesy excluded Philippe and his Nobles from participation. Incensed at this affront, the King of France, as soon as the English guards had withdrawn, uprooted this auspicious Tree of Peace, the fate of which is deplored by almost all the Chroniclers.* Before the expiration of the Truce, the impetuosity of Richard plunged the Kings again into hostilities; at their close, Henry signed a humiliating Peace, and died broken-hearted by the unnatural treachery of his Sons. In his last moments he bitterly cursed them, and the superstitious of the times believed that when Cœur de Lion approached his Father's corpse, a few hours after it had ceased to breathe, blood flowing from his mouth attested the presence of the murderer. Philippe had again profited by this struggle; Berri and Auvergne were confirmed to him, and he sold the restitution of some other conquests at the great price of twenty thousand marks of silver; Richard I. on his accession, in order to secure the fulfilment of this Treaty, concerning which Philippe affected to demur, consented to pay four thousand marks in addition.

These events and the death of the French Queen Isabelle postponed for many months an engagement contracted by the two Kings, to make a joint expedition to the Holy Land.† At length, soon after Midsummer 1190, Philippe received the Oriflamme at St. Denis; delivered to the proper authorities his Will, and an Ordinance, appointing the Queen Mother and her Brother, the Archbishop of Rheims, Regents during his absence;‡ made his progress through Lyons in com-

* Benedictus Petroburgensis (op. Hist. des Gaules, xvii. 484.) and Radulfus da Dietro (ibid. 639.) state only that Philippe destroyed the tree in a gust of passion, because the conference had not ended amicably. Roger Hoveden, ad ann. adds, that he soon more parleys should ever be held under it. The Philippes, ii. 102—185, relates the quarrel and a skirmish which took place in consequence to the disadvantage of the English. According to the Poet, Henry had felled the tree with an iron railing and headed of it as a type of the stability of his dominion, a vault which made Philippe more anxious to destroy it.

*Quæ modo tot romis tantoque virbat honore,
Et Fulcra furent vixit gloria vultu,
Nunc, pudor ei luctus patris totius, ab ipso Funditus est evulso solo.*

† One result of the conquests of Saladin, to check which was the chief object of this 11th Crusade, we do not recollect to have observed anywhere but in the pages of Rigordus. Et nota quod ab eodem anno Domini quando Rex Francie in transmarina peribit ab eodem Saladino capta fuit, infantes qui ab eo tempore nati sunt, non habent nisi viginti dentes aut tantum viginti, cum anni triginta aut triginta duo habere consueverant. (p. 25.)

‡ This instrument is given at length by Rigordus. (p. 30.)

History.

From
A. D.
1108,
to
A. D.
1199.turn of shippe equale.
A. D.
1191.house of duard I.
A. D.
1153.military History of England at home.A. D.
1194.Supplies and trust of the French.apprise of the Royal archives.

pany with the King of England; and embarked with a brilliant suite at Genoa. The greater part of his army had preceded him, and was already encamped under the walls of Acre; a spot on which the superior glory won by Richard, increased the bitter jealousy already cherished against his ally by Philippe, and before eighteen months had elapsed destroyed their confederacy.*

The transactions in the Holy Land belong to another portion of our History; and respecting both these events and all immediately connected with the Annals of England we are purposely brief in this place. Philippe on his return to Europe, in spite of the solemn compact which bound him to strict amity with his recent companion in arms, made no scruple of violating those oaths; and stimulated and assisted the treacherous designs of Prince John upon the Crown of his chivalric Brother; who languished meanwhile, first in the Austrian dungeons, afterwards in those of the Emperor Henry VI. The brief letter by which the King of France advised the would-be usurper that Richard was freed from captivity, "Take care of yourself, for the Devil is unloosed,"† and the refuge which he afforded the fugitive, when in consequence of that expressive despatch he hastily crossed the Channel to Normandy, were repaid by John with a signal act of perfidy. Less confident of permanent support from Philippe than of pardon from the generous temper of Richard, he invited the French garrison which had been placed under his command at Evreux to a splendid banquet; and surrounding his victims, while revelling and unarmed, by his own Body-guard, he massacred three hundred men in cold blood, fixed their heads on the battlements, and took possession of the City in the name of the King of England; Philippe in his just anger laid Evreux in ashes; a revenge which the activity of Richard, who had now entered Normandy, was not able to prevent. In the desultory war which followed, the King of England more than retaliated. Laying an ambuscade near Vendome, he surprised Philippe, wholly unprepared for attack, and seated at breakfast, under a woodside in a sequestered valley. The flight was general and immediate; and the King of France was saved from capture, after separation from his followers, by accidentally turning aside to hear Mass in a neighbouring Church. The English, unsuspecting that the chief object of their pursuit was so near at hand, passed on in full gallop.‡ All the plate, baggage, and treasure of the vanquished host became the prize of the Conquerors; and among the booty were the Royal archives, the Revenue accounts, the Registers of the Exchequer, and the King's Privy Signet.* These fruitless maraudings were terminated, as usual, by an armistice, to be violated by either party at the first moment at which a breach of faith appeared advantageous.

One son by his late Queen was the sole issue of Philippe's bed;† and the perpetuation of the Crown in his own line required a second marriage for its security. The care of Heaven, if we believe Rigordus, (and he was a Physician,) had already been once displayed by the miraculous recovery of this young Prince from a sickness which appeared to be unto death. The story is too characteristic of the times to be omitted. When all human aid proved vain, the Monks of St. Denis, after prayer and fasting, carried in solemn procession, barefooted and in tears, a nail of the Cross, a prickle of the Crown of Thorns, and an arm of Holy Simeon, to the Church of St. Lazarus without the Walls. After Mass and oblations, having been joined by the Archbishop, his Canons and Clerks, by the whole body of Metropolitan Clergy and an infinite throng of students and of the populace, weeping, groaning, and chanting hymns, they marched to the Palace in which the Royal youth was at that moment supposed to be dying. A sermon was there preached to the assembled crowd, and prayers were offered up for the child's recovery. Then the Priests, standing over the sick couch, made with the relics the sign of the Cross upon the patient's stomach, and before nightfall he was pronounced out of danger. His complaint was dysentery, and in order that the marvel might be complete, his Father, who was labouring under a similar complaint in Palestine, was cured on the self-same day and hour. Moreover, at the same moment, a long series of rainy weather, inflicted as a visitation upon human sin, entirely ceased;‡

In looking round for a new Consort, Philippe was guided by political motives; and in the hope of securing the alliance of Denmark against England he demanded the hand of Ingeburge, daughter of King Valdemar I. and sister of Canute VI. The Princess is described as "beautiful, of holy life and of sound principles;"§ nevertheless, from some mysterious and unexplained cause, which Philippe never revealed, and which Rigordus ascribes to witchcraft and the instigation of the Devil, the King, on the day succeeding his nuptials, quitted his Bride in sudden disgust; shut her up for three years in a Castle, where, to use her own piteous words, "she dared not raise her eyes to heaven;" and endeavoured to dissolve the marriage, on the ordinary plea of consanguinity. The affinity was not between the married pair themselves, but between Philippe's first wife and second wives, a connection of which the Church refused to take cognizance; and the Legates whom Celles-

France.

From
A. D.
1108,
to
A. D.
1199.Miraculous recovery of Philippe's son.Marriage of Philippe with Ingeburge of Denmark.
A. D.
1193.He applies for a dissolving.A. D.
1196.

* The expressions of Richard I. when he was abandoned by Philippe are most bitter. He wrote as follows: Pont recessum Domini Regis Francie vidis apud Accon, qui ita turpiter peragrationsis tue propositum ac votum contra voluntatem Dei dereliqui in approbationem aeternam tui et Regni ipsius, &c. Epist. Regis Anglie, Fadera, London, 1816, i. 54.

† Roger Hoveden, after reciting the Treaty for Richard's delivery, adds, Quod cum Rex Francie audisset statim mandavit Comiti Johanni ut ipse ubi caveret quia Diabolus jam solutus erat. Ad ann. 1193, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xvii. 559. This Billet is now familiar to every reader's ears by Sir Walter Scott's introduction of it in Isabel.

‡ Gul. Brito Armoricus, Philippeis, iv. 447. Rigordus (p. 40.) does not impute this massacre to John. But the Philippeis is sound authority, and unhappily it is not contradicted by any parts of John's character and conduct which have been transmitted to us. Guilelmus Brito passed his life in constant personal intercourse with Philippe Auguste, and was eye-witness of most of the facts which he relates.

§ Roger Hoveden, ap. Hist. des Gaules, 570. ad ann.

* Scripta tributorum, fiscoque chirographis, nec non Cum reliquis capitulis rebus regale signatum.

Philippeis, iv. 547.

Roger Hoveden (ad sup.) mentions a yet more important spoil, Copella (the Archives originally kept in the Royal Chapel) regia, et charta universorum hominum. Regis Anglie, qui se dederant Regi Francie et Comiti Johanni contra eum. Philippe took great pains to repair the loss of the Crown Records, which were afterwards deposited in the Treasure of Chartres.

† Afterwards Louis VIII., born September 5, 1187.

‡ Nec est sileat praterendum quod eodem die per orationes Cleri et Populi serenitas aeris et temporis restituta est universis terris: pluvialis enim Dominus, peccatis hominum exiguibus, multo tempore super terram. Rigordus, p. 34.

§ Pulcherrimum puellum, sanctum et bonis moribus ornatum. Id. p. 35.

History.

From
A. D.
1108. to
A. D.
1199.

War with

England.
A. D.
1195.

Reconciliation.

Fresh war.

A. D.
1196.

tiu III. despatched to adjudge the cause, being as the courtly Historiographer describes them, "dumb dogs, without the power of giving tongue, and trembling moreover for their own hides, brought nothing to conclusion."^{*} In spite of the reclamations of Canute and the menaces of Rome, Philippe, however, without having obtained a divorce, espoused Mary, daughter of Berchold, a Prince of the Tyrol, and braved the Papal excommunication which was immediately denounced.

Richard I. had again taken the field, urged to fresh hostilities by the Emperor, who, from reasons with which we are unacquainted, had exchanged the alliance of Philippe for that of his recent prisoner. An equally unaccountable transition occurred in Richard himself, which indeed so far perplexed Rigordus that he does not scruple to ascribe it to the "direct miraculous interference of Providence, who regulates the counsels of Kings, and scatters the imaginations of the People at his own pleasure."[†] The armies were already in each other's presence near Issoudun, and a general battle was anticipated; when, contrary to all expectation, Richard, unarmed and attended by a small suite, rode to the French camp, voluntarily tendered homage for Normandy, Poitiers, and Anjou, and signed the preliminaries of a Peace, which was speedily ratified to be as speedily broken.[‡]

We know not by which party this Treaty was first violated, but when Richard once more appeared in arms, he was supported by Baldwin Count of Flanders, the future Latin Emperor of Constantinople, and by numerous other powerful Barons of France. The war, as before, was one of uncombined assaults and skirmishes; and unhappily was distinguished by much more than former barbarity. Whether the personal hatred of the two Kings had increased by the length of their rivalry, or whether the Brabançons whom Richard employed, under their leader Marchades, (soon about to become infamous by the perpetration of one of the most savage and perfidious acts recorded in History,§) imported extraordinary ferocity to the contest, is not to be decided; but we read with horror of numerous brutal inflictions and reprisals, of the drowning, blinding, and mutilation of prisoners on both sides. One act of Richard displays a less cruel spirit, and manifests no inconsiderable portion of humour. The Bishop of Beauvais having placed himself at the head of the troops of his See, was taken prisoner after a sharp engagement with Marchades, and Celestin III. solicited Richard for the freedom of his dear Son. The King despatched in return the Bishop's surcoat rent and bloody, and in the words of Joseph's Brothers inquired from the Pope, "This have we found; know now whether it be thy Son's coat or no."[¶]

The revenues of the French Crown were exhausted by continued war, and by subsidies which the King had afforded to Philip of Suabia in his contest for the Empire. As one expedient to recruit his shattered finances, Philippe sold to the Jews free permission to reestablish themselves in his dominions; and the general wear of his Ecclesiastics prophesied the vengeance of Heaven upon this departure from righteous persecution; and affirmed a reverse which he soon afterwards experienced to be a judgment and a visitation. The skirmish in which Philippe was worsted would be little worth mentioning did it not happen to be recorded by Richard himself in a Letter to the Bishop of Durham. The King of England, it seems, was in occupation of Dangu, after ravaging its neighbourhood and mastering several Castles; and Philip, not aware that a Fortress at Curcelle was in the power of his enemy, marched to its relief. Richard disposed his main body on the left bank of the river Epie at Dangu, and encountering his adversary near Gisors, charged him so home with no more than the few followers who constituted his personal suite, that the French betook themselves to instant flight.[‡] "The bridge," says Richard, "gave way under them; and the King of France, as we hear, had a taste of the river water, and about twenty of his men were drowned. I myself with a single lance unhorsed three Knights, and made them prisoners. Besides these we have taken about one hundred more, and Marchades has thirty whom I have not yet seen. The camp-followers, horse and footmen, who have fallen into our hands are innumerable, and moreover we have captured two hundred chargers, one hundred and forty of which are armed at all points. Thus have we conquered the King of France at Gisors, yet the victory is not ours, but that of God and our Right; and in the engagement we have hazarded

* Rigordus, p. 38. Sed quia facti sunt canes muti, non valentes latrare, timentes etiam pelli se, nihil ad perfectum deduxerunt. Of Philippe's disgust he says, Sed, mirum! eodem die, instigante Diabolo, ipse Rex, quibundam, ut dicitur, maleficus per varietas impudens, uxorem suam longo tempore captivam, exasum habere cepit. Ingeburge herself, in a letter to Celestin III., declares that her marriage was consummated; and then adds, that her husband instigante diabolo et quorundam malefactorum Principum persuasione imprisoned her in a Castle, ubi sic proscripta dego, quod ad castra levare oculos non audeo neque possum. Ap. Baluzii Murell. i. 422. Gilbert of Mons considers Philippe's alienation from his wife to have been entirely political, because her Father espoused the interests of the Count of Flanders. Ap. Hist. des Gaules, xviii. 371. We are unable to trace Velly's authority for asserting that when the Queen heard of Philippe's intention she burst into tears, and in broken French appeared to the Vatican, Mule France, male France! Rome, Rome! n. 176. Neither have we found authority for Metcay's statement of forbidden affinity between Philippe himself and Ingeburge, ii. 600. The Annalista Saxonico, cited in a note on the above passage in Rigordus, expressly says that the French Prelate and Barons, before whom Philippe laid his case in the first instance, pronounced that they found conjugum inter primam et secundam Reginam.

† P. 42.

‡ Roger Hoveden, ad ann., differs somewhat from this statement. Richard, he says, by a forced march unexpectedly relieved Issoudun, which Philippe had invested, and the latter, alarmed at the superior numbers of the enemy, negotiated for an unmediated retreat, which the King of England refused. In a subsequent parley, Peace was mediated by the Ecclesiastics. This account is certainly more probable than that of Rigordus.

§ Velly, in a singularly mistaken spirit, claims for Philippe

Auguste, instead of Marchades, the honour of the treacherous and inhuman punishment of Bertrand de Gourdon, the soldier who discharged the quarrel by which Richard I. was killed; and who was flayed alive after the dying King had pardoned and rewarded him, in consequence of his bold and noble avowal of his just causes of personal hostility. The French King, says the ultra-marchal Abbé, well fitted to live under that which once was the rule of French Kings, par grandeur d'âme, autant que par politique, vout tout à feu venger la mort d'un ennemi qu'il aimait, et parer à la cruauté des Sarrasins, dont, selon l'expression de Malherbe, il était lui-même le Seigneur et le Roi. ii. 189.

• Genesis, xxxvii. 32.

† Philippe Rex, contra omnium hominum opinionem, quoniam Regis edictum, Judæos Persuram reduxit, et Ecclesiæ Dei graviter est persecutus: quod de causâ parvo secuta est. Rigordus. (81) The Chronicle of St. Denis almost translates the above words, and adds, Pour se venger la mort d'un ennemi qu'il aimait, et parer à la cruauté des Sarrasins, dont, selon l'expression de Malherbe, il était lui-même le Seigneur et le Roi. (85.) And to the like purpose Guilelmus Americus. Ibid. 73.

History. our life and Kingdom, against the advice of our subjects."*

This action was the last in which the two Kings were to encounter each other; the mediation of the Pope led to a conference early in the year following in the presence of his Legate, in which the retention of conquests on either side formed the basis of a five years' truce. Within two months from that interview, the fatal treasure trove in a Vassal's territory allured Richard to

The petty fortress and the barren strand, before which the conqueror of Saladin was to fall a victim, partly of an almost nameless hand, partly, as is said, of his own too fervid passions.† With his death we may for the present suspend our notice of French History.

II. The transactions in GERMANY during the XIIIth Century continue for the most part so closely intermingled with those of ITALY that but one History appears to belong to the two Countries; and it is scarcely possible that their Annals should be treated separately without rendering each barren and jejune, even after copious and very wearisome repetition. We propose, therefore, at present to take up their double thread at the death of the Emperor Henry IV., and to pursue it through the reigns of his immediate five successors. Tranquilly as Henry V. possessed himself of the fruits of his unnatural rebellion, many months before the death of his Father, and securely rooted as was his authority, it by no means appears that his filial impiety was forgotten or disregarded by popular opinion. The terms in which the Chroniclers record a fearful tempest which passed over Goslar, while the Prince was holding a Diet in that City in the first year of his reign, sufficiently evince their tacit belief that it was a visitation which manifested the wrath of Heaven against the virtual Parricide. Henry himself was struck by lightning, his sword, the thong and inner fold of his shield (for the Monarchs presided armed in these Assemblies) were shivered, and the Council of the Nobles

* Fedra, London, 1816, i. 68. Roger Hoveden (589.) states that Richard had no more than sixty followers, Marchales, two hundred; that the French were very greatly superior in force; that Philippe separated from his followers, took refuge with an old man named Morel, one hundred and ten years of age, and when he quitted Normandy had only three or four soldiers and one servant in his company. Radulf de Diceto transcribes much of Richard's Letter, and rates the French at four hundred. (637.) In the Philippica we find a widely different estimate, Richard's whole army is represented to be one thousand five hundred horse and forty thousand foot, all which beset the march of Philippe, heading forty-four Knights and one hundred attendants, (chouteas.) The French nevertheless cut their way through, till ninety-two warriors of note were overpowered by numbers and captured. When the Bridge gave way the King swam unharmed to the bank.

At Regis sompna medium cum Rege per amnem Indemnis ripam se vexit in ulteriorem, and not a single life was lost by his troops either on the field or in the river. v. 351—440. All this is plainly a flattering unctio to National vanity, a sedative for Philippe's mortification. The Chronicle of St. Denis, ut sup. allows Philippe five hundred horse.

† The latter cause is not mentioned by Roger de Hoveden, who attributes Richard's death chiefly to the mismanagement of the surgeon, caruifex ille, as he styles him. (595.) The Philippica expressly says that the King would have recovered but for his own imprudence.

*Nec lethalis erat percussio, et medicorum
Res et amicum monitus audire salubres
Aufugit; unde male Pateris dum gaudia nano Præfert conatio, mortem sibi necans adacti,*

v. 601.

was broken up in dismay.* The turbulence of his future reign may have strengthened the impression that he was marked out for judgment; and even in its outset his arms were unsuccessful. In an invasion of Silesia, at that time under the rule of Poland, his troops were repulsed by King Bodeslaus; and in a subsequent negotiation for Peace, the Ambassador of that Prince maintained as great superiority in the Cabinet as his master had before evinced in the field. Notwithstanding his defeat, Henry proposed harsh and inequitable conditions; and thinking to dazzle or to terrify the Envoy, whom he affected to treat as a Barbarian, he threw open before him many coffers full of treasure, with a declaration that it should all be expended in the conquest of Poland. The Minister, undisturbed by the threat, drew a ring from his finger, and tossing it on one of the glittering heaps, carelessly replied, "Add that gold to your other gold."† Henry, abashed by the unexpected contempt with which his vaunt had been received, was at a loss for words, and answered with a simple expression of thanks. The German Hab-dank, Thank-ye, was thenceforward attached by the Poles to the Family name of their Ambassador Scarbicus;‡ and the Habdankii long maintained the reputation of the ancestor from whom they derived their title.

Seldom has the change of opinion so often consequent upon the attainment of power manifested itself more strongly than in the instance of Henry V.; for almost instantly on his accession he became opposed to Rome in support of the very principles which he had denounced in his father. It was at the close of the year 1109 that he entered Italy, with the ostensible motive of celebrating his Coronation; but the thirty thousand men who accompanied him must have convinced Pascal II. that their leader was prepared also to enforce that right of Investiture which he had most unexpectedly asserted. Severe inflictions upon certain towns which closed their gates marked his passage through Lombardy and Tuscany; and when he advanced towards Rome and negotiated a preliminary Treaty at Sutri, its terms sufficiently betrayed the alarm of Pascal. The compromise to which the Pope assented was a surrender of all fiefs bestowed on the Clergy by former Emperors, in return for which most substantial concession he was permitted to retain in his own hands the now empty administration of Investiture. Of Pascal's good faith in this transaction there is little reason to doubt, and indeed much of his subsequent conduct attests the general sincerity of his character. But the Conclave and the Prelates of his Court vehemently opposed this Treaty; and on the day fixed for the Emperor's Coronation, when nothing remained but that the terms should be ratified, in the presence of the great concourse assembled in the Basilica of the Vatican to witness that solemnity, the Clergy with one voice declared that the Instrument to which the Pope had consented was heretical, and therefore that it must be annulled. Indignant at this violation of promise, and suspecting Pascal of collusion, Henry, undeterred by the sanctity of either place or person, seized the Holy Father and his attendant Cardinals, and Italy.

Germany

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.
War with Poland.
A. D.
1109.

Scarbicus Habdankii.

Henry's first expedition to Italy.
A. D.
1109.

He imprisoned
Pascal II.
A. D.
1110.

* Struvius i. 342, and the authorities there cited.

† "Jungatur aurum aurum." As the Poles commonly spoke Latin there can be little doubt that these were the very words employed. The story is told by Curmus in his Annales Silesie, p. 47, and also by Cromerus, de Rebus Polonie, lib. v. p. 114.

‡ Curmus, ut sup., gives the name Scarbicus, in which he is followed by Heins, lib. ii. c. 10.

History.

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1194.
Tumult in Rome.

Pascal succeeds the English Investiture.

Coronation
of Henry.

The Treaty disavowed by a Council.

A. D.
1112.

bore them from the Church, and consigned them as prisoners to the custody of the Patriarch of Aquileia. In a tumult which ensued on the following morning, the Roman populace, excited by the Ecclesiastics, ran to arms, overthrew the slight body guard which attended Henry in the Leonine City, and, but for the seasonable attraction of plunder, might have prevented his escape from the great danger by which he was encompassed. Every German who could be seized was ruthlessly put to the sword; the Emperor himself, nearly surprised in bed, sprang on his saddle, and fought like a common man at arms, till his horse was killed under him, and he was wounded in the face. The Count of Milan observing his peril, dismounted, and offering his own horse, scarcely saw his Prince in safety before he was himself torn to pieces by the infuriated rabble.* A reinforcement from the camp enabled Henry to inflict signal vengeance upon the Citizens; and having razed part of their walls, he took up a secure position at a few miles' distance, carrying with him his prisoners.

Three months' rigorous confinement, and menaces of yet more extreme proceedings if opposition were continued, induced Pascal to accede to a yet further surrender than had been proposed before. By his own signature and that of sixteen of his principal Clergy, he granted to Henry the right of Investiture in his own dominions, with a single proviso against Simony. He solemnly promised also never to excommunicate him; and at the especial request of the Hypocrite, he at length accorded the rites of Christian Burial to the deceased Emperor, whose life himself, jointly with his petitioner, had embittered and hastened to its close.† Immediately on the conclusion of the Treaty, Henry reentered Rome, was crowned by the hands of Pascal, and before parting shared with him a consecrated Wafer, broken with this solemn adjuration: "As one portion of this Host is now divided from the other, so may that one of us twain who shall violate this Peace be for ever divided from the Kingdom of Christ!‡"

The gates of Rome were closed and guarded during this ceremony, so little confidence did Henry feel in the peaceable disposition of its inhabitants; and no sooner was the Rite concluded than he commenced his homeward march to Germany. As he retired, the boldness of the discontented Prelates increased, and they loudly demanded from Pascal a disavowal of his recent Treaty. In a Council which the Pope was compelled to summon at the Lateran for the determination of this question, he was abandoned by the Cardinals whose signatures, jointly with his own, had attested the document which procured them liberty; and which they now concurred with their indignant Brethren in rejecting. Pascal was of firmer and sincerer temper, and deaf to every solicitation of his Clergy, he steadily adhered to his promise. He could not prevent, but he would not confirm the fierce Edicts which issued from this Council; he took no share in the annulment of that "most detestable and scarcely to be mentioned Treaty," as the Cardinals declared it to be, "which was not a privilegium, but a prævilgium extorted by Henry;" nor would he leud his sanction to their denouncement of the Emperor as one treacherous, perjured, and sacrilegious, who after kissing the feet, mouth, and cheek of the Vicar of Christ, had betrayed him, like another Judas; and who therefore was excommunicated, anathematized, and cut off from the bosom of the Church. Bigoted as might be the opposition by which Pascal had hurled the miserable Henry IV. from the throne, and pursued him even to the very grave, he was still honest in his prejudices. It was by no means for the temporal wealth of his Church that he had at any time contended, but rather for its independence from that which he esteemed a violation of its spiritual supremacy.*

These idle censures little disconcerted Henry; but meantime he had full employment in his Transalpine dominions. A close alliance with England had long been one of his favourite objects; probably because the King of France, who had espoused the cause of the Pope, was at perpetual variance with Henry I. his Vassal in Normandy. Even in his fifth year,† therefore, he had demanded the hand of Henry's daughter Matilda; in her eighth, she was betrothed to him, and sent to Germany for the express purpose of education in the Language and Manners of that Country. The nuptials were celebrated when the young Princess had scarcely passed her twelfth birthday, and she received from her Father a rich portion of £45,000, levied by a tax of three shillings on every hyde of land in England.‡ It is agreeable occupation was the restraint of the Saxons ever opposed to the House of Franconia, who continued to insurgency under their Duke Lothaire,§ and but for the opposition of Frederic of Swabia|| might have changed

* Voltaire could not be expected to resist an opportunity of visiting sarcasms against a Pope. Pascal, he says, was plus d'un prisonnier qu'à l'entrel; and again, Pascal ne trouva pas un seul de ses Cardinaux et ses Légats dans tous les Royaumes d'Occident en reconnaissance pour Henry I. Ann. de l'Empire, ad ann. 1111. But Voltaire was not in the habit of examining his authorities duly; and two writers of our own times, upon whom implicit confidence may be placed, have borne ample evidence to Pascal's integrity. Il tint religieusement de bonne foi is M. de Sismondi's observation relating the proceedings of this Council of Lateran. (Rep. h. i. 20. ch. iii.) Mr. Hallam also describes him as "conscientious," and as acting in the dispute about Investiture "with steady but disinterested prejudice;" pointing at the same time to a Letter from the Pope to Anselm, (ap. Schmidt, i. 304.) "in which he seems to imply that he thought it better for the Church to be without riches, than to enjoy them on condition of doing homage to Laymen." (Middle Ages, ii. 47.) Muratori, in his honest and homely style, has well defended Pascal: E un bel fare d'uomo lungo delle bestie; e que' rebelli Cardinali si fossero trovati per due anni nelle angustie d'Ugo, e col coltello alla gola, come egli fu, e nel pericolo di veder sacrificati ad furor Tedesco i Porporati prigioni e tanti altri Romani: non so se ne avessero praticato egliem ciò, che ora esigono i Papi. Id. sup.

† Wilhelmus Gemeticensis, vii. 11.

‡ Voltaire in this instance also has attacked the faith of our History without sufficient grounds. On prétend que on frama un parricidat une femme qui retourné à environ neuf cent mille livres sterling. Les Historiens manquent tous d'exactitude sur ces faits; et l'Histoire de ces temps-là n'est que trop souvent un amas des suppositions. (Id. sup.) Hume, however, has shown that the raggard's tests with modern writers, (Brady, 270. Tyrrel, i. 182.) who have loosely miscalculated the sum at £500,000; not with Henry of Huntingdon, who states no more than truth. "Five hydes, sometimes less, made a Knight Fee, of which there were about 60,000 in England; consequently near 300,000 hydes; and at the rate of three shillings a hyde, the sum would amount to £45,000 or £135,000 of our present money. See Rudburne, p. 257." (Hist. of England, i. note B at the end of the volume.) The portion, however, was considered very ample. Henricus flamm regis more dotavit, say the Annals of Hildesheim, ad ann. 1110: Argentis decem milibus marcos cum filia Rex opulentius donavit et regali more munera insignia donavit. Ordeneus Vitalis, x.

§ The successor of Henry V. in the Imperial Crown.

|| Father of the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa.

* Muratori, Annali d'Italia, ad ann. 1111.

† The permission for interment was granted by Pascal upon receiving an assurance that Henry IV. died con aliti di vero pentimento. Id. ibid.

‡ Paulus Diaconus, iv. 40. Sigebertus Gemblacensis, ad ann.

History.
—France
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1193. second expulsion to Italy.
A. D.
1116.

the Imperial dynasty even in the lifetime of Henry. The Peace of Goslar which terminated this intestine struggle, although not till the year 1120,—may be named as the epoch at which the House of Guelf gave most distinct manifestations of its rapid ascendancy.

While engaged in these domestic troubles, the Emperor was again summoned to Italy, soon after the death of the Great Countess Matilda; * by whose bequest to the Holy See it seemed as if her Crown would be deprived of the rich Feudal reversion of her Fiefs, his Family of the heritage of her personal property. Her right over the latter was not disputed, but her Fiefs and territories were declared unalienable; and Henry having forcibly occupied them proceeded to Rome. Pascal retired at his approach; and the year following terminated the career of a Pope who possessed many qualities better adapted to less unquiet times. The successor elected by the Cardinals under the title of Gelasius II. refused all compromise with the Emperor; and Henry accordingly, occupying Rome, raised Burdino, Archbishop of Braganza,† to the Holy See by his own single authority, and, notwithstanding the reclamations of the Clergy, inaugurated him as Gregory VIII.

Gelasius II.
Pope.
1118.

The Pisans, whose great maritime strength had been displayed on the shores of Palestine, and at the conquest of Majorca, as well as in sweeping their neighbouring seas of the Infidels, afforded refuge to Gelasius when he was driven from the Vatican; and the gratitude which the Pope exhibited in return was the proximate cause of a long and sanguinary War against those whose kindness he intended to repay. It was not without the bitterest jealousy that the Genoese beheld the aggrandizement of their great rival, when the Holy Father declared the Bishop of Corsica to be Suffragan to the Archbishop of Pisa; an honour received with unbounded demonstrations of joy by those upon whom it was conferred. War was the immediate consequence, and fourteen years of active and desolating hostility followed upon the bounty of the Pope; yet strange to say, the Commerce of both States,—whose success and whose sufferings during this contest were nearly equal,—appeared to derive increase of vigour from every fresh vessel which was sunk, every town which was pillaged, and every citizen who was slain. It was not till Innocent II., flying like Gelasius from Rome, and finding similar asylum in Pisa, in 1133, employed his mediation, that Peace was obtained; and it was then purchased by the consent of the Holy Father to equalize the spiritual authority of the rivals, by elevating the See of Genoa into an Archbishopric independent on the Metropolitan of Milan.

War between Pisa and Genoa.
A. D.
1119. to
A. D.
1133.

Gelasius II.
Pope.
A. D.
1119.

The Schism in the Popedom endured for more than two years, till on the death of Gelasius in France, the vacant Tiara was bestowed on a Pontiff of greater energy; and Calixtus II. hastening to his Capital, established himself firmly in power, and secured the person of his rival. Burdino was captured at Sutri, clothed in raw and bleeding skins just stripped from slaughtered goats; mounted with his face to the tail of a camel, between the crookedness of which animal, and the crooked practices of the "Antichrist who bestrode it," the Abbé Suger, whom we were following, takes especial pains to note the analogy; * paraded through the streets of Rome in this ignominious guise; and then committed to perpetual imprisonment. As a monument also of his degradation, he was painted in one of the Halls of the Vatican trampled under foot by Calixtus.

The overthrow of this competitor freed the new Pope from his chief apprehension; and when Henry, wearied with a dispute which appeared endless, forbore from naming a successor to Burdino, and expressed a willingness to negotiate, Calixtus met the proposal with frankness. The Papal Legates were accordingly invited to a solemn Diet at Worms, and in that Assembly the long-continued struggle concerning Investitures was terminated by a Concordat, in which, although each party appeared to recede from the high pretensions once advanced, the triumph and the benefit substantially belonged to Rome.† The Emperor renounced for ever his right of investing Bishops by the Ring and Crosier, and accorded to the Ecclesiastical Chapters full liberty of election on vacancies: the Pope conceded, on the other hand, that these elections should be made in the presence of the Emperor, or of his Commissaries, and that the Ecclesiastics should receive their temporalities by the Sceptre. That entire independence on Feudal obligation which had been the object of Hildebrand certainly was not gained; nevertheless, as the Prelates when they now offered themselves to the Sceptre for their Fiefs, would be fully possessed of their Episcopal character, and already invested with the Ring and Crosier, there must be no small boldness in the Sovereign who should venture to deny temporal rights to those whom the Spiritual authorities had fully recognised.

Germany and Italy.
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.

Diet of Worms.
A. D.
1122.

Termination of the dispute concerning Investitures.

The inglorious expedition against Louis le Gros, which we have already noticed in our ANNALS OF FRANCE,‡ is the sole remaining transaction worthy of record during the reign of Henry V. He languished for some months under a painful, and in his time a hopeless disease, the draguncular, in which the ulcer caused by a flesh-worm daily enlarges till life is tediously exhausted; and he died at Utrecht on the twenty-second of Death of Henry V.

A. D.
1125.

* Tortum animal Camelo tortum Antipapam, immo Antichristum, erudit et sanguinolenta pellicis caprina amictum, transversum superposuerunt. Vita Lud. Grossi, 47. Transcursus might signify that he was thrown across the Camel like a sack, but we render it "with his face to the tail," on the authority of the Grandes Chroniques de France, (id. 179.) in which the writer, who evidently borrows his account from Suger, expresses himself, le firent saoir le vis devers la cove.

† Hallam, Middle Ages, ii. 51. Hoc modo Pax inter Papam et Imperatorem, et magno Imperii detrimento, constituta est; neque Henricus Pontificibus penam dedit impetitus aduersum Patrem. Mathieu. Theat. Hist. 918. The Benedictine writer in L'Art de vérifier les Dates has taken a widely different view of the close of this great struggle. As the passage is curious from its mistaken reasoning, we subjoin it. Par ce Traité l'Empereur renonce à l'usage que ses prédécesseurs lui avoient transmis de donner les Investitures par la croix et l'anneau, et le Pape lui permit de lui conférer par le sceptre ou une simple verge, comme faisoient les Rois de France et d'Angleterre; c'est à dire qu'au lieu d'un bâton recourbé il lui permit d'user d'un bâton droit pour cette cérémonie. Voilà donc où aboutit cette langue et funeste querelle qui causa tant de ravages, fit répandre tant de sang, enfanta tant de crimes, et fit rétrograder la sainteté du Siège Apostolique et la Majesté du Trône Impérial. Dans ce dénouement ingrat, si toute la gloire fut pour Calixte, à qui son amour pour la Paix le suggéra, l'avantage fut tout entier pour l'Empereur, qui ne perdit rien du fond de ses prétentions, et demeura aussi maître des élections auparavant. ii. 20.

‡ P. 614.

4 M

* July 24, 1115.

† He is spoken of but rudely by the Chronicler. Henricus Imperator urbem ingressus Beatinam quondam nomine Burdinum super intravit, are the words of Gerhohus, cap. 22. The Annals of Hildebrand notice that Calixtus excommunicated Imperatorem cum Idolo suo, hoc enim nomine quem ipse substituit vocatus est. Ad ann. 1118. Petrus Diaconus speaks of Mauritius Arcemarcha, (iv. 64.) and Constantius Urspergensius of Pseudopapa Burdinus, p. 277. The Chronicler of Maurigeni, although he calls him Antipope, very honestly admits him to have been litteratus, et curialem, et eloquentem virum. (Ap. Hist. des Gaules, xii.)

VOL. XI.

History.
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.

Diet at Mentz.

Election of Lothaire II.

May without male issue, and without any fixed arrangement as to the succession.*

With Henry V. terminated the direct line of Franconia, after possessing the Imperial Crown for exactly a Century. The extinction of hereditary claim restored their full rights of Election to the German Princes; and the Archbishop of Mentz, who in the late reign had disgracefully signalled himself by appearing in arms against the Emperor, and who still avowed hostility to the collateral branches of his House, soon after the Imperial obsequies, summoned a Diet at the Capital of his Diocese. The banks of the Rhine were covered with armed men, and seldom was a prouder gathering beheld in Germany. On one side of the river were pitched the tents of Frederick of Hohenstauffen, Duke of Suabia, a nephew of the late Emperor; on the other those of Lothaire, Duke of Saxony, and of Leopold, Marquis of Austria, his Brother-in-law; and in the joint train of these Princes followed not fewer than sixty thousand soldiers. A solemn Mass was celebrated; and after an invocation of the Holy Ghost by the Hymn Veni Creator Spiritus, to direct their choice, a Committee of ten Electors was set apart from the four great Provinces of the Empire. It is little likely that the designs entertained upon the Crown by the three Princes above-named were concealed from the Body of the Nobles; yet when they were declared the most fitting aspirants to the vacant throne, Frederick at first declined to appear before the Council; and his competitors, throwing themselves upon their knees and shedding tears abundantly, professed their unworthiness of the offered dignity, and their unwillingness to sustain its burden. When Frederick, deceived perhaps by this artifice, at length presented himself, the Archbishop of Mentz demanded a solemn pledge from each of the three Candidates, that the two who might happen to be rejected would yield obedience to their more fortunate rival. The Duke of Saxony and the Marquis of Austria readily accorded the promise, once more renewing their feigned protestations of reluctance; but the Duke of Suabia, as the Archbishop had foreseen, declined any answer without previous consultation with his friends, and hastily withdrew. On the following day, the sitting was renewed in his absence; and there can be little doubt that by preconcerted arrangement, a cry of "Lothaire! Lothaire!" was raised in the Camp. The Duke of Saxony was lifted on the shoulders of the troops, and borne through their ranks with deafening shouts; and by the dexterous management of the Archbishop, this tumultuary election was in the end recognised by the Princes.*

After a contest thus maintained between parties nearly equal in power, Civil war was an inevitable result, and Alsace, in which Frederick had large possessions, was the first scene of hostilities. On the return of his brother Conrad from Palestine, operations were renewed with greater activity; Lothaire was compelled to raise the siege of Nuremberg, which he had invested; and Conrad, elated by this success, assumed the title of King, at Spire, and passed into Italy in the hope of conciliating the attachment and receiving the homage of the Lombards. Distinguished success awaited him at Milan, in which Capital, and at Monza also, he celebrated his Coronation; but the Pope, Honorius II., refused his sanction; the other chief Cities of Lombardy espoused the cause of Lothaire; the Pretender was excommunicated, and unable to procure supplies either of men or money, after lingering nearly three years in inactivity, he withdrew to Germany on intelligence that Lothaire was preparing to traverse the Alps. The force, however, which accompanied Lothaire was too weak to excite alarm;† and so little confidence had he in his own resources, that he made a considerable circuit in order to avoid the risk of opposition which he might encounter if he entered Milan. Rome, to which he hastened, was at that time agitated by a disputed succession to the Popedom, on the death of Honorius; and the Emperor, having snatched rather than received his Crown from Innocent II.; whose pretensions he favoured, and who, dispossessed of the Vatican by his competitor, was compelled to perform the imperfect ceremony in St John Lateran, speedily returned to Germany. Feeble as were the powers of Lothaire, those of the Brothers of Franconia were still more feeble, and when Ulm, their chief hope, had fallen, they sought Peace by submission. The superiority of the Emperor is attested by the humiliation to which Frederick was reduced; for it was not till he had secured the mediatorial offices of the Empress that he ventured to approach the Imperial presence, and, even then, he stood barefooted before his conqueror.‡ Conrad effected his reconciliation, not long afterwards, upon renouncing the Kingly title; and as a pledge of sincere confidence in his fidelity, Lothaire intrusted him with a high command in a fresh expedition, which he was meditating into Italy.

In order to understand the objects of this expedition it is necessary that we should retrace our steps during the last few years. By the death of William Guiscard, without children, in 1127, the whole of the great conquests of the Normans in Southern Italy were united in the person of his Cousin Roger, second Count of Sicily, who, together with that Island, now swayed Apulia and Calabria. The increased extent of his dominions kindled in this Prince a not unnatural desire

* He died, says Voltaire, and not perhaps with too great exactitude, avec la réputation d'un fils débauché, d'un hypocrite sans Religion, d'un cousin inquiet, d'un mauvais maître. Annales de l'Empire, ad ann. By Matilda he had one daughter Christina, married to Udalais of Poland. She was a woman of fiery and impetuous temper, not much beloved by the people among whom she had settled, if we may trust the description of the Chronicler; superba, avara, et ambigua mulier, et quæ dolens omnes in porcorum loco habebat, nec eos ad ministerium, nec vix ad conspectum suum admittit. Martinus Cromerus, de Reb. Polonæ, lib. vi. p. 138. A savage instance of her indulgence in revenge is mentioned by the same writer, p. 141. A Noble (Petrus Datus Comes Scrinensis, as he is termed.) had awakened her husband's jealousy, by an incautious, and probably a sportive remark concerning one of her attendants; and Christina discovering the author, persuaded Udalais, notwithstanding a long familiarity subsisting between them, to pluck out the tongue and eyes of his friend. Yet so great was the sufferer's piety, that he afterwards recovered both speech and sight, "ut ferunt non nulli." Christina, in the end, kindled a Civil war between her husband and his brothers, which terminated in the flight of Udalais and the banishment of herself and her children.

* This curious narrative of Lothaire's election is constructed by Struvius on numerous authorities, most of which he cites. i. 357. † It did not exceed two thousand men, according to the Chronicle of Falco of Beneventum, p. 115.

‡ It was from an oath administered by Innocent to Lothaire before his Coronation, that the Pope affected to call the King a Pief of the Holy See. Great offence was given in Germany by a Picture which was placed in the Lateran, representing Lothaire at the Pontiff's feet, and inscribed with the following dithic,

Rex venit ante furca, jurans prius urbis humori, Post homo fit Papa, sumit quo dante coronam;

in which lines homo is to be translated vaissal.

§ Chronographus Saxo, ad ann. 1134.

History.
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.
Frequent allusions in luna.

from between Anastasia II. and Innocent II.
A. D.
1130.

Roger II. crowned King of the Two Sicilies.

for a loftier title than those of Count and Duke; and an opportunity of acquiring it was soon afforded him by the distracted state of the Pontificate. The Romans, fickle in obedience, were for ever revolting from the weak, mixed, and ambiguous authority of their Popes. Hildebrand himself, the most vigorous spirit which ever occupied the Chair of the Apostle, was chased from his Capital and died in exile. Among his successors, Pascal II. was involved in continued Civil war with his subjects. Gelasius II. was assailed before the very altar, while engaged in his sacerdotal duties, by the brutal and profane violence of a factious Baron; and scarcely had his enemy, Cencio Frangipane, been pardoned for the first sacrilegious attack, before he perpetrated a second with greater atrocity. Dragged from the Temple, severely wounded, fettered, and exposed to scorn in the public streets, Gelasius, when rescued, passed the remainder of his short reign at a distance from the scene of tumult. On the death of Honorius II. in 1130, a portion of the Electors was bribed by the largesses of a rich Family, the Leoni, inveterately hostile to the Frangipani, and reputed to be of Jewish extraction; and a kinsman of that House, when nominated to the vacant Pontificate, assumed the title of Anacletus.* A Cardinal of inferior birth was at the same time elected by others under the style of Innocent II. The supporters of the former at Rome were more numerous and more powerful than those of his rival, and Innocent, compelled to flight, sought refuge in France. It was rather, however, from Lothaire than from Louis le Gros, too much occupied with domestic cares, that Innocent was likely to receive aid; and that aid became doubly necessary when Roger of Sicily espoused the interests of his competitor. To Anacletus, the friendship of a Prince so immediately his neighbour, and so abundantly furnished with means of affording protection, was worth purchasing by almost any concession; and by gratifying the ambition of his ally, when he invested him with the title of King of Sicily, Calabria, and Apulia,† he appeared to confirm his own stability on the Papal throne.‡ Emboldened by promises of active support which he had received from Lothaire, Innocent, however, returned to Rome, and there securing himself in the Lateran, thought to await the march of his ally. Meanwhile, the space between that Palace and the Vatican was contested sword in hand by the two spiritual opponents; and some of the choicest monuments of ancient Rome suffered from the blind fury by which they were attacked when converted into fortresses. The brickwork erected during these contests in order to strengthen the defences raised on the summit of the marble gateway of Janus still deforms its remains;§ and the Triumphal arches of Titus and of Constantine are believed to have been equally misemployed. It was at that time, when the Normans garrisoned almost all the Churches, and amongst them St. Peter's, that Lothaire solemnized his Coronation, and withdrew from Rome without ability to attempt the restoration of Innocent.

* Baronius, ad ann. Struvius, i. 360.

† Coronam Regni Siciliae, et Calabriae, et Apuliae, &c. Bol's Anacleti.

‡ The right of Anacletus to bestow the Investiture was no less empty founded than that of Leo IX. when he made a similar grant to Robert Guiscard after the Battle of Civitella. See ch. lux. p. 543.

§ Montfaucon, Diarium Italicum, p. 186. Ventruti, Roma, i. p. 5. Barleu, Antiquities of Rome, p. 200. (1821.)

During the few succeeding years, Roger Guiscard pursued an almost uninterrupted career of victory; he subdued his own refractory Vassals; he conquered Amalfi; chased from Capua its hereditary Prince, Robert; and made large preparations for the investment of Naples. That siege, the most important operation which he had yet attempted, demanded the assemblage of his entire force; and Amalfi, by the withdrawal of its garrison, was exposed to a coup de main from the Pisans, who had espoused the cause of Innocent. A small armament, not amounting to fifty vessels, entered the Port and pillaged the City; an event which, however trifling in itself, will ever preserve its place in Historical remembrance from the discovery which is then believed to have occurred, of the lost Pandects of Justinian. The victors were intercepted before they could make good their retreat; but they succeeded in bearing off that most valuable portion of their spoil; which till the chance of War transferred it to Florence, where it still remains, was during nearly three Centuries the proudest boast of the Pisan Capital.*

The news of these successes of the Normans was far from being grateful to the ears of Lothaire; for the

* The History of the Pandects is exhausted by Brencmann in his most learned and most entertaining volume, (Hist. Pandectarum), the fruit of ten years' labour, under the patronage of George I. Their discovery at Amalfi was noticed for the first time in 1541, by Ludovicus de Bologna, on the authority of an anonymous Pisan Chronicle without date. Nevertheless, Brencmann, after close examination, is well inclined to admit that the account is true, and it is certain that so early as the XIVth Century the MS. was consulted at Pisa by Bartolus. Brencmann plainly establishes that it must have been during this chance assault in 1135, not during the much more important occupation and plunder of Amalfi two years afterwards, that the Pisans obtained this treasure. His words are pointed. Almost all authors, he observes, confound hancuram expeditionem in Amalfinam, quæ arorum et mero causa suscepta, adroque minus nota est, cum eâ quam solum doctus annus post magno apparatu fecerunt, præsentis et insensibilis Lothario. Quæ et plerique non nisi posterorum expeditionem videri innuissæ. (Lib. i. c. 7. p. 36.) It is not a little remarkable that Gibbon, who in no less than five notes refers very copiously to Brencmann, has altogether overlooked this passage, and has fallen into the common error of attributing the discovery of the Pandects to the year 1137. (Ch. xlv. vol. viii. p. 44.) Brencmann altogether discredits the received belief that the Pisans retained their booty by the permission of Lothaire, who by the assistance of this MS. is said to have revived the study of Roman Jurisprudence in Germany. If the precious roll had been captured in the second attack on Amalfi, the Emperor, who was then in Italy, and near the spot, might have interfered; as it was, he was in Germany, and probably was in entire ignorance of the fact. M. de Sismondi, without commenting on the matter, has adopted the correct date. (Rep. h. i. 287.) The Florentines captured Pisa in 1406, and five years afterwards conveyed the Pandects to their own City, where they still exist, and where they used to be exhibited by torch-light in the presence of two Magistrates and two Cistercian Monks; all persons being uncovered when they were taken out from their rich casket, and untied from their silken covers and silver clasps. Sunt autem ista volumina Antiquiora rubro ligata argenteis clausula ornata, says Laurence Theodorus Gronovius, (Indicatio ad Editiones Pandectarum), who had three or four months' close access to them under the inspection of Magliabechi. The MS. was long believed by many authorities, and among them by not less a scholar than Politian, to be an original of the time of Justinian himself. Brencmann refutes this opinion, but nevertheless assigns a date as early as the VIIIth Century. Here again Gibbon says "the early part of the VIIIth." Mr. Hallam is more sceptical than most of his predecessors concerning the Invention of the Pandects. "The fact," he says, "though not improbable, seems not to rest on sufficient evidence." (Middle Ages, i. 561.) Gibbon does not refuse belief; for although he points out that the story was unknown in the XIIIth Century, and that it has been both embellished and suspected, he nevertheless admits that it "is not destitute of much internal probability." The 11d Chapter of the XIIIth Book of Giannone abounds with Learning on the Pandects.

4 M 2

Germany
and Italy.

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.
Victories of the Normans.
The Pan-dicts discovered at Amalfi.
A. D.
1135.

Second expedition of Lothaire to Italy.

A. D.
1137.

History. King of Sicily, encouraged by his subjugation of nearly a third of Italy, might ere long affect the Sovereignty of the whole Peninsula; and the slender authority still remaining to the Empire beyond the Alps might be entirely swept away. These fears, which could not but arise spontaneously, were encouraged by Robert, the exiled Prince of Capua, who solicited aid in the German Court; and additional reasons for interference were prompted by the zeal of St. Bernard, who reminded Lothaire of his former engagements with Innocent, and exhibited the wrongs of that still unthroned Pontiff as the general concern of every true soldier of Christ. Urged by these powerful motives, the Emperor resolved to make a second descent upon Italy; and the army which he levied was now proportionate to the great object of his expedition. But his progress was slow; many months were consumed in Lombardy, while he adjusted the disputes submitted to his arbitration by the conflicting Cities; and Anacletus was to be chased from Rome before the Germans could undertake the relief of Naples. At length, when famine had driven the exhausted garrison of that City to the utmost extremity of suffering, their constancy was rewarded by the welcome appearance of their deliverers. As Lothaire advanced, the defeated Normans everywhere fled before his arms; and the continental dominions of Roger melted away, till in the end not a town remained to him beyond the Strait of Messina. In this short, but most brilliant campaign, important services were rendered to the Emperor by the Pisans. Already, before his arrival at Naples, entering its bay with a victorious fleet, they had thrown temporary supplies into the starving City, and then proceeded onward to a second and most destructive assault on Amalfi. That City was almost defenceless when the hostile armament approached; and had it not been for its great wealth, and for the jealousy excited by its maritime preeminence, it might have been occupied peaceably, and have escaped unharmed. Some show of resistance in a fort by which it was guarded, afforded a pretext for violence and rapine; and the treasures of its fifty thousand opulent and luxurious inhabitants became the prey of a lawless soldiery. The blow was never recovered; and that State, the Parent of Modern Commerce, whose Factories at one time accumulated riches in every Port of Greece, Egypt, and Syria, continued gradually to deteriorate; till in the commencement of the XVth Century, her population had dwindled below one thousand Fishermen, little capable of even repairing the Cathedral, the Arsenal, and the Palaces, the remains of which testified her former magnificence.*

It remained that the territory conquered from the Normans should be bestowed upon some new master. In their choice of a Duke of Apuglia, no difference arose between the Pope and the Emperor; and Rainulf, Count of Avellino, a brother-in-law of Roger, who had bitterly opposed him on account of family disagreements,† was selected by both the Feudal Lords as a fit tenant of their Fief. But so knotty was the question of Investi-

* Amalfi is the birthplace of Flavio Gioja, the inventor or the improver of the Mariner's compass, in the early half of the XIVth Century; and also of the adventurous Fisherman Massaniello, who, in 1647, afforded an example of one of those strange antics which are exhibited quoties voluit Fortuna jocari.

† Roger protected his sister with whom Rainulf had quarrelled and parted; and in consequence he stripped the Count of his territories. He also savagely mutilated one of his brothers, who had offended him by some incautious speeches, depriving him both of eyes and nose. Giannone, xi. 1.

ture, so important was it considered to determine from whose hands that Prince should receive the symbols of his authority, that not less than thirty days were occupied in the discussion; and the controversy was at last terminated by "the mercy of heaven," which suggested a wise compromise between the disputants; so that when the Goafanion was presented to their joint Vassal, Lothaire grasped one end of its staff, while the other was handled by Innocent.‡ Before the close of the year, and the confederacy was dissolved by mutual jealousy; and the death of the Emperor in a wretched hut in the village of Breduwan, among the Trentine Alps, he crossed them on his return home, once again changed the fortunes of Southern Italy. Few Sovereigns of Germany have left behind them a fairer reputation than Lothaire; prompt, bold, and courageous, he was nevertheless a lover of Peace; his charity and devotion are the theme of Ecclesiastical praise; and one who was himself no mean Chronicler of his times, has recorded his master as a lover and a student of History.†

The two chief enemies of Roger, his brothers-in-law Rainulf, and Robert of Capua, who had brought down upon him the German invasion, were now fully possessed of his continental dominions. But the departure of the Emperor, and the dispersion of the allies, permitted the King of Sicily to take the field with an army, which his foes, unsupported by foreign aid, were wholly incompetent to resist. The greater part of Apuglia was recovered by him before the close of the year, and he crossed to Sicily in the Winter to make preparation for a yet more successful campaign. Before his return, the Antipope, Anacletus, was no more; and the exertions of St. Bernard so far prevailed with the faction which had supported him, that although a puppet was at first elected under the name of Victor IV., both this short-lived Pope and the Cardinals to whom he owed election, speedily tendered submission to Innocent; thus terminated one of the many unseemly Schisms by which the pretended Unity of the See of Rome has been distracted. Elated, doubtless, by this first stable confirmation in power, and not deterred by an unexpected loss in the death of Duke Rainulf, Innocent, early in the next Summer, trod in the steps of his predecessor, Leo IX., and headed his own troops with similar ill fortune. Compelled to break up the siege of the Castle of Galluccio, he was taken prisoner in his hasty retreat; and was brought to the camp of Roger, not, as it seems, without some personal injury and insult.‡ Roger.

* Devoti fervente clementis are the words employed by the Chronicles Fulco of Beneventum in relating the close of this schism. See also Otto Frisingensis, lib. vii. cap. 20.

† The words of Petrus Diaconus of Ostia, who records this tale of Lothaire, remind us of King Ahasuerus, and appear almost translated from the Book of Esther. Noctem illam Imperator per totam diem innoxens, jussuque ante se reclusi omnia (ista) autem suorum suorum. (Lib. iv. ch. 108.) "On that night could not the King sleep, and he commanded to bring the Book of Records of the Chronicles, and they were read before the King." Esther, ii. 1.

‡ Falco Beneventanus, Vita S. Bernardi, ad ann. 1138. Petrus Diaconus, iv. cap. ult. attributes the termination of the Schism to gold seasonably distributed by Innocent. Giannone finds an amazing exculpation from Simmy, even if the latter statement (which has been adopted by M. de Sismondi, Rep. li. i. 295.) be true. Ti è che lo scisma, allegando altri commisi esempti. xi. 3.

§ Non sensu ingenuo e disprezzi. Giannone, xi. 3. whose reflections on fighting Popes well deserve extraction. Ecco a quel suo infelice han sempre irromute le predizioni de' Pontefici contra i nostri Principi; ed ecco il frutto che han sempre recitato, quando deposto il proprio maestro, han voluto, a guisa de' Principi del Mondo, alle teste d'eserciti armati copersi d'oliva in vece di lancia, e vestir di corazzia in vece di stola e di dalmatica.

Germany and Italy. The. A. 1. 1136. to A. 1. 1138. Death of Lothaire II. Dec. 7.

Robert of Capua. Schism. 1137.

Death of Anacletus. A. 1. 1138.

Lothaire prisoner. 1138.

History.

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1199.Enquiries Roger with The Kingdom of Sicily.Conrad III Emperor.
A. D.
1138.

Fall and

Death of Henry the Lion.
A. D.
1139.
Wife of a Guelph a Ghibe-line.

actuated either by piety or by policy, received the holy captive with distinction; and Innocent in return, under the influence either of terror or of gratitude, consented to acknowledge the King's full rights over all his conquests. The Duke of Naples had fallen during the campaign, and his State was no longer equal to resistance; so that when the Pope bestowed upon the fortunate Norman Sovereign the Investiture of Sicily, of Apulia, and of Capua, (of which last its ill-fated Prince was finally deprived,) there was added to this rich grant, "the Honour of Naples and all its dependencies." It may be that from some indistinct wording of this Instrument, Roger felt that he was not entitled to make essential innovations in the polity of his new acquisition: certain it is that the Neapolitans received from him a greater share of favour than he extended to any other of his conquered subjects, and that they were allowed to preserve all such privileges as seemed not inconsistent with his Sovereignty.†

On the death of Lothaire, the German Diet assembled at Coblenz, unanimously elected Conrad, Duke of Suabia, to the Crown, and thus transferred the dynasty to the House of Hohenstaufen. It seemed as if the hostility to the Franconian line, which had occasioned the elevation of the late Emperor, was now transferred to the head of the Saxon Family. Henry of Bavaria, on his marriage with a daughter of Lothaire, had received Saxony as her portion; and his Father-in-law, when on his death-bed, had transmitted the Regalia to his custody; thus signifying his wish as to the succession. The odious title of the Proud, which History has attached to the name of this Duke of Saxony, sufficiently attests the motives which prompted his rejection. His arrogance during the late Italian expedition had given deep offence to his Brother Princes; and not content with his exclusion from the throne, they proceeded, on his demurring to surrender the Regalia, to put him to the Ban of the Empire. Stripped of all those mighty possessions which, as he had once boasted, occupied the land between the Northern Ocean and the Strait of Messina; so abandoned by his friends that four servants comprised his entire retinue, Henry retired to Quedlingburg; and there is little need of attributing to poison, as some have done, that premature end, which was more probably the result of a mortally wounded spirit.

Henry of Bavaria left one son in the cradle, who bore his own Baptismal name, to which, in after-times, was added a far nobler epithet than that which distinguished the Father—the Lion. The interests of this child were espoused by his Family, and Guelph his Uncle, secretly assisted by Roger of Sicily, took the field against Conrad. It is from a petty skirmish in the Civil War which ensued that the two great factions which long afterwards distracted Germany, and yet more so Italy, derive their names; and their origin, when examined closely, appears to be so indisputable, that it is no small matter of surprise how so much fable has been sometimes allowed to perplex it. The Imperial forces, under the command of Conrad's brother Frederick, were besieging the castle of Weinsperg, and in an unexpected sally in which the garrison was successful, the war-cries used by the combatants bore relation to the two great Houses which they respectively served. The Saxons shouted the name of their Leader, which from frequent repetition in his Family might be considered a Patronymic; and they joined battle under the cry "Hyë Guelph." The town of Gibelingen, in Suabia, was the birth-place of Duke Frederick, and supplied the Imperialists with the answering words "Hyë Gibeligen." These two "most pernicious and diabolical names," as they are termed by a Chronicler, were not forgotten, but prevailed afterwards "to the destruction of all Italy;" and Guelph and Ghibeline, from the opposite sides espoused by the Chiefs of those Houses, became distinguishing titles, the former of the Papal, the latter of the Imperial faction, in the long and desolating struggles between the Church and the Empire.*

A Peace between the conflicting parties restored Saxony to Henry the Lion in 1142; and the History of Germany offers no event which need detain us till Conrad joined the 11d Crusade, having previously obtained the election of his infant son, Henry, as King of the Romans; who, however, died during his absence on that ill-fated expedition. Choosing a season of profound tranquillity on his return from the Holy Land, Conrad resolved upon a progress into Italy in order to receive the Imperial Crown; a ceremony which he had continued to defer during a reign of fifteen years. But death arrested his purpose, not without some suspicion of poison attaching to Roger, King of Sicily, in whom this Transalpine expedition had very naturally excited alarm.†

It was not probable, even if the deceased Monarch had pressed the election of his single remaining son, an infant at the time of his death, that the German Diet would have gratified his wish; and therefore with a sound discretion he recommended the child to the protection of that Noble, who both from his power and his popularity appeared most likely to be chosen his successor. Frederick, Duke of Suabia, nephew to Conrad, was now in the flower of youth, eminently distinguished for personal qualities, courage, and affability, and possessing moreover a recommendation most attractive to his electors: in himself he was the representative of the Ghibeline Family, and hereditary connexion intimately allied him with that of Guelph. It seemed as if the feuds of these contending Houses might be terminated by the elevation of a Prince akin to both; and accordingly the unanimous suffrages of a Diet at Frankfort called Frederick Barbarossa; to the vacant throne.

* Struvius (i. 370.) proves the origin of these much disputed names by very copious authorities, the most satisfactory of which is that of the Chronicon Bavarie of Andreas Presbyter, p. 23. It is Jac. Philip. Bergomas, ad ann. 1234, cited in the same place by Struvius, who calls the words perniciosissimi et dyabolici vocabula ad totius Italie interitum. We wish the pretty tale of the Ladies of Weinsperg, which the Spectator has rendered familiar to English ears, rested on more assured authority. Conrad, it is said, allowed them to retire, each with as much baggage as she could personally carry; and he was moved to tears, and to compassion for the garrison which he had resolved to put to the sword, when every woman appeared bearing her husband on her shoulders. Trithemius, who first related this story, has been followed by many other writers, all of whom are sweepingly dismissed by Struvius—merito hæc pro fabulis habet Leubstus, et præcipue Eccardus.

† Otto Frisingensis, de Gest. Fred. i. lib. i. cap. 63.

‡ Barbarossa, or Rubeobarbus, epithets which explain themselves, are said by Matthæi to have been contemptuously given to Frederick, by the Italians. All the Chroniclers concur in praising his handsome

Germany
and Italy.From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.Conrad joins the 11d Crusade.
A. D.
1147.His death.
A. D.
1152.Frederick I.
Barbarossa,
Emperor.

• Honorum quoque Neapolis quoque pertinentiarum. Bulla Innocentii.

† Giannone, xi. lib. 1.

‡ Henry's territories comprised Saxony, Misnia, and Thuringia; in Italy Verona and Spoleto, and almost all the Fiefs of the late Countess Matilda.

History.

From
A. D.
1106,
to
A. D.
1198.
He decides the succession to the Crown of Denmark.

State of Lombardy.

Rivalry of Milan and Pavia.

The Milanese destroy Lodi.
A. D.
1111, and subdue Como.

Having arranged some few pressing affairs in Germany, and displayed the extent of his power beyond its immediate Northern limits, in the settlement of a disputed succession to the throne of Denmark; bestowing its vassal Crown upon Sueno, one of the competitors, and investing his disappointed rival Canute with a great Duchy, Barbarossa next turned his attention to the distracted state of Italy; in which Country his presence was simultaneously implored by the Pope, by some of the Lombard Cities, and by the Prince of Capua, whom the King of Sicily had dethroned. In order to afford clearer insight into the approaching events in Lombardy, and at Rome, it is necessary that we should first briefly narrate some recent transactions which have not as yet found place in our story.

According to the original Lombard Constitution, each City was subject to a Count, who himself in turn was the vassal of a Duke or Marquis. It had been the policy of the German Emperors, from the time of Otho the Great, to render the Cities and their adjoining districts independent of these Counties;* and insensibly these chief towns, although still acknowledging the Sovereignty of the Emperors, during their occasional progresses and residences in Italy, by the discharge of feudal services, claimed the right of electing their own Magistrates, and formed in reality so many separate Republics. Of these, the two principal both in wealth and power were Milan and Pavia; the former adhering for the most part to the interests of the Church, and hereafter therefore to be distinguished as Ghibeline; the latter attached to the Empire, and belonging therefore to the Guelph faction. Between these two Cities existed the most deadly rivalry, and the narrow plain of twenty miles by which alone they were separated witnessed many a bloody conflict in the early part of the XIIth Century. All Lombardy was divided under their respective Chieftainships; and while Crema, Tortona, Brezcia, Parma, and Modena declared for Milan, Cremona, Lodi, Novara, and Piacenza were arranged as allies of Pavia.

It was in the year 1111 that the Milanese, after sacking and destroying the town, whose remains are still known as Lodi vecchio, dispersed its inhabitants among the neighbouring villages, and subjected them to grievous oppression. Sixteen years later, Como submitted to their arms by capitulation; and the conquest of these two large towns confirmed the paramount ascendancy of Milan in Northern Italy. It was useless for the enslaved citizens to address themselves to their natural protectors, the Emperors; Lothaire II. had appeared but twice in Italy; on both occasions, Rome was his chief object; and on one of them, his force was too contemptible to be efficient for any military purpose. Conrad III., as we have seen, never crossed the Alps. But the accession of a new Prince, of active temper and warlike spirit, fired with youth and panting for glory, person, and several instances both of his generosity and bravery are recorded before his accession to the throne. To Literature he did not make pretence; and Radevicius, who describes him as eloquent in his vernacular German, tacitly admits his want of scholarship, when he adds, that he understood Latin better than he spoke it. (ii. 76.) Frederick represented the Ghibelines, as grandson of a sister of Henry V.; and he was connected with the Guelphs through his mother, (daughter of Henry the Black, former Duke of Bavaria,) sister of Guelph VI., who at the time of his accession swayed the Duchy, and was cousin of Henry the Lion. The latter two Princes were esteemed the Chiefs of their party.

* See ch. lxvii. p. 475.

appeared to offer fair promise of restoration to the descendants of those inhabitants of Lodi who had been expelled from their hearths two and forty years before. Accordingly, in one of the first Diets which Barbarossa held at Constance, he was surprised by the appearance of two suppliants, who, bearing crosses in their hands, prostrated themselves before his throne, and with bitter tears and sobs invoked his aid for the recovery of freedom.* They were Citizens of Lodi, not deputed by their brethren, but acting upon their own personal impulse; and Frederick, touched by their representations, and glad, no doubt, of a pretence to assert and to exercise the long-suspended Sovereignty of the Empire over a City which scarcely acknowledged vassalage, assented to their prayer, and despatched peremptory orders to the Milanese to enfranchise the townsmen of Lodi.

The mandate of Frederick, couched in imperious terms, was received with disdain at Milan, torn from the Herald after he had read it, and trampled scornfully under foot. So broken in spirit, on the other hand, were the trembling men of Lodi, that they disavowed all participation in the act which had occasioned Barbarossa's interference. Little relying upon the clemency of their immediate masters, they secured their wives and children in neighbouring friendly towns; and every night dispensed themselves, to escape the hazard of surprise, among the woods and coverts. Whatever vengeance the Milanese might have designed in their first moments of anger, was arrested by intelligence of the approach of Barbarossa, who descended from the Treentine Alps at the head of a more brilliant army than had accompanied any of his predecessors into Italy; and directing himself upon Roncaglia, in the vicinity of Piacenza, there, according to ancient custom, opened the Diet of his Kingdom. One Feudal usage practised on that occasion deserves notice from its singularity. A shield was suspended from a lofty staff in the middle of the Camp, and on the evening after the Prince's arrival, each of his Vassals was bound to repair thither, and after a answering to his name in a roll-call, to mount guard for the night. The penalty for absence was no less than deprivation of the offender's fief; and this severe forfeiture was enacted by Barbarossa even from some of his Ecclesiastical retainers.

Loud complaints of the tyranny of Milan were renewed by Deputies from Lodi, encouraged by the vicinity of their protector, and seconded by the Comese and Pavians; and Frederick at once manifested his hostile intentions against the offending City by giving up its neighbourhood to pillage, and by investing Tortona, upon the refusal of that City to abandon its ancient ally. The siege was conducted with vigour; yet although Frederick cruelly gibbeted his prisoners within sight of the ramparts, and the single spring from which the garrison could obtain supplies of water was situated within the advanced posts of the enemy; it was not until those waters had been rendered too bitter for use by corruption with pitch and sulphur, nor before the arrival of the sixty-second day of perpetually renewed combat, that the Tortonese surrendered. They were permitted to retire to Milan, with such property as each man was able to carry about his own person, and their town was thus pillaged and freed. Barbarossa, after his success, received the Crown of Lombardy at Pavia, and impatient * Ottone Murena, who relates this story, was a native of Lodi. Apud Muratori, Script. Ital. vi.

Germany
and Italy.From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1188.Reestablishment of the Roman Senate.A. D.
1143.Celestine II.
Lucius II.
Pope.Appointment of a Patrician.Pope Lucius II.
killed.A. D.
1145.Eugenius III.
Pope.Arnold proposes to re-establish the Equestrian order.

for that of the Empire also, determined to march immediately upon Rome.

That great Capital had undergone a very singular Revolution during the reign of the late Emperor. Arnold, a Monk of Brescia, had completed his youthful studies under Abelard, and had adopted not only the obscure Metaphysical notions (whatever they might be) of his great master concerning the Trinity, but a freedom of Political heresy also, (as himself expressed it,) which, if that master entertained, he certainly did not promulgate.* The times were little ripe for a loud and bitter denouncement of the vices of the Clergy and their abuses of temporal power; and the spirit of Arnold was not sufficiently temperate to produce more than a passing and dangerous fermentation which was to subside after it had effected his own destruction. The first movement which he aroused was in his native City; in which by declaring that voluntary poverty was the duty of Ecclesiastics, and by recommending the confiscation of Church revenues for the service of the State, he excited a revolt against the Bishop, towards the close of the Pontificate of Innocent II. A Council held in the Lateran condemned the turbulent Reformer, who escaped its sentence by flight, and found refuge in Zurich.

The doctrines of Arnold, even before his exile, had gained numerous partisans in Rome; for a Preacher who inculated that the Pope ought to be deprived of temporal authority, could not be otherwise than particularly grateful both to the factious Nobles who sought to found their own ascendancy upon the downfall of the Pontificate, and to the rabble always gaping for change, and hostile to the existing Government. A pretext was soon found, therefore, for a popular movement. In a petty feud with the neighbouring inhabitants of Tivoli, Innocent II. had refused to press his victory so far as the vengeance of the Romans desired to see it exercised; and without proceeding to the extremity of razing their walls, he contented himself by demanding an oath of submission from the conquered townsmen. This act of lenity was sedulously represented to the People as a violation of their rights; it was to the Church, not to Rome, said the Nobles, that obedience had been required, and both the honour and the interests of the Eternal City were compromised by the selfishness of an ambitious Priest. The populace, easily inflamed by a few sounding common-places about Liberty and the ancient greatness of their Country, thronged tumultuously to the Capitol, and proclaimed the reestablishment of a Senate. The name of that Body is said by Muratori to be found in documents later than the reign of Charlemagne, but neither of its nature and powers, any more than of the date of its extinction, does any trace remain. This inroad upon his authority, and the menaced adoption of the extreme measures recommended by Arnold of Brescia, so deeply affected Innocent that he did not long survive. The reign of his successor Celestine II. endured but a few months; and under Lucius II. the new Constitution was completed. Instead of a Prefect nominated, or at least confirmed, by the Pope, a Patrician was appointed to represent the majesty of the Republic and to preside over the Senate; that Body, invested with both legislative and executive powers, consisted of fifty-six members, chosen by ten electors, who were themselves annually named by the inhabitants of the thirteen Rioni into which the City was divided. The most eminent of these Senators bore the title of Counsellors, and, perhaps, formed together with the Patrician that which may be named the Cabinet. The first Patrician was a Leone, Giordano brother of the late Antipope Anacletus; and so divided against each other were the Romans of this period, that the remaining brothers of the same Family adhered to the Pope Lucius. The chief ancient monuments were fortified afresh by the contending parties, and the City of the Dead teemed with castles and garrisons. Each faction sought also to strengthen itself by alliances; and when Roger of Sicily promised his aid to Lucius, the "Senate and the People of Rome" addressed themselves to the Emperor Conrad. By the advice of St. Bernard he declined answering this invitation, couched in terms of haughty submission and a thinly dissembled affectation of independence; and at the same time he entertained with more than ordinary courtesy the Papal ambassadors deputed to his Court with opposite instructions. Lucius, perhaps emboldened by this hope of powerful support, made one strong effort to overthrow the new Government; and placing himself at the head of an armed force he assailed the Capitol in which the Senate had fortified itself. He was repulsed, and so grievously injured by a stone that he died a few days after the skirmish.

On the election of Eugenius III. as his successor, Eugenius III. Arnold of Brescia, strong in popular opinion, ventured to present himself again in Rome. Once more he proposed to strip the Pope of all his temporal authority, and in order to complete the puppetry by which the Government of former times had been mimicked, he recommended the institution of Consuls, Tribunes, and above all of an Equestrian Order between the Senate and the People. "What could be the motive or measure of such distinction?" is the calm and discreet question which this

* It is theologically, and not politically, that St. Bernard inveighs against Arnold, and he points to him especially as the armour-bearer of the Philistine Abelard. *Novum audit populus et gratibus Evangelium, nova proponitur Fides, fundamentum aliud ponitur præter id quod positum est. De virtutibus et vitiis non moraliter, de Sacramentis Ecclesie non fideliter, de arcano Sancte Trinitatis non simpliciter nec sobrie disputatur; et cuncta subit in perverum, cuncta præter solitum et præterquam acceptum monstrantur. Procedit Goliath, procerum corpore, nobili illo bellico apparatu circummunitus, antecedente quoque ejus Armigero, Arnoldo de Brixiâ. Squama squamæ conjungitur, nec tyrranicum incedit per eas. Si quidem sublevis Apis quæ erat in Francâ Api de Buxid, et venerunt in unum, odereus Dominum et odereus Christianum ejus. Ep. 189. Innocentio II. In another Letter, (195.) addressed to the Bishop of Constance, in which City Arnold was at that time preaching with great success, St. Bernard describes him to be a man of strict moral life; and then, as if thinking he had made too favourable an allowance, he adds, et si vultis scire, homo est neque bibens neque manducans, solo cum Diabolo cœvens et sitiens sanguinem animarum. And in the Letter following, (196.) to the Papal Legate in Switzerland, he yet more bitterly denounces him as one cujus conversatio meli, et doctrina verumum: cui caput columba, cauda scorpionis est; quem Brixia comitit, Roma expulsi, Francia repulsi, Germania abominatur, Italia non vult recipere. Otto Frisingensis first gives Arnold's character in generic terms, which may be applied to any Demagogue. Vir quidem natura non libetis, plus tamen verborum profusio, quam sententiarum pondere copiosus, singularitatis amator, novitatis cupidus; and he then adds a few particulars of his doctrine. Dicitur nec Clericis proprietatem, nec Episcopis Regna, nec Monachis possessiones habentes aliquid ratione posse salvari; cunctaque hæc Principes esse, ab ejusque beneficiis in unum tantum Lucium ordinem oportere. Præter hæc de Sacramentis altaris, Baptismo parvulorum non nisi dicitur sententia. De Reb. Gest. Fred. Imp. ii. 20. The Poet Gunther, after expressing himself coincidentally with the above statements, admits that Arnold's errors were "dash'd and brew'd" with some truth.*

Perque multa quidem, nam tempore nostro fidelis, Resperant monachis, Julia admittit monachos.

De Genia Fred. lib. 3.

History.
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198. late of lume.
(mold of Brescia.

Time to lunch.

History.

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1199.

Anastasia IV.
Pope.

A. D.
1158.

Adrian IV.
Pope.

A. D.
1154.

Interdicta
Rome.

A. D.
1155.

Barbarossa's last expedition
to Italy.
Embassy of the Senate rejected.

proposal has elicited from Gibbon. The generous ardour of a later and most eloquent writer,* who always kindles even at the semblance of Liberty, has discovered in it the keystone which was to bind together the framework of Roman freedom, by a revival of the full vigour of their ancestral usages. Eugenius had retired from his Capital immediately after his election; yet before the close of the year he found means to effect a compromise with the Senate, by which in return for an acknowledgment of their legitimacy, he obtained the abolition of the office of Patrician and the restoration of that of Prefect.

The death of Eugenius, and the short and unimportant Papacy of Anastasius IV. intervened between the accession of Barbarossa and his expedition into Italy; and during that period Arnold of Brescia continued in Rome under the protection of the Senate. A more vigorous Pontiff succeeded, Nicolas, once a Monk of St. Albans, the only Englishman who has ever worn the tiara. Adrian IV., the title which he assumed on his elevation, is honourably known to Posterity; and his Biographer describes him as exemplary in morals, lofty in intellect, firm in resolve, slow to anger, swift to reconciliation, open-handed, and charitable.† To his labours also as a Missionary, the Norwegians were indebted for their establishment in the Christian Faith. Almost the first act of his Pontificate evinced boldness of spirit. In the general licentiousness which the diffusion of Arnold's principles had encouraged, no rank was exempt from insult and danger; and a Cardinal having been mortally wounded in the streets of Rome, Adrian visited the City with the severe penalties of an Interdict, the first to which it had ever been subjected. The banishment of Arnold was the price at which the offenders obtained relief from a three months' suspension of Religious services, and as the Heretic quitted, the Pontiff returned to his Capital. It is probable that Arnold was sentenced to imprisonment as well as to exile; for we read that the Viscounts of Campania rescued him from the Papal Guards, removed him to their own Castle, and there treated him with marked honour as a Prophet.‡

It was at this season that Frederick approached the gates of Rome; and he was met at Sutri by Ambassadors from the Senate, informing him that they had cast away the yoke of the Clergy and were impatient to tender him the Imperial Crown. "The Roman Matron," however, of whose language the Envoys avowed themselves the spokesmen, seemed inclined, notwithstanding this impatience, to prelude her gift by a bargain; for her messengers employed the following equally intelligible and inflated terms: "You were a guest, I have adopted you as a Citizen; a Transalpine stranger, I have elected you for my Sovereign, and given you myself and all that is mine. Your first and most sacred duty is to swear and subscribe, that you will shed your blood for the Republic, that you will maintain in peace and justice the laws of the City and the Charters of your predecessors, and that you will reward with five thousand pounds of silver the faithful Senators who shall proclaim your titles in the Capitol." Frederick, unwilling to permit the Ambassadors to continue longer under the numerous mistakes which their oration implied, interrupted them with a remark that "their speech was not seasoned with wisdom," that his predecessors had visited Rome not on the invitation of her Citizens, but for their delinquency; and then teaching them that the Imperial arm was not shortened, he concluded by an assurance, that "all would be given to patient men; all would be denied to rude importunity."§

This reception of the Senatorial Deputies tended to quiet the alarm of Adrian, who felt as yet uncertain which of the conflicting interests would be espoused by Barbarossa; and his assurance of safety was confirmed when the Emperor delivered into his hands Arnold of Brescia, whom he had captured from the Viscounts of Campania. No time was lost in quenching so ever the fervid and impetuous zeal of that most remarkable person; for such indeed, in every view, he must be considered, whether we regard him as a Patriot and a Martyr, or as a Demagogue and a Heretic. His nostrils were strangled before the Porta del Popolo; and his ashes were afterwards thrown in the Tiber, to prevent them from being cherished as relics by his passions. Adrian, deriving courage from this execution which removed one of his most dangerous enemies, no longer hesitated to trust himself in the Emperor's Camp, and advanced to meet Barbarossa at Viterbo. On his arrival, either from accident, or as seems more probable from a designed omission of a custom which Frederick deemed worthy of breach, the Emperor neglected to hold the Pontiff's stirrup as he dismounted from his Horse. The Cardinals in attendance, terrified at the evil omen which they drew from this disrespect, abandoned the Holy Father, and hastily retired from the conference. Adrian himself was led under a canopy prepared for his reception, and placed upon a chair of state; but when Barbarossa approached and kissed his feet, he refused the Kiss of Peace in return till the omitted honours should be discharged. The Emperor for a while no less obstinately denied them; and a whole day passed without further communication between the disputants, till on the morrow some of the veteran Courtiers, who had witnessed the performance of a like ceremony by Lothaire, upon the strength of that precedent prevailed upon the reluctant Frederick to submit to the humiliation.¶

After the adjustment of this squabble concerning punctilio, Barbarossa entering Rome occupied the Leonine City with one thousand horse, and, on the following morning was crowned by Adrian in St. Peter's. The Bridge of St. Angelo formed the sole communication between the two portions of the City; and when at the close of the ceremonial and on the return of the Emperor to his camp, the guard which occupied that passage was removed, the populace, irritated at the rejection of their embassy, at their exclusion from the pageant,

* Gibbon, vol. xii. ch. lxxix. p. 291—294, whence he states that he has "translated and abridged, with freedom, yet with fidelity," the "original and authentic Acts" given by Otto Freisingensis, &c.

† Muratori, Antiq. Ital. l. 17. Diss. iv.

‡ Kranke relates the anecdote somewhat differently; that Frederick did hold the stirrup, but that it was the left instead of the right; and that the Pope immediately observed, "Idcirco minus communi negotia facit argumentum de sacris." The Emperor, although piqued, replied, laughingly, that he was ill acquainted with his duties for it was the first time he had ever acted as a groom. If the act were voluntary, his mistake, he added, could not be deemed intentional; if it were compulsory, it was of slight consequence, since his stirrup might hold, so as he held it, with becoming respect. Sazonov, vi. 16.

* M. de Siondri, Rep. It. vol. ii. ch. vii. p. 40.

† Vita Hadriani IV. a Card. Aragon, ap. Muratori, Script. It. tom. iii. p. 1.

‡ Muratori, Annali d'Italia, ad ann. 1155.

History.
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198. small in some.

Barbarossa brings to Germany.

Little aspect of Lombardy.

A. D.
1156.

and at the omission of any application for their suffrages, rushed to the Vatican and massacred such of the Imperial suite as still remained behind. The tumult continued to rage till nightfall, although large detachments of Germans were immediately furnished for its suppression, by whom in the end the rubble was put to flight, after much slaughter and with the loss of many prisoners. In order to avoid a repetition of struggles like these, at once hazardous and inglorious, and also to secure more plentiful supplies than Rome could afford, the Emperor withdrew to Tiroll. During the extreme heats of Summer, he penetrated into the neighbouring mountains, and punished some hostile demonstrations of the burghers of Spoleto by delivering their City to fire and sword. The restlessness of a Feudal army, ever anxious for disbandment when the first period of its service had expired, compelled him to surrender a well-grounded hope of the conquest of Apulia, perhaps of Sicily itself. In the early part of this year the Crown of that Kingdom had passed, by the demise of Roger, to his son William I., a weak Prince, abandoned to the rule of unworthy favourites. Robert of Capua had already stimulated many towns to revolt, the Greek Emperor Michael despatched a fleet to his support, and the discontented Barons solicited the more powerful aid of Barbarossa. The inadequacy of the force at his command compelled him to refuse this alluring invitation, and it was not without encountering some perils from the treachery of the Veronese during his passage through their territory, that, before the close of the year, he regained his German dominions.*

Two years elapsed before Barbarossa was again summoned to Italy. During their course, he rewarded the services of Henry the Lion, from whom he had derived much aid during his late expedition,† by a restoration of the Duchy of Bavaria; and he celebrated his own nuptials with Beatrice, the rich heiress of Rinaldo, Count of Borgogna. But these peaceful occupations were of short endurance. No sooner had Lombardy been relieved from his occupation, than the Milanese rebuilt Tortona by public contributions and by the personal labour of their citizens; and they directed their arms also against several of the towns which had exhibited most zeal in the Emperor's behalf. In the South, the confederacy which had been formed against William of Sicily was entirely dissipated; the Greeks were defeated off Brindisi; Robert of Capua, betrayed by one of his Vassals, was deprived of sight, with so great cruelty that he expired shortly afterwards in the dungeons of Palermo; and the Pope, terrified by these reverses of his allies, purchased immunity by the grant of a new Investiture, containing much more extensive privileges than the Norman Princes had ever yet received from any of his predecessors. It was not long before Adrian, thus reconciled to his Sicilian neighbour, involved himself in a needless dispute with the Emperor. An Ecclesiastic of rank, while travelling in Sweden, had been arrested by some German Barons, and the Pope, in a missive which demanded the Prelate's release, expressed himself in language perhaps designedly ambiguous. In the despatch, translated from the Latin for the benefit of German ignorance, the word beneficium appeared to be employed offensively; for when Adrian reminded the Emperor of the Crown which he had conferred upon him, and of his willingness to bestow majora beneficia, the interpreter rendered, or the hearers understood the phrase to mean, greater Piefs. The indignation roused in the Diet by this seeming assumption of Sovereignty was greatly increased when one of the Legates further inquired, "from whom the Emperor held his Crown, if not from the Pope?" and the naked sword of Otto of Bavaria, raised to avenge the insult, was stopped by the timely interference of Barbarossa himself. This affront, and the hostile aspect of Lombardy, determined Frederick once again to cross the Alps, and Adrian, alarmed at the powerful armament concentrating itself at Ulm, had recourse to an etymological subtlety in explanation of the supposed affront. "No one," he said through his new Legates, "can be justly offended by the use of the word beneficium. Granting that it may be construed a Pief, it is not so that we intended to employ it. The word is of goodly parentage, and may be traced to bonum factum; in which sense it is always found in Holy Scripture, where we are said to be governed and supported beneficio Dei, that is, not by His Feudal power but by His benevolence. Even so, was it not a good deed, a bonum factum, or beneficium, when we circled your brows with the Imperial Crown in St. Peter's?" Barbarossa was reluctant to persist in a quarrel arising from a quibbling derivation, and signified that he was appeased.*

At length the mighty host issued from Ulm, and filled every pass of the Alps between Friuli and the Great St. Bernard. The Milanese had been active in preparation, and they appear to have entertained thoughts of elevating one of their own Nobles to an independent Crown, if the project had not been interrupted by his death.† Their menaces availed little with the faithful Lodesans, whom they urged to join in alliance against the Emperor; and when an armed force marched upon them in order to compel obedience, they abandoned the villages through which they were dispersed, and sought refuge in Pizzighettone. The first operations of the Imperialists were directed against Brescia, which, after a weak resistance, gave hostages and disbursed a large sum of money to obtain Peace. The single bridge which crossed the Adda at Cassano was strongly guarded by a Body of Milanese cavalry, and the swollen state of that river appeared to render it impassable elsewhere. But the King of Bohemia, descending the bank to Corneliانو, partly swam, and

Germany
and Italy.
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.
Office Embassy
from Adrian.
A. D.
1157.

The Pope explains.

Second expedition into Italy.
A. D.
1158.

Passage of the Adda.

* The Veronese constructed a bridge of boats over the Adige so insecurely that it was scarcely able to resist the current of the river; and they floated huge logs down the stream, in the hope that they might strike and carry away this crazy bridge, during the passage of the German army. A slight miscalculation of time frustrated the scheme. Otto Frisingensis, l. 26. Frederick was attacked also by Banditti on the Veronese mountains. Part of them were chased over the precipices, part were taken prisoners, and hanged by one of their own Body, who received his liberty after executing his comrades. Otto Morena, p. 813.

† Mr. Hallam (Middle Ages, i. 462.) states that Henry saved the Emperor's life "during a sedition at Rome." We have not met elsewhere with this fact. Was it in the tumult described above after his Coronation?

* The words of Adrian's first Letter as given by Radevicus (l. 8.) are as follows: Neque tamen parvitas nos desideria tua Voluntas in omnibus implevisse; sed in majora beneficia Excellens tua de manu nostra suscepisti . . . non immerito gauderemus. The subsequent explanation runs as below: Hoc enim nomen ex bono et facto est editum, et dicitur beneficium apud nos non feudum, sed bonum factum. In qd. significatione in universa Sacra Scriptura corpore invenitur, ubi ex beneficio Dei, non tanquam ex feudo, sed velut ex benedictione et bono facto ipsius, gubernari dicimus et nutiri. (Id. i. 22.)

† His name was Statius, he was killed in an early engagement, and buried with Royal honours. Radevicus, l. 36.

History.

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.

Foundation of the present Lodi.

Surrender of Milan.

Institution of Podestà.

partly forced the stream; and although the hazardous attempt cost him more than two hundred men, he succeeded in turning the post at Cassino, and compelled the detachment by which it was protected to fall back upon the Capital.* The camp was now pitched amid the ruins of Lodi vecchio, and on that spot so favourable to their claims, the descendants of the Citizens of the ancient town solicited the Emperor to grant them a site upon which they might erect a permanent abode. A position was chosen about four miles from the residence of their ancestors, and the Emperor, before he recommenced his march, laid the first stone of the new City, in reward for the fidelity of his Vassals. In a few days afterwards, Milan was invested by more than fifteen thousand horse and one hundred thousand foot, and Frederick determined to reduce it by blockade. A month sufficed for that purpose, and the terms which he then granted were honourable. Como and Lodi were to be enfranchised; the Milanese were to swear allegiance to the Emperor, to build a Palace for his reception, to pay him certain sums of money, and to yield to him all the prerogatives of Royalty. The Emperor in return included their allies in the Treaty, pledged himself not to enter the city, and to withdraw from its walls within three days after receiving hostages for the fulfilment of the stipulated conditions.

Milan, by this Treaty, retained the privilege of electing her own Consuls, but a new institution, established in a subsequent Diet at Ronaglia, deprived that right of much of its importance in the first instance, and not long afterwards finally extinguished it. So numerous were the causes referred, according to ancient usage, to the jurisdiction of the Imperial Tribunal, that Barbarossa declared a whole life would be insufficient for their decision.† He created therefore new magistrates, Podestàs, in each Diocese, who by their original constitution were not to be natives of the district over which they presided. These Imperial officers were naturally opposed to the Consuls elected by the popular voice; in process of time they became substituted for them; and they were retained even after the Lombards had emancipated themselves from the yoke of the Empire; till in several of those Cities which abandoned Republicanism the Podestàs ultimately became supreme.

* Muratori relates the hasty flight of the Milanese very whimsically. Fuisti castore di là dal fiume, e portastone l'arvino a i Nivoren, che custodivano: l'altra testa del ponte: addio, buon pro a chi ebbe migliori le gambe. Annal. d'Italia, ad ann. 1158.

† This Diet being held for the adjustment of legal claims was thronged from all Italy by learned Juriconsults; and the species of quibbling witicism, to which in those times much delicacy was attached, is whimsically exhibited in an anecdote which Otto Morena has recorded, (p. 813.) which many other writers have thought worthy of transfer from his pages, and di cui potremo far fatto attempato merzone da molti Legisti e Storici, as Muratori informs us. (Annal. d'Italia, ad ann. 1158.) Barbarossa, on one occasion, when riding between the two most profound Lawyers to whom Italy had given birth, Doctor Bulgarius and Doctor Martin Gropius, addressed himself to the former, and inquired whether as Emperor he might not justly be styled Lord of the whole Earth? The Doctor, either taken off his guard, or more scrupulous in conscience than his brethren, replied that, strictly speaking, he could not be so styled. Martin, a more adroit courtier, readily answered in the affirmative; and when the Emperor dismounted, received, as the reward of his flattery, a gift of the horse which had been ridden by his Majesty. Bulgarius, without expressing any spleen at the preference shown to his rival, dixit hæc eleganter verba; which appear to have been intended for an hexameter as well as for a bon mot.

Amici equum, qui dixi equum, quod non fuit equum.

Some arrangements, made at Ronaglia interfered with the Treaty before concluded with the Milanese. Monza was declared independent, although with the exception of Lodi and Como the integrity of their existing dominions had been guaranteed; and the Imperial Chancellor was despatched to instal a Podestà in Milan itself in lieu of the Consuls. The inhabitants, justly irritated at this breach of faith, rose in arms, compelled the Chancellor to fly; and perceiving that Frederick's army, now quartered near Bologna, was greatly reduced in force by the retirement of many of his Vassals, resolutely anticipated him in a new declaration of war, and attacked and stormed the Castle of Frenzo, the key of the Adda, and therefore of the entrance to their territory. Too weak for immediate vengeance, Barbarossa contented himself by fierce denunciations, proclaimed Milan under the Ban of the Empire, and summoned his Vassals once again to assemble for its punishment. Meanwhile, his light troops spread destruction over the neighbouring districts, burned the crops, uprooted the vines and olive-trees, occupied every route which led to the offending Capital, and endeavoured to interrupt its supplies preparatory to future investment. But Crema was in the first instance to be exposed to the miseries of siege; and fruitful as are the Annals of War in barbarous expedients, we call to mind few instances of more remorseless cruelty than were exhibited. Frederick commenced by hanging his prisoners within sight of the ramparts; and the besieged, in self-defence, executed reprisals on the same number of Germans. The garrison was then informed that all hope of mercy was at an end; forty hostages in the Emperor's custody were gibbeted, and to these were added six Deputies from Milan, one of whom was nephew of its Archbishop. All the hostages, however, were not yet put to death, and those remaining were children of the noblest parents in the besieged City. Untouched by their innocence and the tenderness of their years, Frederick ordered them to be bound to one of those huge movable wooden towers, which of old were important weapons of attack in sieges; and he calculated that, under this most unusual shield, the engine might approach the walls without hazard from the discharge of the mangonels, by which it had heretofore been repulsed. But he forgot that he had already announced a war of extermination; and the miserable fathers who sentinelled the ramparts, hopeless of safety for themselves, unless by continued resistance, and taught, by the former execution of the hostages, that their children, even if they now escaped unharmed, might be reserved only to glut their enemy's revenge under another form of death, plied their artillery without ceasing till they drove back the shattered tower; but not till after nine of the victims attached to it had been killed, two grievously wounded.*

After six months' siege, during which the Germans were frequently repulsed, when the outer rampart was levelled to its base, the inner breached and shattered, the moats filled with huge fragments of the wall, and the garrison itself enfeebled by disease, famine, and the sword, the Cremese solicited the mediation of the Patriarch of Aquileia and the Duke of Bavaria; and Frederick was prevailed upon to spare their lives. Twenty thousand persons, laden with whatever property they could carry, were permitted to evacuate their City and * Radvicius Frisingensis, ii. 47. Otto Morena, p. 1037—1039.

History.
—From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.
Alexander III.
Victor III.
Popes.
A. D.
1159.

betake themselves to Milan, and no sooner were the walls abandoned than the troops rushed in to pillage, fired the houses, and levelled to their very foundations such as escaped the flames. The Milanese were not discouraged by this calamity of their allies; they calculated, and with justice, upon the customary dispersion of the Feudatories wearied by unusual length of service; and they were moreover strengthened by a change in the Government of Rome. Four months before the fall of Crema, the death of Adrian IV. created a fresh schism in the Conclave, and the double return of Alexander III. and Victor IV.* renewed the scandal of the disputed Pontificate. The Emperor summoned the rivals to abide by his decision in a Council at Pavia; and there sanctioned the pretensions of Victor, the one who obeyed his call. Alexander, although supported and acknowledged by the majority of the Christian Powers, was compelled to withdraw from Rome by the fury of the popular faction, after he had issued a Bull of Excommunication against Frederick, and released his subjects from their allegiance. Still the force of opinion, notwithstanding the immediate physical superiority of Victor, rendered the alliance of the legitimate Pope, as he was generally considered, of no small importance to Milan.

In a brisk engagement at Cassano, the sole event deserving remembrance in the ensuing campaign, Frederick at one time so far routed the Milanese, with the division headed by himself, as to capture their sacred battle-car, or Carroccio, kill the oxen by which it was drawn, and tear down the standard of the City and the golden Crucifix which decorated its staff. Stung to fury by this intolerable shame, the Milanese rallied, and charged so home as to drive the Emperor from the field of which they remained masters. Two subsequent campaigns, during which success appears to have been not unevenly balanced, were employed by Frederick chiefly in ravaging the neighbourhood of Milan. The sufferings thus inflicted on the defenceless peasantry were extreme; for not only were the fruits of their toil utterly destroyed; and themselves exposed to houselessness and destitution, but, wherever resistance was attempted, the immediate punishment was death or savage mutilation. The hands of every husbandman detected in conveying provisions into the blockaded Capital were mercilessly cut off; and in a single day, five and twenty of these wretched creatures were sent within the walls to strike terror into their Countrymen. Without attempting an assault, Frederick awaited the slow but certain effects of famine. When the Citizens offered to capitulate, his reply gave them the choice of surrender at discretion, or the acceptance of terms so harsh that his own followers believed they could never be exacted, and the besieged preferred to them the fearful hazard of reliance upon his unconditional clemency. No pain which the pride of triumph could inflict was spared the vanquished. All who had filled the office of Consul during the last three years were compelled to prostrate themselves at the Imperial footstool, with drawn swords suspended round their necks, and to swear obedience in the name of their fellow-citizens: the Carroccio and more than a hundred standards were delivered up as trophies; four hundred hostages were selected from the nobler classes; and the Citizens, who had been summoned without their walls to behold their own humiliation, were then ordered to return; not, however, that they might recoupy them with tranquillity, but that with their own hands they might complete the demolition of their six gates, fill up the moat, and level enough of the ramparts to permit the entrance of the conquerors through the breach. By the Emperor's final decree the existence of Milan was declared to have ceased; the entire population was distributed among four smaller towns, which they were permitted to erect; and during the six days after its abandonment by its native inhabitants, in which their deadliest enemies* laboured upon its destruction, so active was their hatred, that with the exception of a few Churches preserved by especial order, not a vestige remained by which the former magnificence of this once haughty City, the ancient Capital of Lombardy, might be attested to the eye of the traveller. Milan was razed to the ground, and salt was sown in the furrow which the plough traced round its circuit.†

A sedition at Mentz, in which the Archbishop was assassinated, recalled Barbarossa for a short space to Germany; the guilty inhabitants were severely punished, and the walls of their City were thrown down as a lasting

Germany
and Italy.
—From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.
Blockade of Milan.
A. D.
1161.

Milan capitulates.
A. D.
1162.

and is razed
to the ground.

* That title had been already assumed by the Antipope, who, on the death of Anacletus II., for a short time opposed Innocent II.

† The Carroccio was invented by Heribert, Archbishop of Milan, during the war of the insurgent Lombards with Count the Balle. It consisted of a four-wheeled Car painted red, and drawn by eight oxen decorated with red housings. A lofty flag-staff, terminated by a gilt ball, rose from the centre of the Car, and bore the standard of the City between two white banners. Half way down the staff was placed a crucifix. The platform of the Car was filled with soldiers, chosen especially for their valour, and with trumpeters, and a Priest often accompanied it to battle. The defence of this Car was esteemed the most sacred military duty; and it was held in scarcely less veneration than the Ark of the Israelites. (Siamondi, Rep. Ital. i. c. vi. p. 381. and the authorities there cited.) Plates of the Carroccio may be found in the 111d Volume of Gravii Thesaurus, p. 1289, and in the Costumi of Ferrario. The invention was adopted by all the Italian Cities; and appears to have passed into England also; for the military ensign erected by the Barons previously to the great engagement with David King of Scotland in 1138, known on that account as the Battle of the Standard, is described as a high Crucifix raised on a waggon, and decorated with banners. Mox autem aliqui eorum in medio cupudum machine quam ibi adhiberant unus novus malum crexerat, quod Standard appellaverunt; unde Hugo Solvagin Eboracensis Archidiaconus;

Deiatur a stando Standardum, quod stetit stit Militia probitas vincere nec mori.

In omnitate vero ipsius arboris quondam argenteam pavidam cum corpore Christi et Sanctorum Petri et Pauli Apostoli, et Johannis Beateleceas et Wilfridi Roperis Confessorum on Pontificum vestigia insuperarent. Ricardus Hagustaldensis, ep. x. Scriptores, 321. In the same volume, p. 329, is given a cut of this Standard, borrowed, perhaps, from some illuminated MS. and it may be believed very little resembling the object which it is intended to represent.

* The destruction of the six castelli into which Milan was divided, was allotted to the natives of Cremona, Lodi, Pavia, Novara, Como, and Segno and Marlesana; each of these bands respectively undertaking to level one of the districts.

† Ptolemaeus Lucensis, ad ann. upon which statement Muratori (Annal. d'Ital. ad ann.) somewhat ironically remarks, tutte fondone. Part of the spoil transported to Germany on the destruction of Milan consisted of the reputed bodies of the Magi by whom our Saviour was adored at his nativity. (Otto de S. Blasius, 16. Dodechima, ad ann. Gloebium Person. Es. vi. c. 70.) The Rensish legend states that on their return to their own Country the Magi were baptized by St. Thomas; that their relics were brought to Constantinople three hundred years afterwards by the Empress Helena, conveyed to Milan by Eustathius, and thence, on the occasion now under notice, transferred to Cologne, where they are still preserved. Although the Gospels are silent respecting their rank, their number, and their names, stubborn would that unbelief be considered which should refuse to acknowledge the genuineness of the remains of the Magi, under their present titles of Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar, the three Kings of Cologne.

History. memorial of their crime.* In Lombardy, the Imperial dominion was now for a while undisturbed, and at first all hope of Freedom appeared extinguished by the overthrow of Milan. But the tyranny of the Podestàs, the merciless contributions which their avarice extorted from the conquered Cities, and the indifference with which Frederick regarded the prayers and the remonstrances of his subjects, once again awakened a spirit of resistance; and the seeds of a more powerful Confederacy than he had as yet encountered were first scattered in the March of Verona, hitherto little interested in the affairs of Lombardy. Before two years had expired from the fall of Milan, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, and Treviso bound themselves by mutual compact to oppose the encroachments of the Emperor, and they received assurance of support from the powerful Republic of Venice. Rome also was now prepared to assist in the coalition: for the death of the Antipope Victor, and the little encouragement afforded to his successor Pascal III., had enabled Alexander to return to his Capital, in which he was received with marked consideration. The movements of Frederick, on the other hand, were tardy and inactive. It was not till late in the Autumn of 1166, that he found the state of Germany sufficiently tranquil to permit his absence; and then, instead of directing himself in the first instance to restore subordination in Lombardy, he pursued his march at once to the South. The time thus seasonably and unexpectedly afforded them was not misemployed by the Confederates. The walls of Milan were rebuilt with unexampled rapidity by the joint labour of the allied Cities; and its scattered inhabitants were restored to their former abodes, so far protected by ramparts that they might already defy any surprise or coup de main. Partly by compulsion, partly because they felt themselves abandoned by the Emperor, the Citizens of Lodi renounced the alliance in which they had so long and faithfully persevered; and while Barbarossa wasted his strength amid the pestilent marshes of the Campagna, fifteen powerful Cities formed that LOMBARDO LEAGUE which was to wrest from him his despotism in Northern Italy. This alliance bound the Confederates to each other for twenty years: its chief declared objects were the recovery of the right of freely electing their own Magistrates, and of those prerogatives of Royalty which they had enjoyed before Barbarossa's first successful descent upon Italy.†

Meantime, several months had been spent by the Imperialists in fruitless and uncertain movements; and Midsummer had long passed before they sat down under the walls of Rome. The troops of that City had already been driven from Tivoli with a severe loss; which, however, the Biographer of the reigning Pope may be believed to exaggerate when he equalizes it to the overthrow at Cannæ.‡ The walls of the Leonine City could offer little resistance; but within them, the Vatican had been strongly fortified, nor did it surrender till Barbarossa had fired the adjoining Church of S. Maria.§ On the news of that loss, Alexander quitted his abode in the Lateran, and retired, under the protection of the Frangipani, to the Colosseum, transformed by engineering skill into a fortress, then considered impregnable. But even that strong hold appeared insecure, when Frederick proceeded to negotiate with the fleet and warlike Citizens; and it seemed little likely that their fidelity would be proof against his advantageous offer. Peace and a restoration of all his conquests was the boon which he proffered for their abandonment of Alexander; and to obtain that desired object (for through out his struggle with the Pope, Barbarossa seems to have been actuated by implacable personal resentment) he on his side was content to relinquish Pascal. If the two Pretenders were once removed, the Church, it was said, might then freely proceed to a new election. When this inequitable proposal was submitted to Alexander, he replied with becoming dignity, that as he King nor Cæsar, neither State nor People, nor even the Church itself possessed jurisdiction over the Sovereign Pontiff; that he held his authority from God, and that to God alone would he surrender it. Then, in order to avoid the compulsion which he foresaw would be exercised, he secretly quitted his camp, descended the Tiber, and embarked for Benevento, in pursuit of his sons. Peace was no longer delayed; the Romans were fidelity to the Emperor, and the Emperor confirmed the privileges of their Senate; but in spite of this success, an enemy not to be combated by human arms was compelled his hasty retreat. The malaria (infected his Camp; and the effects usually produced by the malarial fever to which it gave birth, were now most fully aggravated by a superstitious terror, perhaps exaggerated, certainly increased, by the artifices of the Priest. In the malady by which they were visited, the trembling soldiery beheld, not a scourge familiar to the unhealthy marshes among which they were encamped; but a special judgement from Heaven upon those profane hands which had given S. Maria to the flames, had nearly involved the Vatican in similar destruction, and had actually consigned two wonder-working Images of S. Peter and of our Saviour. Tormented by this remorse of conscience, not less than by bodily suffering, the bravest spirits in the army languished and gave way; many Christians of illustrious descent, two thousand gentlemen, and a proportionate number of their retainers, perished slowly under the poison of the epidemic; and the Emperor, deprived of a gallant and well-appointed host, which had scarcely as yet drawn the sword, was compelled to break up in haste, and retire upon Pavia with the feeble remnant of his lately flourishing army. Even in this strait, he receded not from any of his former proud assertions of Sovereignty; he decried the Cities which presented to rebel; threw down his gauntlet before their Deputies with menaces of the severest vengeance; maintained himself during the Winter, while surrounded by an overwhelming force; he ravaged the territory of the insurgents; and on the return of Spring, evaded their vigilance under disguise.

* The Archbishopric of Meusa was at that time bestowed upon Christian, Arch-Chancellor of the Empire, a Prelate who still continued to cherish the profession of arms, held command in the subsequent war in Lombardy, and rendered himself especially detestable at the Siege of Ancona.

† The Treaty which consolidated the Lombard League was signed on the first of December, 1167; it may be found in Muratori, Dissert. xviii. tom. iv. p. 261. Societas Lombardiarum rudimentum prima et incognita Grævis in non consentientium. The subscribing Parties were Venice, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Treviso, Ferrara, Brescia, Bergamo, Cremona, Milan, Lodi, Piacenza, Parma, Modena, and Bologna.

‡ Vit. Alex. iii. a Cardinal Aragon, p. 458.

§ S. Maria della Pietà is selected by M. de Sismondi, and the fifty Churches in Rome dedicated to the Virgin. Muratori (Annali d'Italia, ad ann.) names the Church del Lavorante, or poia Torre.

History.—and crossing the Alps with a handful of followers, regained Germany in safety. Pavia alone still continued faithful in its allegiance; and the confederate Cities, either unwilling to employ force against an ancient ally, or mistrusting their own strength, did not attempt its reduction. While leaving it unharmed, however, they rendered it harmless against themselves, by creating a new key to Lombardy on the side of Piedmont. Choosing a site which Nature had fortified by the confluence of two great mountain rivers, the Tanaro and the Bormida, in the centre of a vast plain, over which its batteries might range uninterrupted on every side, they named the new City which they erected upon it, as the strong hold of their Liberty. Alessandria, in honour of the Pope their Chief. Having constituted it an independent member of their League, they obtained its elevation to a Bishop's See; and so rapidly was it peopled from the adjoining districts, that before a year had elapsed from its birth, it provided fifteen thousand armed men as its contingent to the Union.

Notwithstanding the marked skill and bravery with which Frederick had extricated himself personally from the great perils by which he had been environed during his retreat, it was plain that his dominion over Lombardy was shaken to its very base. Six years elapsed before he deemed it prudent to revisit that Country in arms; and yet during that period, while Italy appeared to have escaped from his grasp, he procured the election of his son Henry to the titular dignity of King of the Romans. His first attempts were wisely employed to dissolve the League by negotiation; and he so far succeeded, that when he despatched a considerable force under his Chancellor, Christian, Archbishop, elect of Mentz, for the reduction of Ancona, (which City, although not a party to the Lombard Confederacy, had given him umbrage by seeking the protection of Constantinople,) the Venetians lent their services in the blockade. Venice, indeed, had signed the League; but always temporizing in her policy, and closely regarding her own individual aggrandizement, she for a while neglected the general interests for the pitiful advantage of depressing a commercial rival. The heroic defence of Ancona forms a brilliant episode in Italian History; and in the pages of Bunsen's Campano, who has vividly related the sufferings and the fortitude of its Citizens,* we proceed with breathless anxiety till we gain assurance of their ultimate relief. In a few months after the abandonment of this unsuccessful siege, Frederick, having completed his preparations, passed Mount Cenis; burned Suza to the ground in resentment for an affront offered during his flight six years before; occupied Asti without resistance; and then advanced at once upon Alessandria, impatient for its destruction.

The first impression produced upon the German army on beholding this vaunted bulwark of Lombard Liberty was that of profound contempt. As yet in its infancy, with little other defence except the rivers, at that time swollen by rain, and a deep moat which fed by their waters encircled those portions not protected by their natural channels,† its mud walls and thatched roofs, seemed ill calculated to withstand assault. To its thatches, indeed, it owes the title by which it is still distinguished from the numberless other towns similarly named; and Alessandria della paglia, or "of the straw," separates it (if there were need for such separation) from the foundations of the Macedonian conqueror, and of his successors. Weak, however, as it might appear, its watery girdle, and the bravery of its garrison, secured it during four months' siege, in the depth of a rigorous Winter, against both the force and the treachery of Barbarossa. The besieging army, repulsed in every assault, struggling against the united obstacles of an inclement season, disease, and want of supplies, placed their last hope of success on a mine constructed with incredible labour, and wholly without detection. Before it was practicable, however, the forces of the League were in motion for the relief of Alessandria; and at the moment in which the last gallery was finished, they had advanced within ten miles of the Imperial Camp. Undeterred by the infamy of a breach of solemn compact, Frederick proposed and ratified a Truce for a single day, on which both armies might devoutly celebrate the Fast of the Crucifixion. During the first watch of the appointed morning, however, a storming party issued through the mine within the walls of the City; but the garrison had not been lulled into incautions or negligent security; the sentinels were alert, and called to arms; the German detachment perished to a man, chiefly smothered in the subterraneous passages; and the Alessandrines, throwing open their gates, chased the besiegers from their lines, and burned their engines in a vigorous sortie.

Frustrated in this base design, the Emperor despaired of capturing Alessandria, and hastily broke up with the intention of retiring on Pavia. The army of the League was posted across his line of march, on advantageous ground; but so mighty was the prestige of Feudalism, that his Vassals, rebellious as they were, would not strike the first blow against their Lord; and permitted him to halt in their face, and pitch his tents unmolested. The negotiations arising out of this penceful encounter occupied many months, and when the conferences terminated unsuccessfully, both parties had been largely reinforced. The additional troops, however, which joined the Emperor from Germany by no means compensated for the defection of Henry the Lion with his Saxons. That brave Prince, offended by some neglect which is not clearly transmitted to us, had withdrawn with his followers,* when the hostile armies met on the twenty-ninth of May at Legnano, on the route between Milan and the Lago Maggiore. The Lombard vanguard, having pressed too forward, was surprised by the main body of Imperialists, and retired in some disorder upon the Carroccio of the Milanese. Three hundred chosen youths of Patrikian Families had formed themselves into a guard for that sacred ensign; and as the Imperial Cavalry pursued their comrades, first throwing them-

Germany and Italy
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.

Treachery and repulse of Frederick.
A. D.
1175.

Battle of Legnano, May 29.

* Muratori, Script. Ital. tom. vi.

† Quantunque fosse quella Città, per così dire, bambina, peranche cinta di muri, ma solamente provveduta di una profonda fossa. Muratori, Annali, ed. ann. 1174.

* The cause of this abandonment is variously represented. Conrad Urquhart (p. 296) implies that Henry was bribed. Struvius, in his text, which is unsupported by the authorities in his Note, attributes it to the refusal of the Pict of Goular, for which he had asked the Emperor. The Note speaks of a Religious scruple on account of Frederick's excommunication; and of an old grudge because the Emperor kept back some of his Feud. Voltaire boldly asserts that he retired très-impitoyablement contre Barbarousse, qui gardait pour lui les terres de Maubude; (Annales de l'Empire, ed. ann. 1175); and the knot may as well be cut in this fashion as in any other which has been proposed. Whatever might be the motive, Barbarossa never forgave the act; and doubtless, and perhaps with truth, attributed to it his great discomfiture.

History.

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.

selves on their knees. they addressed a short prayer to God, St. Peter, and St. Ambrose, and then resolutely met the charge of much superior numbers. For a few minutes the Lombards wavered, their line was broken, and the Carroccio was in peril of capture. But the prompt support of a second devoted band, a Cohort of 900 horsemen, who, assuming the title della morte, had sworn, in accordance with their name, to die rather than to retreat, changed the fortune of the day. The Imperial banner was taken; the Emperor combating in the first rank was unhorsed; his followers were totally routed, pursued for eight miles from the field, and for the most part slain, captured, or driven into the Tesino. The victory of the Lombards was complete; stores, baggage, and artillery became their booty; and for many days it was believed that Barbarossa himself was among the killed. Abandoned by his whole army, dismounted, and environed with enemies, it was not indeed till after encountering much danger and difficulty, that he effected his escape to Pavia, the single Lombard City now acknowledging his dominion.

Naval victory of the Venetians.

If we may credit the Annals of Venice, the defeat at Legnano was not Frederick's only reverse. He had demanded the surrender of Pope Alexander, to whom that City had recently afforded asylum; and the fleet which he manned in consequence of refusal, was destroyed off the coast of Istria, after a severe battle with the Venetians. When the Doge Ziani, who in person had led the armament of the Republic to victory, returned bringing with him captive, Otho, a son of the vanquished Emperor, he was received on landing by the Pontiff. "Take this ring," said the Holy Father, as he drew one from his finger, "and with it take on my authority the Sea as your subject." To that origo the Venetians refer the gorgeous ceremony which was annually repeated so long as their Republic endured; when the Doge dropped a golden ring from the stern of the Bucentaur into the bosom of the Adriatic, the Bride whom he declared to be "wedded with that ring in token of his true and perpetual Sovereignty."

Marriage of the Austrian.

Truce for six years.
A. D.
1177.

It was at Venice also that the Congress was held for the adjustment of Peace, now so necessary for the Emperor. But his pretensions were little abated by defeat; and so difficult was the arrangement of the rival claims, that in the end the Plenipotentiaries concluded no more than a Truce for six years with the Lombards, during which period further discussions might be continued. With the Church, a Treaty of perpetual Peace was ratified; and Alexander having released the Emperor from excommunication, testified the renewal of their amity by a solemn interview at Venice. When Frederick landed on the Piazzetta, he found the Holy Father enthroned before the gates of St. Mark's, and surrounded by a brilliant cortège, glittering with the splendour both of secular and Ecclesiastical pomp. Barchenbed and casting aside his robe, the Emperor knelt to kiss the Pontiff's feet, received the kiss of peace in return, held the stirrup of his mule when he mounted, and, had not Alexander dispensed with further humiliation, would have continued to attend his bridle. Thus far all Historians are agreed; it is added by the Biographers of Alexander, and Venice has always accredited the tale which she recorded also by monumental Paintings, that while the Emperor lay prostrate before him, the Holy Father trod upon his neck, repeating the words of David, "Thou shalt go upon the Lion and the Adder, the young Lion and the Dragon shalt thou tread under thy feet." "It is not to you, it is to St. Peter!" murmured the indignant Prince; and the Pope, repeating his former action, answered, "It is both to me and to St. Peter." A block of porphyry in the pavement of the vestibule of St. Mark's, is still exhibited as marking the spot on which this singular and ambiguous reconciliation is said to have occurred.

Interview between the Pope and the Emperor at Venice.

* The authorities for this disputed victory over Otho may be found collected with great diligence by Girolamo Bardi, a Florentine Painter, who perhaps considered himself bound in private duty to establish its authenticity; for he was employed by the Great Council of Venice to replace in their Chamber the Historical Pictures with which it was decorated, and which had been destroyed by fire. His Tract is entitled, Vittoria Navale della Repubblica Veneta contra Othone, &c. 1583. There is another voucher also in a Work by Fortunato Orino, a native of Casino,—Historia della veneta a Francia sceccolomente nel 1177 di Pope Alessandro III. e della Vittoria ottenuta da Sebastiano Ziani Doge, &c. who, with singular diligence no evidence connected with the object of his search was likely to escape, pronounced strongly in favour both of the victory, and of all the facts related in the text of the celebrated interview at Venice between Alexander III. and Frederick.

Revenge on Henry the Lion. the author of his fall and grace, was Frederick's first object on his return to Germany; and the violence and ambition of that Prince always engaged in feuds, and little careless of the means by which his possessions were increased, afforded many grounds for accusation. In a Diet at Goslar, he was declared contumacious for not having obeyed repeated summonses before the Imperial Tribunal. There he was put to the Ban of the Empire, the fourth of the Bavarian line upon whom a similar infliction had fallen, and his great Fiefs were divided among some of his most powerful enemies. The execution of this sentence demanded recourse to arms, and after an ineffectual resistance, the offender was permitted to withdraw to the Court of his Father-in-Law, Henry II. of England, where he remained during three years. In a few years after his return, his allodial estates in Saxony were restored; on the accession of his Son Otho IV. to the Crown of the Empire thirty years afterwards, they were converted into Imperial Fiefs, and became the two Duchies of the House of Brunswick. From a brother of that Otho is descended the present Royal Family of England, "the lineal representatives of Henry the Lion, and inheritors of the name of Guelph."

The six years of Truce were employed in diplomacy; and the Emperor in their course succeeded in detaching from the Lombard League, not only Cremona and Tortona, but even that very City to which the League had given birth. Alexandria was viewed by him with especial jealousy; it had been founded as an express outwork against his authority, and its existence was an offensive monument, both of rebellion, and of the ignominious repulse which he had suffered under its walls. His intentions, therefore, of razing it to the ground, and of dispersing its inhabitants at the expiration of the Truce, were openly avowed. In order to deprecate the bitterness of resentment, the Alessandrins proffered allegiance, and surrendered themselves to the Emperor's discretion. The whole population quitted their walls on an appointed day, presented themselves before an Imperial Commissioner, who awaited them on the plain without, and were then re-introduced by his authority, as

* Psalm cxi. 13.

† Hallam, Middle Ages, i. 462. Voltaire, Annales de l'Empire, ad ann. 1179. 1181. Struvius, i. 408. &c.

History.
From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198. see of instance.

to a new City, henceforward to bear the name of Ciesarea;* in which, although living under the especial jurisdiction of the Emperor, they were permitted to elect their own Consuls.

The conclusion of Peace was accelerated by the earnest desire of the King of the Romans to be associated with his Father in the Crown of Italy, as well as that of Germany; an object which might have been frustrated had the Truce been permitted to expire without the signature of a definitive Treaty. Preliminaries, accordingly, were settled at Piacenza, and ratifications exchanged at Constance, the City from which this Peace, much celebrated as forming the basis of the public law of Italy, during a long succession of years, has received its name. The Treaty was conceived in a just and equitable spirit; and without abolishing the wholesome control of the Imperial Sovereignty, confirmed the Lombard Cities in that virtual independence which had been the object of their long and arduous struggle. The rights of coinage, of Peace and War, of erecting fortifications, of administering Civil and Criminal Justice, and all others comprehended under the term Regalian, were granted to them, not only within their walls, but within the districts attached to them. The League was formally recognised, and permitted to be renewed at pleasure. The Consuls, although invested by an Imperial Commissioner, were to be elected by the Citizens. All Feudal services during the Emperor's residence or progress in Italy, were retained; but he engaged on the other hand never to abide so long in any City or its territory, as to occasion it prejudice. Each Member of the League was to swear that it would maintain the Imperial rights against such Italian Cities as were not Members; and at the close of every ten years, all were to renew their oath of allegiance to the Emperor. It is manifest that important concessions were obtained by these terms from Barbarossa; and perhaps his humbled pride sought reconciliation to the sacrifice demanded from him, in the empty, although arrogant wording of the Preamble to the Treaty. So great, it is there said, is the gentleness and clemency of the Emperor, that he prefers granting pardon to inflicting punishment; and he is content, out of the abundance of his grace, to receive into favour the offending Lombards and their partisans.†

The reception of Barbarossa when, in the year following this Peace, he visited Italy to celebrate the nuptials of his son Henry, was distinguished by extraordinary magnificence; and the Cities hitherto accustomed to close their gates against him in hostility, now vied with each other in the splendour of their triumphs and banquetings. The alliance which he had negotiated for his son brought with it great increase of wealth, of honour, and of dominion. In the thirty years which had passed since the death of the Norman Roger, first King of Sicily, the Crown had been worn, as we have before seen, by his son and his grandson. Of these, William II. or "the Good,"—a title for which this youth, however amiable in himself, may be partly indebted to the great predominance of evil in his father and predecessor William I. "the Wicked,"*—was now hopeless of issue; and the sole existing legitimate descendant of the ancient Guiscard blood, was Constance, a posthumous daughter of Roger, and Aunt, therefore, to the reigning King. It was this Princess, of distinguished beauty, and with the succession to the Crown of Sicily as her dowry, who bestowed her hand on the future Emperor in the Gardens of St. Ambrose at Milan. The bitter train of calamity which these nuptials afterwards entailed upon her suffering Country, may have given rise to a belief long entertained that her Father or her Brother had dedicated her to the veil and to celibacy, in consequence of a Prophecy, that if she married she would kindle a devouring flame in Europe, and occasion the ruin of her own Family.†

When the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin armed the Chivalry of Europe for a third time for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre, Frederick, although approaching the age of man, was fired by the general enthusiasm, and took the Cross. His achievements in that expedition, and the petty accident which occasioned the death of one who had so often escaped far greater perils both "of flood and field," belong to another part of our narrative; in this place it need only be said that the remembrance of his many noble and generous qualities excited deep regret for his loss, even among those who had been most exposed to his former enmity. The two chief stains upon his character are the ferocity exhibited during the siege of Tortona, and the treacherous attempt upon Alessandria; and those crying offences we do not seek to extenuate. But they stand alone, and are foreign from the rest of his conduct. In all other respects, both his fidelity and his clemency were unimpeachable; and although his Lombard wars were waged against foes whom he viewed as rebels and traitors, his vengeance in the hour of triumph was directed not against the inhabitants, but the senseless stones of their vanquished Cities. Personal valour and fortitude in adversity belonged to him in preeminence; and somewhat of the respect which History has attached to his memory may perhaps be attributed to the strong contrast which is afforded by the cruelty and the perfidy of his odious successor, upon whose reign we are about to enter.

The first object of Henry VI. after his accession, was yet further to diminish the power of Henry the Lion, a power still too considerable not to render him dangerous as a subject. Before Frederick joined the Crusade, the Diet of the Empire had exacted an oath from the restless and ambitious Duke,—who, notwithstanding his now advanced years, and the frequent proscriptions which he had incurred, appeared to enjoy life only

* If it were possible to suspect so very grave a writer as Muratori of occasional indulgence in dry humour, his account of the death-bed of William the Wicked might be cited to that purpose. Analisi di grave infermità in quest' anno Guglielmo Re di Sicilia, stette langoroso per due mesi; e chiamato a se Ramondo Arcivescovo di Salerno, che dettavano forte della Medecina, arte allora di gran credito in quella Città, ne uccidè bene i consigli, non seguitò poi a regnare a modo suo. (dizionario d'Indice, ediz. 1166.)

† Giovanni (hic. xii. vol. ii. p. 289) has shown, and few will doubt his assertion, that Constance, being a posthumous daughter, could not be dedicated to a Nunnery by her Father; and that the whole story is sustained by contemporary authorities. He cites also the following description of her from Gualfred of Viterbo:

Fili Regis Sarah filia sponsa nobis, Spansa fuit speciosa nimis, Constantia dicta, Posthuma post Patrem hiaterpo venere relicta, Junque irremota tempore virgo facta.

‡ Sismondi, Rep. Ital. ch. xii. vol. ii. p. 257.

Germany
and Italy.

From
A. D.
1106. to
A. D.
1198.

Frederick joins the 1144 Crusade.

A. D.
1189.
His death,
of June 10.
A. D.
1190.

and character.

Accession
of Henry VI.
Further depression of Henry the Lion.

language of Henry ing of the success the Constable of ty.
A. D.
1184.

* It is scarcely necessary to remark that the original name ultimately maintained itself.

† Sismondi, Rep. Ital. ch. xi. vol. ii. p. 230. Hallam, Middle Ages, i. 253. The Treaty is given at length in the Corpus Juris Civilis of the Empire.

‡ Roger is variously called Ist, Ild, and IIM. He is Ist, as King of Sicily, Ild, as his Father's successor in the Duchy of that Island; IIM, as successor to his Uncle in Calabria and Apulia.

History.
From
A. D.
1106,
to
A. D.
1198.

Death of William II. of Sicily.

Tancred.

King of Sicily.

Coronation
of Henry VI.
at Rome.
A. D.
1191.

when buckled in his armour,—that during the absence of the Emperor he would make no attempt for the recovery of his forfeited dominions. It is strange that such an oath should have been trusted, it would have been more strange if it had been observed; but its violation was severely punished, and on the death of the aged Duke in 1198, Brunswick was the sole Fief which passed to his son.

The announcement of the demise of William II. of Sicily had preceded that of Barbarossa by a few months, and Henry was already prepared to claim the dowry of his Consort, when he found himself called to the throne of Germany. But the strong prejudices of the Sicilians against a foreign, and especially a German dynasty, raised obstacles to that arrangement by which the deceased King, in projecting the marriage of Constance, had endeavoured to avoid the miseries of Civil dissension. One Prince of Norman descent, although of ambiguous birth, still remained, in the person of Tancred, Count of Lecce; a title which he derived from his mother. Of the three sons of the first King of Sicily, Roger, the eldest, died in the flower of his age; and without having obtained the consent of his Father to a union with the Countess of Lecce, of whom he was passionately enamoured, and to whose bed he proved undividedly faithful. To Tancred, the issue of that unblamed, although not strictly recognised attachment, the Sicilian Nobles proffered their Crown; and being immediately on the spot, and supported also by very powerful interests, he established himself in full Sovereignty almost before Henry was acquainted with the decease of the late King. No time, however, was lost by Henry in asserting and actively enforcing his pretensions. Accompanied by Constance, he hastened into Italy, conciliated the Lombard Cities as he traversed them, by a renewal of all their former privileges; concluded an alliance with the Pisans, who engaged to provide him with a Fleet; and for similar objects, accorded grants to Genoa so extravagant, that those by whom they were received must have felt some misgiving as to their future realization. Exemption from tolls and customs in all the Ports of Sicily was the least portion of the Charter which he delivered; it contained a promised cession of Syracuse, with all its dependencies, and of two hundred and fifty Knights-fiefs in the rich Val di Noto. As he proceeded to Rome, the opportune death of Clement III. enabled him for a short time to secure the countenance of his successor; probably by influencing his election, certainly by annexing to the Holy See the long coveted domain of Tivoli. If we believe our English Chroniclers, and even Baronius himself, Celestin III. fully perceived the advantageous position in which he was placed by the circumstances of the moment; and exhibited an arrogant and unseemly display of power when he performed the Emperor's Coronation. Scarcely had he circled Henry's brows with the diadem, before touching it with his foot, he threw it again on the pavement of St. Peter's, thus signifying that it was at his will whether the Imperial dignity should be given or taken away.*

In spite, however, of the reclamations, and even of the armed opposition of this haughty Pope, who now refused to annul the investiture granted by his predecessor to Tancred, Henry obtained some advantages in the South. But the heats of an Italian Summer, always fatal to invaders, spread disease through his army while investing Naples; and the treachery of the Citizens of Salerno betrayed the Empress Constance, who had been left with them for protection, into the hands of Tancred. The King of Sicily made a generous use of his unexpected prize; received his kinswoman at Palermo with testimonies of distinguished honour; and restored her to liberty, without ransom, and without conditions.

These disasters induced Henry to withdraw to Germany; and it was on his return from his fruitless expedition that the disgraceful traffic for the possession of the captive Richard I. of England took place with Leopold, Duke of Austria. The Emperor having bought the illustrious prisoner for sixty thousand marks, nearly trebled the price, and sold him again, after a year's detention, for one hundred and forty thousand marks payable to himself, thirty thousand to Leopold his first gaoler.† Avarice, no doubt, was the passion which Henry chiefly gratified, but revenge also might claim some participation in this base transaction. Among the idle charges advanced against Richard at the Diet of Haguenau, before which he was compelled to appear personally, the first was that he had leagued with Tancred, in order to put him in possession of the throne of Sicily.‡ The King of England, after disclaiming all responsibility for his actions to the Tribunal which accused him, replied, that his alliance with Tancred had been formed at a season at which that Prince was not aspiring to, but already wearing his Crown. The Duke of Austria's bitter spirit of resentment had been awakened by a yet more trifling cause. During a squabble between some of their respective followers in a caravanserai at Acre, relative to the priority of its occupation, Richard, when appealed to, naturally espoused the side of his own retainers; and unwilling to be dislodged, somewhat too hastily ordered the Duke's banner to be removed, and permitted it to be thrown contemptuously into a drain.§ The feud occasioned by this petty disagreement was remembered by the King of England when he crossed the Austrian territory; and in order to secure himself against surprise, he adopted the habit of a serving man, and travelled almost unattended. While cooking his own meal in a house of entertainment in Vienna, the brilliancy of a valuable ring which he inadvertently continued to wear on his finger, betrayed that he was of more elevated rank than his outward appearance implied. The bystander who first made this observation, happened to be a retainer of the Duke of Austria, who had accompanied his master to the Holy Land; and who on more close inspection of the Royal stranger's features, recognised and immediately denounced him. On his seizure, pains were taken to expose him to the

* Roger Hoveden, ad ann. 1191. Henry Knyghton, ii. 13. Baronius, ad ann. 1190. Struvius concludes, somewhat unreasonably, that the story is a pure invention of the English writers in order to degrade Henry, whom they hated on account of his treatment of Richard I. But a haughty demeanor on the side of a Pope in his intercourse with an Emperor is not a solecism in History. Celestin knew how important his friendship was to Henry at that moment, and there is nothing in his subsequent conduct which should create a doubt but that he would take advantage of his ascendancy to the very utmost. Voltaire, who says that "Roger Hoveden" is the only authority for the anecdote, is satisfied by dismissing it with an antithesis—On le Pope citait en confiance, on l'avait vu s'en parer. But we do not see the necessity for submitting to this dilemma.

† Struvius, i. 432. and the authorities there cited.
‡ Mart. Paris, 145.
§ Ibid. 140.

division of the rabble, by parading him through the streets, with the half-dressed morsel still fixed to the skewer upon which he had been diligently roasting it.*

† The discomfort which Henry had experienced in Italy might probably have disinclined him from an early renewal of his attempts upon that Country, but for the unexpected death of Tancred, heart-broken by the premature loss of his eldest son, whom he had recently married, under the happiest auspices, to Irene, daughter of the Greek Emperor, Isaac Angelus Comnenus. The Crown passed to a younger son, William III., as yet a mere boy; upon whom Henry, assisted by the Pisans and Genoese, poured down with an overwhelming force. The unexampled cruelties which he perpetrated while ravaging Apulia struck terror into the hearts of the Sicilians; and the strong-holds of the Island were abandoned to him almost as soon as they were summoned. Sibilla, the widow of Tancred, with her daughter and the young King, were entrapped by promise of honourable usage, and permission to retire to their hereditary dominion of Lecce; but no sooner had they confided themselves to the Tyrant's power, than he immured the Princesses in a Convent, and by brutal mutilations, both deprived the unhappy King of sight, and extinguished his hope of posterity.

‡ Upon the cruelties which have stamped indelible infamy on the name of Henry VI. in his Sicilian Government, it would be needlessly painful to dwell. Terror appears to have been his single maxim of rule, and the Chroniclers have recorded a sickening variety of deaths under exquisite torture, which his jealous suspicion was ever ready to inflict. Henry's ferocity was not saluted by the agonies of the living; it trampled foally on the dead also. When he occupied Palermo, he ransacked the graves of Tancred and his son Roger, stripped their corpses of the Royal vestments in which they had been interred, and exposed their remains to scorn and dishonour. His pretext for this base and cowardly outrage was the usurpation, as he styled it, of those Princes; but a hope of discovering treasure in their sepulchres may have partly influenced his purpose. Avarice was among his ruling passions, and when he quitted Palermo on his route for Germany, the Sicilians beheld, with passionate grief and indignation, a hundred and fifty sumpter mules in his train, conveying the plunder of their Royal Treasury and household. Not only coined money, ingots, plate, and the Crown jewels, became his prey, but his insatiable lust for gold glutted itself on the spoil even of the rich wardrobes and costly furniture of their ancient Kings. Every movable, say the Chroniclers, adorned with any portion of the precious metals, however small, chairs, tables, beds, and embroidered robes were swept away by the rapacity of the foreign and Barbarian harpy.†

§ Deeply rooted, if not openly avowed hatred of the Tyrant was the necessary result of this oppression; and the feeling was shared no less by his allies than by his subjects. Every promise made to the Pisans and the Genoese was violated without shame or scruple; and not only were they denied the recompense which they had been taught to expect, but even their ancient privileges were annulled, and their property was confiscated. The extermination of the Normans seemed the object of Henry's cruelties; and when they became directed against the remaining members of her own Family and connexions, it cannot surprise us that the fears of Constance were awakened. One of her nearest kinsmen, Richard, Count of Cerra, was arrested by an agent of the Emperor; the sole crime imputed to him was a design of withdrawing into Tuscany, that he might escape witnessing the miseries of his Countrymen. The noble prisoner was delivered to Henry at Capua, dragged ignominiously at the tail of a horse to a gibbet, on which he was suspended by the feet, and after lingering through two days of torture, was strangled by a huge stone fastened round his neck by the hands of the Court Fool.*

Constance may be forgiven if she lent her sanction to a conspiracy which was to terminate the sufferings of her native land; but unhappily, notwithstanding the seeming reconciliation which afterwards took place between the Emperor and the insurgent Nobles whom she supported, a blacker charge has often been brought against her memory, that of administering a poisoned cup, which hastened the close of her husband's days at Messina.

One son, who bore the names of both his grandfathers, Frederic Roger, was the issue of Henry VI.; a child whose birth gave occasion to various strange and fabulous rumours. Constance was delivered of him at Esì, an obscure town in the march of Ancona, while on her route to join the Emperor, during his operations in Italy in 1193. She was at that time in her thirty-seventh, or, at the utmost, her thirty-ninth year; a fact proved by reference to the passage already cited from Godfrey of Viterbo. Nevertheless she has been affirmed by some writers to have been past the ordinary age of child bearing, having attained the mature season of fifty-five, or even sixty years. Hence, it is said, that in order to obviate certain scandalous reports of her intention to palm a supposititious child upon her husband and his subjects, she insisted upon a public delivery; and for that purpose, a tent was pitched in the open plain near Palermo.† It was in behalf of this son that Henry meditated a great change in the German Constitution, and conceived no less bold a design than making the Empire hereditary. The reigning Pope Clement III. assented, and fifty-two Princes affixed their seals to the Decree which was to ratify the proposal. It was frustrated by the opposition of the Saxons; but the Emperor had sufficient influence to obtain the election of the Infant, then little more than two years old, as King of the Romans; a title which, as we shall afterwards perceive, did not procure his recognition as Emperor immediately upon his Father's decease. In Germany, we shall find him surrounded by enemies, and displaced for a season by more powerful competitors. In Sicily, his investiture was not obtained without difficulty, nor till after the curtailment of certain prerogatives; and when Constance followed her husband to the tomb in little more than a year after his decease, their son was left under the dangerous guardianship of Innocent III., a Pontiff urged not less by inclination than by policy to reap the fullest advantages which that important trust presented to his ambition.

* Chronica di Fiesco novo, cited by Giannone, ut supra.

† Giannone adds, from the Preface to the Capitoli del Regno di Sicilia, Ch'ella poi per in Città di Palermo, per son via ogni sospetto, undique con le mammette nude, e discouverte distilando latte. Ut sup.

‡ Sturmius l. 425. and the authorities there cited. Hallam, Middle Ages, l. 464.

Germany and Italy.

From A. D. 1106. to A. D. 1198.

and Rebellion of the Sicilians. A. D. 1197.

Death of Henry VI. hastened the close of her husband's days at Messina.

Birth of his son, Frederic Roger.

Henry's attempt to make the Empire hereditary.

Death of Constance. A. D. 1198.

* Otto de S. Blasio, c. 38.

† Giannone, xiv. vol. d. p. 321. Arnhold of Lubec, (iv. 20) cited by Muratori, speaks of one hundred and sixty sommari. Roger Hoveden (746) computes the spoil of Salerno alone at two hundred thousand ounces of gold.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXXIV

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH—OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS—AND OF THE HERESIES IN THE XIIIth CENTURY.

GENERAL STATE OF THE CHURCH.

History. The period of Ecclesiastical History at which we have now arrived, may be considered as forming one of those cardinal Eras, from which we date the commencement of a new aspect or phasis in the revolutions of Human affairs. The darkness which, since the irruption of the Barbarians into the Western Empire, had, during four or five Centuries, been continually thickening over the nations of Europe, seems at length to have passed its meridian; and henceforth we may easily observe the gradual and unintermitted progress of returning day. The first dawn indeed of this revival was perceptible in the Century immediately preceding. Letters were as yet cultivated by few without the pale of the Church; but a visible improvement had already taken place in the Schools of France and Italy. These were no longer confined to the walls of Monasteries; seminaries of general Learning were opened in many of the principal Cities of those Countries; and Science, such as it was, was now taught in a better method and on more enlarged principles, by Professors both Lay and Ecclesiastical; several of whom had accomplished their course of study in Spain, under the Arabian masters, at that time the chief depositories of profane or Philosophical Learning.* Latin translations had been early made of the principal Treatises of the Saracenic Doctors. It was, in fact, by this circuitous route that the Western world again obtained access to the Mathematical, Medical, and Astronomical writings of the ancient Greeks, and to those of Aristotle himself; the second publication, so to call it, of whose Works may be said in a short time to have produced an entire revolution in the studies of the Age; and during several successive Centuries continued to exercise a most remarkable influence upon all the researches and operations of the Human Intellect.

Improved state and means of Learning. In no department of general study was the effect of this change more immediately, or more powerfully felt, than in the Schools of Divinity. At the beginning of the last Century the public lecturers upon that Science had, for the most part, contented themselves with retailing to their hearers the explanations and illustrations of the Holy text which were to be found in the writings of the Fathers; without attempting to give either order or consistency to their glosses upon Scripture; much less to work them up into any thing like a regular Body of Divinity. But before the end of the same Century this method had given place to one of a much more ambitious character;† the mysteries of Religion were no longer stated merely as Articles of Faith, but it was endeavoured to examine and explain them upon the principles of the Dialectic Science which had become a fashionable; the doctrines of Religion were expounded with all the formalities of Scientific distribution; and the foundation was thus laid for that scheme of Scholastic Divinity, which, in its various ramifications, occupies so large a portion of the Literary and Theological History of the succeeding Centuries.

A fresh impulse was in this way given to the Human Mind, which began to devote itself to the acquisition of knowledge with a zeal and avidity proportioned to its long privation of that its natural aliment. The Church, and more particularly the Papal Court, was foremost in encouraging and rewarding this new ardour of study; and as yet no apprehensions were entertained that either the doctrines of the one, or the pretensions of the other were likely eventually to suffer from that vivacity of research which they were thus promoting. Of the Colleges or learned Societies which were now established for the dissemination of knowledge in the principal Cities of Europe, that of Paris was become particularly conspicuous, as well by the number and ability of its various Professors, as by the great concourse of students who crowded thither from all parts to imbibe Science under their tuition.‡ Of the other Schools of France, Angers became famous for the study of Law, and Montpellier for that of Medicine. In Italy, the celebrated Academy of Salerno was wholly devoted to this last Profession, while Bologna took the lead almost of every other European seminary in the profession of Jurisprudence;§ a study the revival of which is generally ascribed to the discovery of the Pandects of Justinian, when Amalfi was captured by the Pisans in 1135|| Bologna also became equally distinguished for its teachers of Canon Law. To that branch of Academical Learning, likewise, something of method and system had been given by the famous Epitome, or Decretals, which Gratian, a Monk of Bologna, had drawn up about the year 1130,¶ from the Pontifical archives; and which continued, down to a very

* This was the case with the Professors whose precepts gave such celebrity to the Medical School of Salerno. See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. tom. iii. p. 395.

• See De Boulay, Historia Academiæ Paris. tom. i.

† Histoire Littéraire de la France, tom. ix. p. 65.

‡ De Boulay, tom. ii. p. 215.

§ Muratori, Antiq. Ital. tom. iii. p. 890.

|| See p. 631 of this volume.

¶ Under the title of Concordantia Canonum, a Scriptum

History.

recent period, to be the standard text-book of the study, in most of the Universities of Catholic Europe. The Work, indeed, became early a great favourite with the Roman Pontiffs, whose pretensions it supported throughout, and to their utmost extent; and often, as might be expected, by a considerable falsification of documentary evidence.

Account of the Papal succession.

We have seen in what manner the spirit of Papal ambition, after the more gradual encroachments of preceding Pontiffs, had almost attained the fullest accomplishment of its purposes, from the bold, active, and undaunted genius of Gregory VII.; inasmuch that, at the commencement of the present Century, almost every Ecclesiastical affair, down to the most minute, was brought more or less immediately within the jurisdiction of the Papal Court. Hence it is that the Civil and External History of the Church at this period is almost entirely included in that of the See of Rome. On this account, therefore, and also as affording the best and most obvious principle of perspicuity and order in our summaries, we shall make the succession of Pontiffs the groundwork of that general view of Ecclesiastical events which it is our business to exhibit.

Paschal II.

A. D. 1099.

Urban II. died in July 1099. He was succeeded by the Cardinal Rainer, by birth a Tuscan, a man of virtue and ability, whose talents and character had early attracted the favour of Pope Gregory VII. He had scarcely assumed the tiara, under the name of Paschal II., when Rome and all Christendom were gladdened by the tidings of the reduction of Jerusalem, which was taken by assault, on the 15th of July, by the Crusading armies under Godfrey of Bouillon. Shortly after the commencement of his Pontificate, the Antipope Guibert, who had been chosen by the Imperial party, and supported by their intrigues and power, since the time of Gregory VII., died in Calabria; and, although three successive candidates were within a twelvemonth brought forward by the Imperialists to supply his place, their pretensions were almost immediately suppressed by the vigorous measures adopted by Paschal, and they themselves were driven into obscurity.

Account of the nature and origin of the dispute respecting Investiture.

As the dispute concerning the right of Investiture was that which chiefly contributed to disturb the peace of the Church, and indeed of Christendom, during the present Century, it may be right before we proceed further to give a somewhat fuller account of the nature and origin of it* than we have before had an opportunity of doing. The controversy itself naturally resulted from the political circumstances in which at this period the Clergy found themselves placed. From the earliest period of her establishment, the Church had jealously excluded the Civil power from any right of direct interference in the nomination to Ecclesiastical dignities; and so long as these involved only a spiritual jurisdiction, the State was not indisposed to acquiesce, in appearance at least, in the exclusion. But when, by the successive and constantly accumulating endowments of Princes and Nobles, the higher Orders of the Clergy became possessed of fiefs and territories involving large wealth and considerable secular influence, the Feudal Superior began to claim an interest in the disposal of these benefices, grounded upon the equally unquestioned jurisdiction which belonged to him, over all the territories subjected to his authority; and thus it was that a field was opened for perpetually recurring conflicts between the Ecclesiastical and Civil powers of the community.

Of the Christian Church.

The term Investiture* itself, implies the grant, or more strictly, perhaps, the mode of granting, of any estate, fief, dignity, or privilege by the King to his subjects, or a Chief to his vassal, on the necessary conditions of fealty, homage, and feudal service; a ceremony which was usually performed by bestowing upon the person so favoured some material mark, as the token of his Investiture. This, in the case of a territory or estate, was often a piece of turf, or bough of a tree; while in the instance of a place of trust or dignity, some characteristic part of the dress, or ensign of the office, was chosen as the distinguishing symbol. When the Bishops and Abbots of the Church became possessors of territorial revenues and jurisdictions, they were of course, as such, subjected to the same rules which applied to all lay holders of rights or property; and were not considered as legally possessing those properties, until they had formally done homage for the same before their Superior, and received from his hand, in return for their oath of allegiance, the appropriate symbol of the legal transfer of them. What was the ceremony at first used in the Investiture of Ecclesiastical dignitaries seems not altogether ascertained. Probably it varied in different places, or according to the fashion of the time, or the fancy of individuals. We read that the Emperor Henry II. bestowed the Bishopric of Paderborn upon Meinvercus, by the token of presenting him with a glove; and there is reason to believe that in the first instance, neither the ring, nor the crosier, nor any other emblem peculiarly characteristic of the spiritual privileges of the Bishop, was employed, to signify the execution of a transfer, which professedly referred only to the conveyance of secular jurisdiction.

Ceremony of Investiture.

The right of interference thus exercised by laymen in the promotion to Ecclesiastical dignities was, therefore, one only of sanction, and not of direct nomination; yet, as might have been foreseen, it soon tended practically to resolve itself into the same thing, and as such, became early, and naturally, a subject of jealousy and opposition on the part of the Church. These feelings waxed stronger when the laity, in the exercise of their privilege prostituted it, as they soon did, to purposes of the most flagrant and shameless Simony. With the view of eluding this abuse,† the Clergy in many instances upon the death of a Bishop or Abbot, after electing a successor, proceeded immediately to his consecration; of which ceremony the delivery of the ring and crosier, as the ensigns of Episcopal function, was an essential part. By this proceeding, the interference of the Feudal Superior was at once excluded, since, after consecration, the election became irrevocable. The secular power, however, soon took an effectual method to obviate this stratagem; by ordaining, that immediately upon the death of a Bishop, those ensigns of his function should be taken possession of by the authorities of the Episcopal City, and forthwith transmitted to the keeping of the Prince; who thus retained in his hands an effective control

Abuse of the power of Investiture by laymen.

Investiture by ring and crosier.

which sufficiently indicates the nature and object of the book. Gratian is said to have employed no less than twenty-four years in its composition.

* Much valuable information on this subject, although, as might be expected, tinged with a decided Papal bias, is to be derived from Cardinal Noris's History of Investitures.

* See INVESTITURE in our Miscellaneous Division.

† A very clear and satisfactory statement of the facts of this part of the subject is to be found in Mosheim, (Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 290. MacLaine's translation,) together with ample references to original authorities.

History. over the election of the Clergy. It was by the delivery of the ring and crosier to the favoured candidate, that the Sovereign, in effect, designated the new Bishop, who proceeded to place these badges of his dignity in the hands of his Metropolitan, from whom he again received them, in the final ceremony of consecration.

We see, then, that the whole controversy upon this subject was the natural consequence of the compound character which the higher Clergy at this time began to assume: as being not merely the Spiritual Pastors, but, in many instances, the Territorial Lords of their people; and of the difficulty in reconciling the claims which either party might justly prefer, to interpose in the elections in question. That the Prince should claim a right of interfering in the disposal of dignities which, in fact, conveyed to the persons holding them large temporal wealth and power, was natural and indeed necessary. At the same time it was impossible but that the Clergy should be in the highest degree jealous of the exercise of the prerogative which was thence usurped by laymen to confer absolutely and arbitrarily all the spiritual offices of the Church; especially when they saw the privilege abused, as it was sure to be, in the hands of the Lay Superior, to purposes of the most sordid and profligate selfishness. But although the Church, and particularly the Roman Pontiffs, had long entertained these feelings, it was Gregory VII. who first gave vent to them, by openly attacking the practice itself. This he did in the bold and uncompromising spirit which usually distinguished his proceedings. He at once, and absolutely, prohibited all Investitures of Benefices whatever, and even it is said forbade Bishops to take oaths of homage or fealty to their Princes; claiming to himself as the Universal Bishop and Head of the Church their undivided faith and allegiance.* Some writers, however, deny that Hildebrand did in fact carry his audacity to this extent; but it is certain that his successor (the next but one) Urban II. did not hesitate to do so; for we find the latter, in the Council of Clermont, expressly including in his anathema, not merely the act of Investiture by a layman, but even the oath of fealty on the part of the Bishop to the Prince; an extremity of pretension so obviously unreasonable in itself, that we cannot but suspect it to have been put forward by the Pontiffs not so much in the hope of actually obtaining that extent of immunity, as with the purpose of preferring a claim, the subsequent concession of which might the better enable them to compromise for the abandonment, on the part of the secular power, of its interference in respect to Investitures.

Investiture by ring and crosier forbidden by the Council of Clermont.

A more rational and better founded objection on the part of the Clergy, was that which referred to the mode of Investiture exercised by Princes, by personally conferring the crosier and the ring, which were peculiarly, and exclusively, symbolical of the spiritual authority exercised by the Bishops. It does not appear that this was made matter of especial controversy till the time of Paschal II., who, in the Conference which he held with the Emperor's deputies at Chalons in 1107, more particularly insisted upon the abandonment of this ceremony, as implying pretensions on the part of the State altogether inadmissible.

Of the controversies, and indeed we may say, the wars,

* See Dupin, Ecclesiastical History, vol. x. p. 32. See also Mosheim, ibid.

of which this subject was the occasion between the Popes Gregory, Urban, Paschal, and Calixtus, and the Emperors Henry IV. and V., a full account may be found under our ANNALS OF GERMANY; at present, we shall merely allude to some of the principal results of those transactions. By the Treaty which Paschal, under the compulsion of personal captivity, was compelled to sign with Henry V. at Rome in April 1111, the humbled Pontiff consented to an entire abandonment of his opposition to the right, as claimed by the Emperor, of investiture by the ring and crosier.* This Treaty, however, extorted by violence, was immediately and loudly exclaimed against by the Clergy throughout Italy and Germany; and in the following year, was solemnly annulled in a Council held in the Church of the Lateran.† It was not till the year 1122 that a new and more satisfactory settlement of the dispute was arranged at Worms between the Emperor and the Legate of Pope Calixtus II. By this it was agreed, "that for the future all Bishops and Abbots should be chosen by those to whom the right of election belongs, i. e. by the Canons and Monks of their respective Chapters and Communities, but that the election should take place in the presence of the Emperor, or of an ambassador appointed by him for that purpose; that any dispute arising among the electors should be decided by the Emperor; that the Bishop or Abbot elect should take an oath of allegiance to the Emperor, and do homage to him for the temporalities (regalia) which he should receive from his hands; which, however, were to be conferred by the Emperor, not by the crosier and ring, (the badge of spiritual function,) but by the accepte, as the more appropriate symbol of Investiture into rights and privileges in themselves merely temporal. This Concordat was soon after solemnly confirmed by the General Council; which was summoned to meet in the Lateran in the year following.

The subject of Investitures had never been the occasion of any contest between the Popes and the Crown of France. The right was one which had always been enjoyed by the French Kings, undisturbed even by a Papal remonstrance; though they early desisted from exercising it by the obnoxious emblems of the crosier and ring, contenting themselves with signifying the collation to benefices in their dominions by verbal or written declarations. In England, as we have seen, it formed a principal point of the quarrel between William Rufus and Archbishop Anselm; and such was the violence with which that brutal Prince enforced his pretensions, that Anselm found it prudent to leave the Kingdom and take refuge in France. On the death of Rufus, Henry I., his successor, anxious to conciliate as far as possible the suffrage of the Clergy to his usurpation of a crown which of right belonged to his elder brother Robert, recalled

* The following are the terms of the Treaty. After certain preliminary expressions of attachment and gratitude on the part of the Pontiff towards the Emperor, the former goes on to say, "We, therefore, grant to you that prerogative which our predecessors have granted to you, namely, that you invest the Bishops and Abbots of your Kingdom with the staff and ring, provided they shall have been elected freely and without Simony, and that they be consecrated, after you shall have invested them, by the Bishops whose province it is. If any shall be chosen by the people and the Clergy without your approbation, let him not be consecrated till you have invested him."

See Bower, Hist. of the Popes, vol. v. p. 391.

† Council, tom. x. p. 767.

‡ Ibid. tom. x. p. 894.

Of the Church.
Treaty between Paschal II. and the Emperor Henry V.
A. D. 1111.

annulled by the Council of the Lateran.
Council.

that for the future all Bishops and Abbots should be chosen by those to whom the right of election belongs, i. e. by the Canons and Monks of their respective Chapters and Communities, but that the election should take place in the presence of the Emperor, or of an ambassador appointed by him for that purpose; that any dispute arising among the electors should be decided by the Emperor; that the Bishop or Abbot elect should take an oath of allegiance to the Emperor, and do homage to him for the temporalities (regalia) which he should receive from his hands; which, however, were to be conferred by the Emperor, not by the crosier and ring, (the badge of spiritual function,) but by the accepte, as the more appropriate symbol of Investiture into rights and privileges in themselves merely temporal. This Concordat was soon after solemnly confirmed by the General Council; which was summoned to meet in the Lateran in the year following.

See also the Concordat of Worms.
Concordat of Worms.
A. D. 1122.

History Anselm, and reinstated him in the Primacy. The Archbishop returned, but when required, after the example of his predecessors, to do homage for his See, he positively refused : " and the King, unwilling at that critical juncture of his affairs to come to an open breach with the refractory Primate, consented to refer the matter to Rome. The answer returned by that Court may readily be guessed; it fully approved and confirmed the refusal of Anselm. The King, however, still insisted on his rights, but reluctant to push things to extremities, he suggested that Anselm should himself proceed to Rome to take the opinion of the Sovereign Pontiff;† more, it is believed, as a pretext for getting rid of the presence of the obnoxious Churchman than from any hope of benefit to be derived from the employment of his services in the negotiation. The result of this second appeal was such as must have been foreseen, and neither party being willing to recede from their pretensions, Anselm remained abroad till 1107; when the inconveniences resulting both to the Church and the Crown from the continuance of this state of affairs becoming daily more aggravated, a sort of compromise of the conflicting claims took place; the right of Investiture on the part of the Crown was abandoned by the Prince; and, on the other hand, the Bishops were allowed to do homage for their temporal properties and privileges; and by this means, the Sovereign retained an indirect control over the elections of the Bishops, at the same time that he forebore the invidious exercise of any thing like immediate nomination.

Final settlement of the dispute with Anselm.
A still more memorable controversy between the English Crown and the Church took place in the course of the present Century; but the story of Thomas à Becket forms so remarkable a Chapter in the Civil History of the Age, and as such is so familiar to the general reader,‡ that we shall not in this place dwell upon the details of it. It will be sufficient to our present purpose to state shortly the original grounds and final issue of the quarrel. Henry II., a bold, able, and politic Prince, had early felt the embarrassment and dangers resulting to the Royal authority from the late encroachments of the Church, and, accordingly, made it one of his first objects to take measures for reducing her pretensions within stricter and more definite limits. With this view, he summoned a great Council of his Nobles and Clergy at Clarendon,§ (January, 1164,) when a Body of Constitutions, sixteen in number, was unanimously voted, by which the privileges and immunities of the Church were restrained and defined; the Clergy themselves were effectually brought under the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts; and the right of the Crown to interfere in the election to any vacant dignity in the Hierarchy was clearly and fully provided for. These laws were unanimously agreed to by the Council, the Primate Becket himself, though with the utmost reluctance, having been induced by his brethren to sign them; but when sent to the Pope (Alexander III.) for ratification, they were by him at once and indignantly rejected. Upon this, Becket immediately retracted his assent, and imposed on himself the severest penance for the weakness by which he had been betrayed into giving it. Henry, enraged in the highest degree at this conduct on the part of a subject whom he had loaded with obligations, and whom, in fact, he had elevated to his present station, in the confident expectation that he would cooperate in those very measures which he was now so effectually thwarting, availed himself of every means, whether legal or otherwise, of humbling and annoying the Primate; inasmuch that at length he was driven to take refuge on the Continent. There, supported by the King of France and by the Pope, who had invested him with a Legatine commission over England, he launched a sentence of excommunication against all those Ministers, whether Laymen or Clergy, who had been instrumental in furthering the King's designs; levelling at the same time a similar censure against Henry himself, and which he suspended only to give the Monarch time for repentance. Henry, after in vain endeavouring to bend the purpose of his refractory subject, was at length driven, by the difficulties of his situation, to consent to a compromise. In return for the absolution of his Ministers from the excommunication under which they lay, Becket and his adherents were, without further submission on their part, restored to the full possession of their benefices; and it was at the same time agreed that all the questions which had given rise to these disputes should be buried in oblivion. Becket, however, was so little disposed to act in the spirit of this last provision of the Treaty, that his first act after his return was to publish a sentence of suspension or excommunication against the Archbishop of York, and such Prelates or officers as had been concerned in the coronation of the King's son, Prince Henry; a ceremony which had taken place during his absence, but the solemnization of which he claimed as the exclusive privilege of the See of Canterbury. The anger of the King at this new instance of turbulence on the part of Becket, and the manner in which his unguarded expression of his feelings led to the assassination of the Archbishop, (December 29, 1170,) are well known to every reader. In the accommodation which Henry was subsequently (1172) so happy to conclude with the Court of Rome, he contrived, after making every personal atonement for the crime of which he had been the involuntary occasion, substantially to save all the material prerogatives which had been established by the Constitutions of Clarendon, with the exception of the prohibition of appeals to Rome; a privilege, the abuse of which, however, was, in a great degree, provided against, by the clause which gave the King the power of exacting from all such appellants a sufficient security that they should not attempt any thing inconsistent with the rights of his Crown.*

To return to the succession of the Popes in this Century. Paschal II. died in the very height of the contest with the Emperor, in January 1118, but his death, instead of tending to appease the heats which his measures had so materially inflamed, only occasioned a new schism. Six days after his decease, John of Caieta was elected Pope by the Cardinals, under the name of Gelasius II. The election, however, was violently opposed by the Imperial party, under Cenci of Frangipani, who caused Burdinus, Archbishop of Braga, in Portugal, to be proclaimed Pope, taking the name of Gregory VIII. After

Of the Christian Church.

A. D. 1118. Antipope Burdinus.

* See Kadner, Hist. lib. iii.

† Ibid. p. 70.

‡ Ibid. See also Collier, Ecclesiastical History, vol. I. p. 292.

§ See, in particular, Hume, of the early part of whose Work the story of Becket forms one of the most interesting and spirited passages.

|| See Collier, Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. in which these Constitutions are given at length.

* See Collier, Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 379.

- History. some scenes of mutual violence, Gelasius was compelled to take refuge in France, where he died in the Abbey of Cluny, on the 29th of January following, designating as his successor, Guy, Archbishop of Vienne; a choice which was immediately sanctioned by the Cardinals at Rome and at Cluny. The new Pontiff, who assumed the name of Calixtus II., was the son of William, Count of Burgundy, and nearly related to the Emperor and to the King of France, and the ability, courage, and moderation which he displayed, did equal honour to his exalted birth and station. He soon made himself master of Rome, drove out with ignominy his competitor Bardinus, and, as we have seen, brought the existing contest with the Emperors to a successful adjustment by the Treaty of Worms. He died, after a short reign, in 1124. His successor was Lambert, Bishop of Ostia; who took the name of Honorius II., and owed his election chiefly to the management of the Imperial party, but subsequently contrived to conciliate the suffrages of the Cardinals also. Upon his death, in 1130, Gregory, Cardinal of St. Angelo, was elected, under the name of Innocent II., by one party of the Cardinals, at the same time that another faction in the College chose Peter of Leon, who assumed the Papal title, under the name of Anacletus. The latter had the stronger party at Rome, and his competitor was obliged to fly to France, although his title was acknowledged by all the Princes of Europe, except the Kings of Sicily and Scotland. Upon one occasion, the Emperor Lothaire established him by force in the Vatican; but he was almost immediately driven out again by Anacletus, who maintained his ground till his death, which happened in 1138. This, in effect, put an end to the schism, in spite of a feeble effort on the part of his friends to continue it, by another election; and Innocent returned to Rome, where, in the next year, he presided at the second Council of Lateran. He died in 1143. Celestin II., his successor, filled the See but a few months. On his decease, the choice of the Cardinals fell on Gerard, who took the name of Lucius II., whose short and stormy Pontificate was terminated, in 1145, by his death; occasioned by the blow of a stone which he received while endeavouring to repress a tumult among the people. A party had at this time been formed in Rome to restore the power of the Senate by reducing, or even wholly taking away the temporal authority of the Pontiff. It was this faction which gave so much trouble to Lucius; and which continued, under the famous Arnold of Brescia, to embarrass the Government throughout the whole Pontificate of his successor, Bernard of Pisa, (a scholar of the distinguished Saint and Doctor of the same name, and who, on election, took the title of Eugenius III.,) inasmuch that he was repeatedly obliged to fly the City, in order to avoid their violence. He died in 1153; his successor, Anastasius IV., survived his election little more than a year; and in December, 1154, was succeeded by Nicholas Breakspear, an Englishman, the only one of that nation who ever attained the Papacy, and who took the name of Adrian IV. Of the disputes which ensued between this Pontiff and the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, an account will be found elsewhere. They were cut short by the death of Adrian, in 1159; when, however, a new source of trouble was opened to the Church in the schism that broke out respecting the election of his successor. Alexander III. was supported by the People of Rome, and by the Kings of France and England; he was, however, for many years kept out of his See by the violence of the Emperor, who declared for his competitor Victor, and afterwards for Paschal and Calixtus, who, on the decease of Victor, were successively elected by the same party in his room. Alexander, however, eventually triumphed over his competitors and the Emperor himself, and after a reign of unusual length and almost incessant turmoil, died in August 1181, in full and peaceable possession of his See. The troubles so continually occasioned by disputed elections, of which he had himself so painfully experienced the effects, suggested the decree which at his proposal was sanctioned in 1179 by the third Lateran Council; and by which the nomination of his successors was vested in the College of Cardinals alone, the suffrages of a majority of two-thirds of the Sacred College being deemed necessary for the successful candidate.*
- But this regulation, however salutary, was far from being popular with the Roman Clergy and People, who were thus excluded from their former share in the election of the supreme Pontiff. Lucius III., the successor of Alexander, who was chosen by the suffrages of the College alone, was repeatedly driven from the See by the disaffected populace, and died at Verona in 1185. Of the succeeding Pontiffs, Urban, Gregor, Clement, and Celestin, little remarkable is recorded; Celestin died in 1198; and was succeeded by Lothar, Count of Segni, who took the name of Innocent III. His Pontificate is one of the most memorable in Papal Annals, but the record of it belongs rather to the History of the following Century.
- Such was the succession of the Roman Pontiffs in the present Century, during the whole of which, their power, notwithstanding occasional checks and humiliations, may be considered as being substantially and gradually on the increase.† If we view the fact in a purely Religious light, the success of their pretensions, founded as they were on wholly false assumptions and the most obvious perversion of Scriptural authority, must no doubt be considered as among the grossest corruptions of Christian Truth; otherwise it is not so clear but that in an Age of barbarism like that of which we are treating, this or any other power, which could successfully appeal from the violence of brute force to something like Opinion, was productive of political advantages to the people which more than counterbalanced the evils of its abuse.
- The same remark is in like manner applicable to another of the abuses to which the prevailing corruption of Religious Truth gave rise; we mean the Monastic institutions. However mistaken might be the devotion which either founded or filled these communities,

* Concil. tom. x. p. 1607.

† Before the close of the Century they had effectually established their authority as Sovereigns in the City of Rome, as well as their independence of the Emperor, and the weight of their power and influence in matters Secular as well as Ecclesiastical was felt throughout Europe. Most of the Councils which took place were convoked either by them immediately, or by their Legates; and the decision of these assemblies was commonly the result of their dictation. By the encouragement given to appeals to Rome, almost every matter of Ecclesiastical resort was brought immediately within their jurisdiction; indeed, the inconvenience resulting from this practice were so strongly and early felt, that St. Bernard warmly exclaimed against it; and accordingly, in the third Lateran Council, it was attempted to give some check to the abuse by the VIII Canon, which annulled all appeals entered before the sentence was pronounced, as well as those which were not prosecuted within a limited time. See Dupin, vol. x. p. 208.

History.

increase of the Military Orders.
The Cistercians.

A. D.

1098.

Order of Premonstr.

A. D.

1120.

Orders of Grandmont

and Fontercauld.

Carmelites.

Military

Orders.

St. John.

Knights

Templars.

Teutonic

Order.

Doctrine of the Church in this Century.

Transub-stantiation.

they cannot be denied to have afforded, in the darkness and lawlessness of the times, not only the best nurseries for Literary and Theological Learning, but almost the only asylums, which then existed, against the rapine and violence of Power. In the course of the present Century, both the number and wealth of these establishments were greatly increased; and several new Orders were added. That of the Cistercians,* under the auspices and guidance of St. Bernard, spread itself rapidly throughout Europe; and almost immediately took that place in public respect and reverence, which the Order of Cluny had hitherto occupied, but which it had thus early began to forfeit, by the indolence and dissoluteness of its members. A new congregation was added to the Order of Regular Canons by Norbert, a German Nobleman, who had embraced a Religious life, and who became afterwards Bishop of Magdeburg. In the year 1120 he established the Order of Premonstré, (so called from the place of its foundation, in Picardy,) which in a few years attained to enormous wealth, and extended itself to almost every part of Europe. Its rule, with some slight alterations, was the same with that of St. Augustin. The celebrated Orders of Grandmont, founded by Stephen of Muret, of Fontevraud, by Robert of Arbrisselles, and that of the Carmelites, which it is affirmed originated from an assemblage of Hermits on Mount Carmel, whom the Patriarch of Antioch, about the time of the first Crusade, had formed into a sort of community; took their rise soon after the beginning of the present Century.†

To the same period we must refer the original establishment of the Military Orders, which in the first instance were subjected to the rule of St. Augustin, modified, of course, in some degree, by the peculiar object of their institution. Of these the most ancient is that of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, who were established in the first instance for the reception and care of the Pilgrims visiting the Holy City. The object of the institution of the Order of Templars was to act in a military capacity for the protection of the same class of travellers. The foundation of the Teutonic Order, which originally combined the accomplishment of both these services, took place somewhat later.‡

Neither the doctrine nor the discipline of the Church during the present Century presents any very remarkable novelty. The doctrine of the corporal presence in the Eucharist, as it is at present held by the Roman Church, was by this time very generally received; and the term Transubstantiation, by which it is endeavoured to express, or rather to designate that extraordinary tenet, was for the first time brought into use. Many, however, still adhered to the opinions of Berenger upon that mysterious subject. We may observe that the early, and indeed Apostolical practice of giving the communion in both kinds to the laity, continued throughout the present Century; though in some places the method was adopted of soaking the bread in the wine, previous to its delivery to the communicant.

The morals and conduct of the Clergy were upon the whole in a course of amendment, a natural result of the progressive civilization and instruction of the Age.

It was in this Century that the odious practice of granting Indulgences, by which the penances imposed for the commission of sins were commuted for a sum of money paid to the Church, may be said to have taken its rise. One effect of this abuse was almost wholly to abolish the wholesome usage, so early established in the Church, of public acts of Penitence. The profits of this traffic were in all instances confined to the Bishops; but they soon became so large, as to attract the cupidity of the Pope, who soon preferred a claim of exclusive monopoly in the issue of these Indulgences, and subsequently, in the natural progress of their impious presumption, extended the application of them to the remission, not merely of all penalties pronounced upon sin by the Church on Earth, but even those which were to be dealt upon iniquity by the sentence of our Heavenly Judge hereafter. It was to give some colour to this absurd and impious assumption on the part of the Pontiffs, that the doctrine of works of supererogation was invented, by which it was supposed that the Saints had been enabled to perform a multitude of pious works beyond those necessary to their own salvation; all which formed a treasure in the hands of the Church, and were by her applicable to the relief of sinners, upon such terms and conditions as she might please to impose.*

Another source of revenue to the Clergy was now found in the permission given to Priests to receive alms for the performance of Masses, but they were as yet forbidden to exact them.

We have already adverted to the increase which took place in the number and riches of the Monastic Societies during this Century. The multiplication of these institutions was from the beginning studiously favoured by the Popes, who sought to attach the members to the interests of the Roman See, by exempting them as much as possible from the jurisdiction of the Ordinaries. An attempt was made in the third Lateran Council to limit the abuses arising from the privileges obtained by the Monks, and they were strictly forbidden the administration of the Sacraments; but these, like the other equally wholesome reformations enjoined by that Synod, were for the most part evaded in practice; and this the more easily, as the abuse was one which the Court of Rome found its interest in encouraging.

We cannot take a better opportunity than this to give some account of the Councils held in the XIIth Century.

Of these, there were three called General Councils; although since the separation of the Greek Church that term is no longer applicable in the ecumenical sense in which it was given to the earlier Synods of the Catholic Church. The three assemblies in question were all convened at Rome in the Lateran Church, from which

Of the Christian Church.

Doctrine of works of supererogation invented.

Alms for Masses.

* Founded in the year 1098 at Cîteaux, in the Diocese of Châlons, by Robert, Abbot of Molesme in Burgundy. The rule was that of St. Benedict, but loaded with many additional austerities, the observance of which, though strictly adhered to under Harding and Bernard, became gradually relaxed as the wealth of the community increased. It is said, that, within the first Century after its foundation, this Order could number not less than eighteen hundred Abbeys, its offshoots in different parts of Europe. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Medi. Ævi, tom. i. for a list of the numerous Institutions of the Order.

† See Dupin, Ecclesiastical History, vol. x. p. 218.
‡ See Helyot, Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, Religieux et Militaires; a Work of great fulness and accuracy of research, for a complete account of the origin, nature, and progress of these several institutions.

* See Mosheim, Ecc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 421, and the authorities there cited by him.

History.
First Lateran Council.
A. D.
1123.

circumstance they take their name; and they consisted wholly of Western Bishops. The first of them, as we have before mentioned, was summoned by Pope Calixtus III., in March 1123, for the purpose of sanctioning the Treaty concluded with the Emperor respecting the right of Investitures. Beside the arrangement of this matter, the Council took this opportunity of publishing twenty-two Canons, upon matters chiefly relating to the rights and discipline of the Clergy. Of these the most material are the III^d, which renews the prohibition of marriage to the Clergy; and the XXth, which is the first Canon which not merely forbids all such marriages, but declares them null and void when made.*

Second Lateran Council.
A. D.
1139.

The second Lateran Council was convened by Pope Innocent II., in April 1139, and consisted, it is said, of above a thousand Prelates. Thirty Canons were the result of their deliberations, which refer almost wholly to matters of discipline and internal regulation; and are often merely repetitions of those published by the former Council.†

Third Lateran Council.
A. D.
1179.

The third General Council of Lateran met in 1179, under Pope Alexander III. Its principal object was to take measures for reforming sundry crying abuses which had crept into the Church; and in the Canons which it established for this view, it is impossible to mistake the operation of a real anxiety for the effective amendment of the Church. Twenty-seven capitulares, or Articles of Canons were decreed by this Council. The 1st of these is one to which we had occasion to allude before, by which it was declared that the votes of two-thirds of the Cardinals were necessary for the election of the Pope. Some of the others are worthy of notice, both as illustrating the manners and position of the Clergy, as well as the kinds of abuse which then prevailed in the Church. Thus by the IVth Constitution, the number of horses which Prelates may maintain for their visitations is limited, in the cases of Archbishops to forty or fifty, and about half that number to Cardinals or Bishops. By the XVth it was declared that the estates and monies which Clergymen had saved out of their benefices should fall to the Churches to which they belong, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition on their part to the contrary. The XIIIth and XIVth strictly prohibit the holding of a plurality either of prebends or benefices by the same individual. The XVIIth orders the settlement in every Cathedral Church of a schoolmaster for the instruction of youth, with the allotment of a benefice of sufficient revenue for his maintenance. The XIXth prohibits, under anathema, the imposition, on the part of the secular power, of any taxes upon Churches or Ecclesiastical persons; unless in cases in which the Bishops and the rest of the Clergy, in consideration of the exigencies of the State, have previously consented to the same.‡

The last Canon of this Council was directed against the Waldenses, Albigenses, and other Heretics of the times, of whom it is necessary that we should give some short account, before we conclude our abstract of Ecclesiastical History for the present Century.

HERESIES OF THE XIIth CENTURY.

PETROBRUSIANS.
HENRICIANS.
CATHARI.
ARNOLD OF BRESCIA.
WALDENSES.

Of these Heresies, the first which gave any considerable disturbance to the Church was broached in the South of France by one Peter of Bruis, and his disciple Henry. We are indebted for an account of their doctrines chiefly to their adversary, Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Cluny, in whose refutation they are classed under five principal heads; viz. 1st, they opposed Infant Baptism, claiming the administration of that rite to adults only; and rebaptizing all persons previous to the admission of them into their sect; 2^{dly}, they condemned as unscriptural the use of all Churches, Temples, and Altars, and emphasized their conviction on this head by destroying wherever they had the power; 3^{dly}, they rejected the adoration of Crosses, and broke them on all occasions; 4th, they declared against the Mass as useless; and 5^{thly}, they taught that alms and prayers for the dead were unavailing. These doctrines they not only taught, but proceeded to put into execution wherever they possessed the opportunity; so that throughout Provence and Languedoc for some time nothing but confusion and violence prevailed; the Churches were profaned or pulled down; the Altars destroyed, and the Crosses burned; the Priests were ill-treated, and in some cases compelled to marry; and all the ordinary ritual of the Church abolished. The authorities, both Civil and Ecclesiastical, found it at length necessary to take rigorous measures for the suppression of these disturbances; the principal authors of them were seized; and among them Peter himself, who, after a ministry of above twenty years, was burned alive at St. Gilles, in Languedoc, in 1130.

A Heresy, of somewhat similar character, and manifesting itself by like violence, broke out soon after in Perigueux. A contemporary writer; describes its followers as affecting a strictly Apostolic life, eating no flesh, drinking no wine, or scarcely any, praying almost incessantly, and renouncing all right of property. They disregarded the Mass, and denounced the adoration of Crosses and Crucifixes as idolatrous. "This sect," continues the same writer, "increases greatly, and is followed not only by many persons of quality, who leave their estates, but by many Ecclesiastics both secular and regular." "Tis a hard matter," he adds, "to take them, for whenever they are apprehended the Devil helps them out of prison." He adds, that they performed miracles, and that the name of the head of their sect was PONTIUS.

Doctrines, substantially the same, seem to have been promulgated about this time in Flanders, and in parts of Germany, by a teacher named Tanquelmus. A similar

* Concil. tom. x. p. 291.

† Ibid. p. 1102.

‡ Ibid. p. 1517.

* Some Writers (see Moishim, Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 448) question the fact that Henry was a disciple of Peter, on the ground of certain material differences in the doctrines which they taught. Henry was brought before a Council, presided over by Pope Innocent III., at Rheims, in 1148, and afterwards committed to prison, in which he died.

† See Haugage, Histoire des Eglises Reformees, Period ii. p. 148.

‡ A Monk of the name of Herbert. See Dupin, vol. x. p. 67, who however, does not state the name of the Work from which this citation is derived.

History.
Cathari.

spirit was manifested in Italy; in many parts of which the sect of the Cathari continued to prevail, and to occasion considerable embarrassment to the Church. It is palpable from the common character which prevailed among all these sects, that their proximate cause is to be sought in some circumstances of general operation; of these there can be no doubt but that the principal one was the sense which so naturally began to prevail of the corruptions and abuses existing in the Church; and of the glaring and barefaced perversion of Scriptural doctrine which so many of her tenets involved. It was impossible that any one could open that Book, which the Clergy still professed to consider as the standard of their Faith and practice, without perceiving not merely how grossly they had degenerated in both from the purity and simplicity of their Master's precepts, but that in a large proportion of instances they were in fact acting and teaching directly in contradiction to them. Hence it was that a teacher, however humble or uninstructed, had only to profess a doctrine somewhat more obviously accordant with the spirit of the Gospel, and whatever might be his errors on other subjects, or however absurd his pretensions,* he was immediately surrounded by a host of followers. These, on their part, were easily excited to express their disgust at the corruptions of the Church, by acts of violence against her property and members, and thus afforded to the Ecclesiastical authorities but too fair a pretext for calling in the arm of the State to assist in the suppression of them.

Besides the doctrines we have here mentioned as referring to the discipline and system of the Church, and which were common to all these sects, there were others connected with the fundamental Articles of Faith, by the entertainment of which, perhaps, they more strictly deserved the name of Heretics. We have already mentioned their errors on the subject of Infant Baptism and the Eucharist. Some of them are said to have questioned the divinity of our Saviour; others to have entangled themselves in certain Manichean notions respecting the attributes of the Deity; but upon all these points, as our accounts of them are derived almost exclusively from their adversaries, we must make allowance for a considerable spirit of exaggeration, if not of misrepresentation, in the statements which have come down to us.

It is not clear whether we can strictly reckon among this class of heretics the celebrated Arnold of Brescia, who gave so much trouble to the Papal Government during the Pontificate of Eugenius III., though he has been accused of participating in the opinions we have mentioned respecting the Lord's Supper and Infant Baptism. The distinguishing feature of his doctrine, however, and that by the promulgation of which he most peculiarly excited the alarm and vengeance of his enemies, was the tenet which he fearlessly proclaimed, that Ecclesiastics should not be allowed to hold property of any kind, beyond the voluntary oblations of the faithful. It must be admitted by every one who calmly considers the abuse which the Clergy of those Ages made of their privileges and opulence, that the doctrine of Arnold upon this subject was not without a plausible foundation both in fact and reason; though the manner and the means by which he proceeded to enforce the practical application of it to the Court of Rome were somewhat too undistinguishing in their violence. Notwithstanding the temporary success of his enterprise, he was, after a long struggle, seized by the Governor of the city in the year 1155, and put to a cruel death. His party, however, outlived him, and continued from time to time to occasion considerable disturbance to the Papal Court.

But of all the sects that arose in the course of this Century, the one which, as well by the purity of its doctrine as by the ability and courage of its leaders, attracted the greatest number of followers, and exercised the most permanent influence, was that of the Waldenses. The accounts given of the birth of this sect are various. By some they are said to have derived their origin and name from the valleys of Piedmont, the inhabitants of which, called the Vaudois, had, up to this period, retained in their inaccessible fastnesses the primitive doctrine of Christianity, uncontaminated by the corruptions with which it had everywhere else become infected. Others ascribe its commencement to the exertions of Peter Waldo, an eminent merchant of Lyons, who having employed a Priest to translate for him into French a great part of the Holy Scriptures, together with portions of the comments of the early Fathers, was so struck with the difference thus presented to him, between the doctrine of the Gospel, and that of the Church, that he was impelled to devote himself to the duty of recalling his contemporaries to the knowledge and practice of the Religion of Christ. With this view he gave up his business, distributed all he had among the poor, and putting himself at the head of a few followers, began to travel from place to place, preaching everywhere what he considered to be the pure doctrine of the Scriptures. This was about the year 1150.* The attempts made by the Clergy to suppress the new sect in its beginning, only gave it additional vogue; but the story of these exertions, as well as of the subsequent progress of the Waldenses, belongs more properly to the following Century.

We shall only add here a short account of their tenets, Their as well as we have been able to ascertain their nature amid the confused, and often contradictory accounts of the various writers who have undertaken to describe them. Their distinguishing character seems to have consisted in a strict adherence to what they considered to be the doctrine originally delivered by Christ to his Apostles; and nearly all their errors are to be traced to the adoption of a too literal interpretation of the words of the Gospel; without sufficiently considering how far the sense of particular precepts was to be limited or modified, not merely by the general sense of the particular passage, or by the apposition of others, but often also by the peculiar circumstances under which they were first spoken, and the proper office and function of the persons to whom they were addressed. It was thus that

* One of the most striking illustrations of the prevailing fanaticism of the Age is to be found in the success of a certain crack-brained gentleman of Brittany, of the name of Eon, who, bearing in Church these words chanted, "Per Eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos," took it into his head that he was the person thus designated. Accordingly, he made public his pretensions as such, and they were immediately admitted by a great multitude of followers, who revered him as the Son of God. He was seized, and brought before Pope Eugenius III. at the Council held at Rheims in 1148, and condemned to close confinement, in which he soon after died; but his madness survived in a considerable number of his disciples, many of whom were content to undergo death at the stake, rather than abandon their belief in him. See Matthew Paris, Hist. Major, p. 68.

* See Bagnage, Histoire des Eglises Reformees, tom. i. p. 329. See also Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 452. with MacLaine's Note.

History.

taking, as they did, the Sermon on the Mount as the great summary of Christian duty, they conceived themselves bound by its injunctions to abstain from all warfare, whether just or unjust, whether private or public; from all resistance of injury; from suits of law; from oaths upon any occasion; and from all care for their worldly substance, beyond that provision which their daily labour afforded for the day passing over them. But whatever were the extravagances into which they were betrayed on these points, it is impossible not to respect their very errors, springing as they did from a spirit of the purest self-denial, and a sincere anxiety to tread, as they conceived, as strictly as possible in the footsteps of their Divine Master. Upon other matters, their opinions do not seem to differ materially from those of the Reformers, who in a later Age, and upon grounds substantially similar, conceived themselves obliged to separate from the Church of Rome.

It remains only to add to these sketches of the various aspects of Ecclesiastical affairs during the XIIIth Century, a few biographical notices of the principal Theological Writers who then flourished. These, however, will be but short, as in truth much of the matter that might have been arranged under this head, has in some degree been anticipated in our previous allusions to the various controversies which sprang up during the same period.

GREEK ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE XIIIth CENTURY.

PETER CHRYSOLANUS.
EUSTRATIUS.
EUTHYMIUS ZYGABENUS.
PHILIP THE SOLITARY.
MICHAEL GLYCAS.
CONSTANTIUS HARMENOPULUS.
JOANNES CINNAMUS.
JOANNES ZONARAS.
THEODORUS BALSAMON.
MICHAEL ANCHIALUS.
HUGO ETHERIANUS.
THEORIANUS.

PETER CHRYSOLANUS,

about the beginning of this century, was chosen Archbishop of Milan, and was sent as Legate by Pope Paschal II. to Constantinople, in the reign of Alexius Comnenus. A Discourse in which he refuted the Greek errors respecting the Procession of the Holy Ghost, is to be found in Baronius and Leo Allatus.

EUSTRATIUS

was Archbishop of Nice, and wrote an Answer to Chrysolanus, which is still extant in manuscript. He is the author also of certain Commentaries on the Analytics and Ethics of Aristotle.

EUTHYMIUS ZYGABENUS,

a Greek Monk of the Order of St. Basil, wrote among other Works a Treatise against Heretics, under the title of Panoplia Dogmatica, and a copious Commentary on the Psalms. He lived early in the century.

PHILIP THE SOLITARY,

FLOR. CIRCITER A. D. 1105,

also a Monk, as his appellation denotes, is the author of a Moral Treatise, written by way of dialogue between the soul and body, under the title of Dioptron, or the Rule of Christian Life.

MICHAEL GLYCAS,

FLOR. CIRCITER A. D. 1150,

who is generally considered as belonging to this Century, was by birth a Sicilian, and composed a Work of Annals, in five books, treating of the History of the World since the time of the Creation to the reign of Alexius Comnenus.

CONSTANTIUS HARMENOPULUS,

FLOR. ABOUT A. D. 1150,

was by profession a lawyer; and the author of a Dictionary of Civil Law, and also of a Collection of Canons, both of which are esteemed. Some Theological Treatises of no great importance may give him a place here; though we are not aware that there is the same excuse for the insertion of the name of

JOANNES CINNAMUS,

DIED CIRCITER A. D. 1190, surnamed the Grammarian, who was Secretary to the Emperor Manuel Comnenus, and composed a History of that Emperor, as well as of his predecessor John Comnenus. Nicephorus Bryennius has written the Byzantine History from the year 1057 to 1081; and having mentioned these, we cannot omit the name of the celebrated Anna Comnena, wife of this last, and daughter of the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, to whom we are indebted for the History of the reign of the Prince. To this Century also belongs Eustathius Bishop of Thessalonica, the author of the well-known Commentary on Homer.

JOANNES ZONARAS,

FLOR. CIRCITER A. D. 1120,

was originally Secretary to the Emperor Alexius Comnenus; but he subsequently became a Monk, and, beside his compilation of Annals, wrote Commentaries on the Canons of the Apostles, and of the Councils.

A Work of a similar kind is still extant from the pen of

THEODORE BALSAMON,

DIED IN A. D. 1214, who was titular Patriarch of Antioch during the occupation of that City by the Latins, and who undertook it at the order of the Emperor Manuel, and of his Patrons,

MICHAEL ANCHIALUS,

at that time Patriarch of Constantinople, and himself the author of certain Tracts relating to the Ecclesiastical transactions of his time.

HUGO ETHERIANUS

was a Latin by birth, being born in Tuscany; but he spent his life at Constantinople, where he was particu-

Good To know the XIII
Century

History. larly in favour with the Emperor Manuel Comnenus. He seems, notwithstanding, to have retained his Latin opinions on Theological inquiries, for his principal Work is a Treatise vindicating the doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son as well as from the Father. He wrote also a Work on the state of the Soul after death.

THEORIANUS

is known as an author only by the interesting account he has left to us of the mission into Armenia, on which he was sent, in the year 1170, by the Emperor Manuel, with a view of bringing about a reunion of the Armenian with the Greek Church. His narrative contains a very clear and satisfactory statement of his various conferences with the Armenian Patriarch; in the course of which both parties seem to have argued the differences existing between the two Churches with exemplary temper and liberality. The dispute, it is known, chiefly turned upon the Monophysite doctrine, which was generally held by the Armenians; though, if we may trust the statement of Theorianus, the Patriarch, upon this occasion, was induced to acknowledge the decision of the Council of Chalcedon on that point; and to promise to use his endeavours to get it admitted as the standard of Faith by the rest of his Church. The narrative itself is to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

general observations on the state of the Greek Church. The scanty catalogue which we have here given of the Greek Writers of the XIIIth Century, sufficiently indicates how much the Eastern Church had already fallen off from that ardour of disputation and copiousness of production which had in former Ages distinguished her members. This was no doubt in a great degree to be ascribed to the blighting and darkening influence of Mohammedan domination. The Provinces which were formerly most fruitful in Theological talent, Egypt, Africa, and Syria, had now been long subjected to that worse than barbarous oppression, and Cities, the Seats of which have been rendered illustrious by the genius and learning and piety of Cyprian, Chrysostom, Athanasius, and Augustin, were doomed to languish in dread and silence under the sway of a fanatical and ferocious soldiery. The Imperial Metropolis, indeed, the Theological Schools of Constantinople had never equalled those either of Carthage, Alexandria, or Antioch, in the number or learning of the Doctors bred under their auspices. Under the Comneni, however, some encouragement was given to Learning, and still more to Controversy; the passion for which still remained undiminished in the Byzantine People, during the sensible decay of every other intellectual pursuit. The Emperor Manuel Comnenus himself took a warm interest in casuistical disputes and subtilities; and reposed with so much confidence upon the conclusions at which he arrived in these refined researches, that in one case,* he denounced capital punishment against all who should presume to teach any other but his own explication of the difficulty, to which he had condescended to apply his autocratic criticisms. His successor Andronicus, with similar violence, but somewhat more of impartiality, not merely abrogated this arbitrary decree, but issued another, prohibiting, under penalties of almost equal severity, all further agitation of the question.

The schism which continued to separate the Greek and Latin Churches involved a controversy of more importance in its practical object, though turning upon doctrinal differences in themselves not less subtle and unimportant. Several attempts were made in the course of this Century to bring about the reconciliation of the two Churches; a consummation which the Greek Emperors themselves were particularly anxious to accomplish, with a view of drawing closer the ties of political alliance with the Western Nations, of whose support they felt they were likely soon to experience the most instant need. But the lofty pretensions of the Roman Pontiffs, which at this time were culminating to their highest point of exaggeration, precluded all chance of an accommodation, so evidently desirable to both parties; nor, it must be confessed, did the Greek Doctors themselves evince any material disposition to concession with respect to those doctrinal points upon which their division from their Western brethren had originally turned; and the result of these attempts at reconciliation was by their failure, only still further to aggravate the original asperities of the quarrel.

Latin Ecclesiastical Writers of the XIIIth Century.

Attempts to reunite the Latin and Greek Churches.

LATIN ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE XIIIth CENTURY.

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAL.....	DIED A. D. 1153
PETER ABELARD.....	1142
GILBERT DE LA PORREE.....	1154
IVO, BISHOP OF CHARTRES.....	1115
GEOFFREY OF ANDERS.....	1132
JOHN OF SALISBURY.....	1181
PETER OF CELLES.....	1187
PETER OF CLUNY.....	1156
PETER OF BLOIS.....	1200
PETER COMESTOR.....	1198
HONORIUS OF AUTUN.....
RUPERT OF DUYT.....	1135
HUGH OF ST. VICTOR.....	1134
RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR.....	1173
PETER LOMBARD.....	1164
ROBERT PULLEN.....	1150

The Writers of the Western Church during the XIIIth Century were much more numerous than those of the Eastern, and among them are to be reckoned many of distinguished learning and ability. It is to these last, for the most part, that we shall henceforth confine our notices, whether biographical or bibliographical: in truth, from this period the number both of books and of authors becomes so considerable, that any other method would hardly be consistent with the plan and limits of our Work.

Upon this principle of selection, the first place is undoubtedly due to the celebrated

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAL,

a man who, in every point of view, must be considered as one of the first of his Age, and who, indeed, may be said to have exercised a greater personal influence over his contemporaries than has ever belonged to a private Churchman either before or since. This remarkable

* That of the sense in which we are to understand our Lord's saying, "My Father is greater than I."

History.

man was born in 1091, of a noble family, at Fontaine in Burgundy. At the age of twenty-two, he with his five brothers left his father's house to take the Monastic habit in the Convent of Clieaux, which had only a short while before been founded by Robert of Molesme. The Convent was then under the government of Stephen Harding, an Englishman, who may more truly be considered as its founder, by the system of discipline which he introduced, and which continued permanently to form the rule of the Cistercian Order. Two years after, upon the foundation of the Monastery of Clairval, Bernard was appointed the first Abbot : and the reputation which he had thus early acquired for Learning and Piety was so great, that within a short time his Convent was filled with votaries from all parts; and during his lifetime he had the satisfaction of seeing a Pope, six Cardinals, and more than thirty Bishops, chosen from among the number of his disciples. His fame was now spread throughout Europe, and scarcely any affair of importance was transacted in which he was not consulted. He was specially summoned to assist at the Councils of Troyes and of Châlons, in the years 1128 and 1129; and it was by his personal influence and persuasion, primarily and chiefly, that Innocent II. was acknowledged as Pope, in preference to his competitor Victor, whom he finally induced to make a voluntary abdication. His talents and influence were afterwards employed, and almost always successfully, in the settlement of most of the differences which took place in his time, either among the Princes of Europe themselves, or between them and the Pope. It was at his instance, and by his preaching, that the second Crusade was undertaken; the result of which, however, was far from answering the expectations which had been entertained of it. Nor was he less indefatigable or less dexterous in the defence of the doctrines of the Church. It was to him she looked, almost upon every occasion, for the refutation of the various errors or heresies which from time to time made their appearance; as was particularly evinced in the controversies which he maintained with the celebrated Peter Abelard, and with Gilbert, Bishop of Poitiers. Bernard died at Clairval on the 20th of August, 1153, leaving not less than one hundred and sixty Monasteries, which owed their foundation and establishment to him. His Works are comprised in two volumes folio, and consist of a great number of Letters addressed to the leading persons of his time on Ecclesiastical and public affairs, of Sermons, and of some devotional and controversial Tracts.* All of them are distinguished by marks of a solid judgment, warm feelings, and a profound knowledge of Scripture; and, considering the barbarism of the Age, are written in a style deficient neither in purity nor clearness. He is called the last of the Fathers; and, in fact, may be considered as the latest of the Writers who followed their method of treating or discussing subjects in Divinity, in contradistinction to the scholastic, or dialectic method, which was now become fashionable, and of which one of the earliest and most distinguished leaders was the famous

Divine was born in 1079, in a village near Nantes, and early distinguished himself in the Schools, as well by the novelty and boldness of his opinions, as by the subtlety and force of the Logic with which he defended them. He had already acquired a high reputation, and his Theological lectures at Paris were crowded with students from all parts, when his too famous adventure with a female pupil, Heloise, the niece of one of the Canons of Paris, involved him in embarrassments and difficulties which may be said to have embittered the rest of his existence. After the mutilation which the vengeance of his wife's relations had inflicted upon him, he betook himself to a Monastic life at St. Denys, at the same time persuading Heloise to take the veil. He did not stay long at St. Denys; a community to which he gave offence, as well by his censure of their irregularities, as by some doubts he ventured to throw out respecting the identity of their Patron with the Areopagite of the same name; but retired to Provins, where he opened a school which speedily became famous. The opinions, however, which he ventured to advance respecting the Trinity, in a Work which he published on that subject, involved him in new difficulties. A Council was held at Soissons which compelled him to recant his errors, and to burn with his own hands the book which contained them. He was now sent back to St. Denys, but the disgusts he received there again drove him to seek refuge in the Diocese of Troyes, where, by the assistance of some friends, he built a small oratory, called the Paraclete, which the affluence of scholars who flocked to him, and who erected cells around his dwelling, soon swelled to a considerable Convent. After a short time he transferred the care of this new foundation to Heloise, and accepted for himself the Abbey of St. Gildas in Brittany. Here again his repose was disturbed by doubts raised as to the soundness of the doctrines which he continued to teach. It was at this time that St. Bernard found it necessary to send him an admonition on the subject, which proving ineffectual, he formally complained of him to Pope Innocent II., accusing him as well of a leaning to Pelagianism in his doctrine of Grace, as of a tincture both of Arian and Nestorian heresy, in what he taught of the Trinity. A Council was held on the subject at Sens, in 1140, when Bernard produced the obnoxious passages from the writings of Abelard, and called upon him to retract. Abelard did not attempt to explain or defend them, but contented himself with appealing to Rome. The Council condemned the propositions in question; a sentence which was afterwards confirmed by the Pope; upon which they were disowned by Abelard, who did not long survive the transaction. After a short retreat at Cluny, he died in 1142, in a Monastery, to which he had been consigned, near Châlons, being then in the sixty-third year of his age. His body was sent to be interred at the Paraclete, where Heloise survived him above twenty years, and was afterward buried in the same grave.*

Let it be remembered that the Middle Ages were a time of great learning and piety.

PETER ABELARD,

whom we have already mentioned as having been engaged in controversy with St. Bernard. This celebrated

* A very minute and ample account of the Works of Bernard, particularly of his Letters, is to be found in Dupin, Eccles. Hist. vol. x.

* See Dupin, Eccles. Hist. vol. x. p. 111. for a very satisfactory abstract of the Works and doctrine of Abelard. The summary given in the following sentence of the kind of objections to which he had laid himself open, is too characteristic to be omitted. "St. Bernard, in general, accuses Abelard of treating of the Trinity like Arius, of Grace like Pelagius, and of the Incarnation like Nestorius; of having boasted that he was ignorant of nothing, and of never being willing to say aviso, on any subject; of attempting to expound inexplicable things, and to comprehend incomprehensible

History.

St. Bernard, who had taken so leading a part in the condemnation of the errors of Abelard, was equally active in procuring that of a native of Poitiers, who, after having taught Philosophy and Theology in that City, was chosen Bishop of the same Diocese in 1141. He is admitted to have been one of the most able and learned men of his time; but his attempt to explain some of the mysteries of Christianity rather according to the Philosophy of Aristotle, than to the language of Scripture and of the Fathers, led him into considerable errors; or at least into modes of expression which were calculated to shock the received opinions on the subjects of which he treated. He was accused more particularly of asserting in his Commentaries on the Works of Boethius, these four propositions respecting the Trinity: 1. that the Divine Essence was not God; 2. that the properties of the Divine Persons were not the Persons themselves; 3. that the Divine Persons were not an attribute in any proposition; 4. that the Divine Nature was not incarnate. The three former of these propositions, whether accurate or not, would seem to involve matter rather of Metaphysical, or indeed Grammatical, than of strictly Theological consideration; and perhaps the same remark is equally applicable to the fourth; though this would appear to imply a coincidence with what is called the Nestorian Heresy. In a Council held at Paris in 1147, under the presidency of the Pope himself, the alleged errors were formally condemned, and Gilbert compelled to recant. Nothing, however, was attempted against his person, and he returned to his Diocese, where he died about seven years after. His writings, we believe, have never been printed.

GILBERT DE LA PORRE'E,

We must not here omit to mention the celebrated

IVES, YVES, OR IVO, BISHOP OF CHARTRES,

though by far the greater part of his life belongs rather to the preceding Century. He was born at Beauvais, of a noble family, and studied Divinity under Lanfranc, in the Abbey of Bec. In 1078, he was appointed Abbot of St. Quentin, a Monastery to which he gave all his property; and the members of which, under his government, became remarkable for their regularity and learning. Fourteen years after, (1092,) upon the deposition of Geoffry, Bishop of Chartres, for Simony, Ives was chosen by the Clergy and people of the Diocese to fill his place. His Metropolitan, Richer of Sens, however, refused to consecrate the new Bishop, on the ground that his predecessor had not been canonically deposed; and it was only after a long struggle that the direct interposition of the Pope enabled Ives to take possession of his See. In the exercise of his Episcopal functions, he displayed the same zeal, activity, and courage, as well for the maintenance of Ecclesiastical discipline, as in vindication of the rights of the Church, which had uniformly distinguished him; and this spirit is eminently ob-servable in his Letters, a large collection of which have come down to us. He has also left two collections of Ecclesiastical Canons, under the several titles of the Pannormia, and the Decretum; the former of which, however, has by some been attributed to another hand. See Dupin, Éccl. Hist. vol. x. p. 22.

Latin Ecclesiastical Writers of the XIIth Century.

GEOFFRY OF ANGERS, CARDINAL, AND ABBOT OF VENDOME, was much employed, both by the Popes and by the King of France, Lewis the Fat, in various Ecclesiastical and Political transactions, and died about 1132. His Works consist chiefly of Letters, and short Treatises on the various subjects of controversy that occurred in his time. They are interesting chiefly as illustrative in many respects both of the History and Theology of the Age in which he lived.

A Writer of much greater intrinsic interest is the celebrated the friend and biographer of Thomas à Becket, and himself one of the most acute and penetrating geniuses of his time. He was elected Bishop of Chartres in 1177; assisted at the Council of Lateran in 1179; and died in 1181. His principal Work, however, entitled the Policraticon, or De Nugis Curialium, is rather Moral and Satirical than Theological; but contains many passages of deep thought and original observation. Traces of the same vigour of mind are to be found in his Letters addressed to various distinguished contemporaries, which are still extant to the number of three hundred. He was succeeded in the Bishopric of Chartres by his pupil, himself a Writer of some distinction in his Age, but whose Works, consisting for the most part of Letters, Sermons, and Devotional Tracts, are now chiefly remarkable as being among the first in which the word Transubstantiation is employed. He governed the Church of Chartres five years, and died in 1187.

JOHN OF SALISBURY,

PETER OF CELLES,

PETER OF BLOIS,

so named from the place of his birth, who, after having been in the service of William II., King of Sicily, passed, at the invitation of King Henry II., into England, where he was appointed Archdeacon, first of Bath, and afterwards of London. He died in the year 1200. Of his writings, as of those of most of his literary contemporaries, his own Letters, addressed principally to public persons, and on public matters, form the largest and most interesting portion.

Few Authors of this Age acquired more celebrity than

PETER, SURNAMED COMESTOR, OR THE EATER, who was born at Troyes, and became Canon and Dean of that Chapter, and afterwards Chancellor of Paris. He died in 1198. His principal Work is an abridgement of Sacred History, from the Book of Genesis to the Acts of the Apostles, under the title of Historia Scholastica; though this title, it has been supposed, was afterwards

See also Bayle, ed. v. Abelard,

History. attached to the Work from the circumstance of its being commonly read in schools.

PETER OF CLUNY,

surnamed the Venerable, a native of Auvergne, who took the Religious habit in the Monastery of Cluny, and so early distinguished himself among his brethren by his Learning and Piety, that he was elected Abbot and General of his Order in 1121, when he was not more than twenty-eight years of age. He took an active part in the refutation and suppression of the errors of the Petrobrussians and Henricians, and died at Cluny, in 1156. The Works of his which are still extant, consist chiefly of Letters and Homilies.

HONORIUS OF AUTUN,

surnamed the Solitary, flourished early in this Century. Little is known of his life; but he has left some Devotional and Theological Treatises, which, particularly that on Predestination and Free Will, are marked by considerable power of reasoning.

The same is observable of the Writings of a learned Flemish Benedictine, and Superior of the Abbey of that place, near Cologne, whose Commentaries on the Scripture afford the first instance of the application of the Scholastic method to the exposition of the Sacred Text. He is also the author of a Treatise De Officiis, in which he discourses of the ceremonies of the Divine services, and assigns the mystical reasons of their adoption. He died in 1135, aged forty-four.

RUPERT OF DUYTZ,

With him must be associated another celebrated Commentator on the Bible; we mean

HUGH OF ST. VICTOR,

also a native of Flauders, who took the Monastic habit in the Abbey of that name at Paris, where his Theological teachings acquired him such renown that he was called the new Augustin; the style as well as doctrine of which Father he sedulously imitated in his writings. Of these, the chief is a Treatise on the Sacraments. He became Prior of his community, and died at the early age of forty-four, in 1142. Another distinguished ornament of the same community was

RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR, of which Abbey he died Prior, in 1173. He was a Scotchman by birth, and may be considered as the leading Writer among the mystics of this Age; nor are his critical Works, of which many are yet extant, deficient either in learning or judgment.

To the above we must add the names of two celebrated Scholastic Divines, whose Works continued for a long while to constitute text-books in that department of study in the Universities of Europe. Of these, the first is a native of the North of Italy, as his surname indicates. After commencing his studies in the University of Bologna, he proceeded to finish them in that of Paris, where he so distinguished himself that he was shortly nominated to the Divinity chair; and, in 1159, was elected Bishop of the City. He died in 1164. His great Work is the celebrated Book of Sentences, in which he treats of all the principal questions which were then debated in the Schools, and illustrates them by a copious and methodical collection of apposite passages from the Fathers, chiefly from Hilary, Jeron, Ambrose, and Augustin. This Work soon became classical, and was made the subject of voluminous Commentaries by most of the great scholastic Divines in that and the following Centuries.

PETER LOMBARD,

The other Writer of this kind whom we propose to mention is, or Pullus, an Englishman by birth, who also studied at Paris, and became Professor of Divinity in that University. He was at the same time Archdeacon of Rochester, and his Diocesan summoning him to reside, upon pain of sequestration of his revenues, he appealed to the Pope, who not merely justified his absence, but called him to Rome, where he was made Cardinal, and Chancellor of the Roman Church. He died about 1150. He also was the author of a Book of Sentences, bearing the same title as that of Peter Lombard, but formed on a different plan; as he does not, like the latter, confine himself merely to the illustration of the various questions in hand, by passages from the Fathers, but attempts to resolve them either by reasoning, or by reference to Holy Scripture.

ROBERT PULLENS,

This enumeration of Ecclesiastical Writers might be greatly lengthened; but we believe we have now touched upon the chief of those who treated directly of Theology. Other distinguished Churchmen there were, whose Works on History or Jurisprudence are among the most valuable productions of that Age. But upon these, as not falling properly within the scope of our present purpose, we forbear to dwell.

Let it be remembered that the Writings of the Middle Centuries

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXXV.

THE ANNALS OF ENGLAND, FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO THE ACCESSION OF RICHARD I.

FROM A. D. 1066. TO A. D. 1169.

WILLIAM, Duke of Normandy,* was no sooner informed of the death of his Royal kinsman Edward, and of the seizure of the English Crown by Harold, than he immediately resolved to enforce his own pretended claims to the succession. His first measure was to despatch a Norman Monk as his envoy to England, to insist upon the intentions of the late King in his favour, to protest against the usurpation of Harold, and to demand of that Prince the fulfilment of the vows of fealty and service which he had so recently sworn. It was easy to anticipate the indignant reply of Harold. He denied both the obligation of oaths which had been extorted in his captivity, and the validity of forced promises to assist in conferring a Crown which had not been his to bestow. He vindicated the sufficiency of his own subsequent title to the Throne in the free election of his Countrymen; and declared his determination to maintain the common rights and independence of his new subjects and himself by the sword.†

That this, indeed, alone must be the arbiter of their pretensions, both rivals were already fully aware; and on both sides the vain interchange of verbal formalities was instantly followed by the most active preparations for war. These, on the part of William, were of a magnitude less suitable to the narrow resources of his Duchy, than to the importance of an enterprise, which was in every respect the mightiest effort of the Age. To levy a great army adequate to the conquest of the English Kingdom, he relied not so much merely on the services of his Norman subjects, as on the renown of his own personal prowess and talents, on the martial spirit of adventure which animated the Feudal Nobility of France, and on the temptation which, under his able guidance, the expedition itself would offer to their ambition and cupidity. That the additional incentive of a Religious sanction to the war might not be wanting, he further, every where proclaiming Harold his perjured vassal, was careful to seek the Papal countenance for his own pretensions; and from Pope Alexander II., to whom by an embassy he adroitly appeared to submit the justice of his quarrel, he succeeded in obtaining the present of a consecrated standard for the expedition. Thus, while, on the one hand, Harold was represented as a forsworn and traitorous usurper, who had violated the most solemn obligations of Religion and Honour; on the other, the claims of William acquired a twofold aspect of strength and legitimacy in the protection and approval of the Church.‡

The preparations of the Duke of Normandy were fatally assisted by the deadly enmity which Harold had excited in the bosom of his own brother. That Noble was Tostig, the deprived Earl of Northumbria, who, repairing to the Court of William from his exile in Flanders, offered, on conditions which are not stated, to cooperate in the invasion of England, by inducing some of the Scandinavian Princes to make a simultaneous descent upon the Northern coast. William eagerly accepted the proposal; and Tostig, though he failed in his persuasions upon the King of Denmark, gained a promise of powerful support from Harald Hardrada, King of Norway. Without waiting for the arrival, however, of that Sovereign, the exiled Earl, himself collecting some sixty vessels in the ports of Flanders, appeared in the English Channel, and commenced hostilities by plundering the Isle of Wight. The approach of his brother with a superior fleet, admonished him to direct his course Northward; and he next attempted a landing on the Eastern coast in Lindsey; but there, being vigorously encountered by the Earls of Mercia and Northumbria, he was defeated with so much loss, that he was abandoned by his followers, and compelled to fly for refuge to one of the ports of Scotland, where Malcolm Ceanmore, the reigning Prince, gave him protection until the arrival of his Norwegian confederates. The Summer was far advanced before Harald Hardrada had collected the promised armament; but the amount of its force of three hundred sail explained the delay in the * Guillelmus Pictaviensis, p. 106, 107. Malmesbury, p. 99. Dr. Lingard (History of England, vol. i. p. 442.) is willing to doubt whether this present of a consecrated banner might be more than "a return of politeness on the part of the Pontiff." But it is very unlikely that so solemn an offering should have been made in mere compliment; and there is much more consistency with the views of temporal aggrandizement over the thrones of Europe, which the Pope had already formed, in Home's supposition, (History of England, vol. i. p. 247.) that Alexander II. hoped, by promoting the Duke of Normandy's success, to bring the English Church under closer subjection to the Papacy than had yet been effected.

* Some account of the birth, youthful exploits, and reign of William in Normandy, has already been given in p. 526, 527 of this volume.

† Matt. Paris, p. 2. Eadmer, p. 5. Matt. Westminster, p. 434. Will. Malmesbury, p. 99.

History.
From
A. D.
1066. to
A. D.
1159.
Activity of Harold.

magnitude of the preparation; and the Norwegian Sovereign, leading his fleet and army in person, and depositing his Queen and daughters, who had come over with him, in the Orkney Islands for safety, at length joined the outlaw Tostig off the Northumbrian shore.*

Meanwhile Harold had neglected no measure to improve his questionable title, and to strengthen his insecure position on the English throne; and he was already prepared to defend the Crown which he had seized, with an energy and courage equal to his ambition. In the Southern parts of the Kingdom, where his family influence had long been established, and his personal popularity was unbounded, his authority had been at once joyfully recognised; and his first act, after his Coronation, was to undertake a journey into the North, in the course of which, by his bland and politic demeanour, he overcame some reluctance which the Northumbrians had shown to his accession, and apparently gained their affections. In the same visit, he further secured the adherence of the powerful family of Algar, (whose two sons, Edwin and Morcar, now held the great Earldoms of Mercia and Northumbria,) by marrying their sister Editha. Returning to London, and assembling the national forces of the Southern Provinces, after chasing Tostig with his fleet out of the Channel, he took up a position with his army on the coast between Hastings and Pevensey, and there eagerly expected the threatened descent of the Duke of Normandy.

He marches to repel the Norwegian
army.

It was in this situation that he received the news of the appearance of the King of Norway and his armament, in concert with Tostig, on the Northumbrian shore; and his first intimation of danger from that quarter was quickly followed by further accounts of the landing of the confederates in the Humber, of the defeat and flight of Earls Edwin and Morcar, after a vain effort to arrest the advance of the invaders to York, and of the surrender of that city to the Norwegian Prince. Roused, but still undismayed, by the report of a calamity which so unexpectedly distracted his attention and aggravated his peril, Harold, with instant decision, broke up from his camp at Pevensey, and hastened with his troops to the North by forced marches to meet and repel the invaders. Such was the rapidity of his movements, that he reached the vicinity of York four days only after the late battle, and found the King of Norway and his brother Tostig unconscious of his approach, and employed in securing the fruits of their victory. As soon as the confederates perceived his arrival, they abandoned their conquests, and slowly retired to concentrate their scattered forces, until they reached Stamford on the river Derwent, where the Norwegian King ranged his forces in battle array, and awaited the assault of the English.

Battle of Stamford.

The encounter which followed was deemed memorable even in Scandinavian song by its surpassing slaughter; and the distinction obtained by its fatal event in the Norse traditions is attested in the minuteness with which its particulars have been collected and related by the earliest among the national Annalists of that People. The Norwegian army was drawn out in the form of a hollow ellipse, with the Royal standard, under the tremendous designation of the "Scatter of Lands," in the centre. The ranks were dense; the shields of the warriors overlapped; and the deficiency in cavalry, which their debarkation from a long voyage had been too recent to supply, was, as much as possible, repaired by covering the whole exterior of the circle against the charge of the Saxon horse with a row of spears, firmly planted in the earth and pointed towards the assailants. The King Hardrada himself, distinguished by his lofty stature, his resplendent helmet, and his mantle of blue, was riding in front of the line, when his charger fell under him. Harold saw the accident, and inquired the rank of the warrior. Being informed that it was the Norwegian King, he observed, "His form is majestic: but his fall portends his approaching fate." Before the armies closed, Harold sent a messenger to Tostig, with a tender of the Earldom of Northumbria, if he would come over from the Norwegian camp. "The offer," said the exile, "is well; and if made last Winter, might have saved the lives of many brave men: but, should I now accept it, what will Harold give to the King of Norway?"—"Seven feet of earth for a grave, or, as he is above the common stature of men, it may be a little more!" Tostig, in reply to this taunt, as contemptuously, spurned the proposal to abandon his ally; and Harold immediately led his troops to the attack. But so firm and close was the array of the Norwegians, that the first furious onset of the Saxons was repulsed on all sides; their cavalry were unable to penetrate the line of implanted spears; and the assailants began to retire in confusion. At this critical moment, the Norwegians, in the confidence of victory, were tempted to quit their vantage ground and rush forward in pursuit: but their dense order was no sooner loosened, than the Saxon horse, returning to the charge, and bursting through the intervals, carried havoc into the centre of the broken host; and, at the same moment, Hardrada received his mortal wound from an arrow. Tostig, now taking the command, bravely supplied his place; and the retreat was suspended for a brief season by the arrival of a reinforcement of Norsemen from their fleet. But the resistance of the routed army though desperate was unavailing; and the death of Tostig, who was slain after indignantly rejecting the renewed offers of his brother, terminated the struggle.

The flower of the Norwegian Nobles had perished with their Monarch; and half a Century afterwards the piles of human bones which bleached on the plain still recorded the immensity of the slaughter. But some remains of the Norwegian host accepted the mercy of the conqueror; and the humanity and generosity of Harold were as conspicuous in success, as his gallantry and conduct had been in the field. The capture of the Norwegian fleet, which was an immediate consequence of the victory of Stamford, placed the widowed family and retinue of Hardrada in his power: but instead of adding the misery of captivity to their late misfortunes, he sent for Olave, the youthful son of the deceased Monarch; contented himself with requiring an oath in the name of the Norwegian nation to abstain from further hostilities against England; and placing the young Prince with all his family and surviving followers in some of their own ships, nobly dismissed them, unransomed and uninjured, to their native land. After thus gloriously consummating his triumph, Harold returned to York, as well to refresh his exhausted troops with some season of repose, as to receive the joyous congratulations of the loyal citizens; and here he was still feasting with his faithful Nobles, when the banquet was suddenly inter-

* Chron. Sax. p. 172. Ordericus Vitalis, p. 492. Guil. Gemmeticensis, p. 255. Nalmsbury, p. 94. Snoorty, (Hist. Regum Norveg.) vol. iii. p. 146—150.

Engl.
—
Fm
1. 1.
1066.
3
A. 2.
1159

History. rupted by the arrival of intelligence that the Duke of
From Normandy and his host, four days after the battle of A. D. Stamford, had accomplished their landing on the South-1066. ern coast.*

By its composition and force, the army with which to William of Normandy had effected his descent on the
A. D. English shores was probably the most formidable which 1189. Europe had seen collected since the settlement of the Landing of the Duke of Gothic Nations. Such was the eagerness with which Normandy with his Nobles of France and the adjacent Provinces of the host Low Countries and Germany with their feudal retainers its composi- flocked to his standard, that he found himself at the tion and force. head of no less than fifty thousand mailed cavalry, led by the flower of the European Knighthood, and attended by a body of ten thousand archers and other footmen.†

The necessary number of vessels of all sizes provided for the transport of this great army across the British Channel is variously estimated by different Chroniclers at from one to three thousand; and during several months every port on the Norman coast had resounded with notes of preparation. In August, some weeks before the Norwegian invasion of England, the naval equipments were completed, the shipping concentrated at the mouth of the River Dive, and the troops in readiness to embark: but adverse winds had fortunately prevented the armament from sailing, until the Saxon fleet, which Harold had stationed in the Channel to oppose the passage, was compelled to disperse for want of provisions; and until that Prince and his army had marched against the Norwegians, and left the Southern coast totally unguarded. With the first favourable change of wind, William impatiently put to sea: but the elements themselves now appeared to war against him; a violent storm arose; and many of his vessels were stranded on the French coast, with heavy losses of men and stores, before the armament succeeded in reaching St. Valori near Dieppe. Here the Duke, to allay the superstitious fears with which his followers began to be affected by so ominous a prelude to their enterprise, caused the aid of Heaven to be invoked by a procession of the relics of St. Valori and by the public prayers of the army. It was on the eve of the Feast of St. Michael, the tutelary Saint of Normandy, that these supplications were made; and the wind suddenly mo-derating and changing to a favourable breeze, the soldiery joyfully hailed the coincidence as an assurance of the Divine favour. The Duke at once took advantage of their recovered spirit. The fleet setting sail immediately stretched across the Channel; its course was continued throughout the night; the morning discovered the English shore; and on Michaelmas day the whole army disembarked without opposition near Pe-vensey in Sussex.‡

The first motions of William after his landing were marked by a prudent regard to the security of his future possession. William Harold.

* Chron. Sax. p. 172. Flor. Wig. p. 429. Ingulf. p. 69.
Hunt. p. 367, 368. Malmabury, p. 94. Snorre, vol. iii. p. 151—165.

† M. de Sismondi (Histoire de France, vol. iv. p. 353.) has reduced the army of William to twenty-five thousand men. But the statements of the original authorities, if we receive their evidence at all, are too explicit for rejection on this point. William of Poitou twice mentions expressly "milia milium quingenta," (Pict. p.
106) and "virorum sexaginta milia," (p. 112.) And Orderic still more plainly distinguishes the proportion of cavalry, "quingenta milia milium, cum equis peditum," (p. 500.)

‡ Guil. Pict. p. 109. Guil. Gem. p. 286. Orderic. Vit. p. 496.

§ Guil. Pict. p. 106—112. Orderic. Vit. p. 493—501. Matt.
West. p. 435. Guil. Gem. p. 286.

VOL. XI.

operations. Marching along the coast to Hastings, he threw up works both at that port and at Pevensey for the protection of his shipping; and the appearance of the English fleet in superior force soon proved the necessity of such defences. He caused the adjacent country to be scoured for provisions; and as if anticipating the rashness of his opponent, and unwilling to engage his own forces in a decisive encounter out of reach of the coast, he halted to observe the proceedings of Harold.
That Prince displayed the same impetuous activity which had been crowned with such complete success against the King of Norway; but he had now to contend with an adversary far more dangerous by his skill and resources. Hastening by long marches from York, the instant that he heard of the Norman descent, and directing the forces of the Southern parts of the Kingdom to assemble in London, he found himself, in a few days after his arrival in that Capital, at the head of an army sufficiently numerous to cope with the invaders.
By Saxon writers, naturally anxious to ascribe the subsequent calamities of their race to any cause rather than to the superior prowess of their conquerors, he is accused of having provoked the disgust and occasioned the desertion of his troops in the North, by his avarice in denying them the spoils of the Norwegians; and it is pretended that, thus weakened by the loss of his veteran bands, he presumptuously risked the safety of his Crown and the independence of his Country by rushing to the encounter with a raw and unexercised army, hastily levied and inadequate in numbers.* But the confidence with which Harold had been inspired by recent victory, may find its justification even in the duration and obstinacy of the last fatal struggle; and the enormous slaughter which the Saxons inflicted upon their conquerors seems in itself to refute the tale of numerical disparity.

Whatever were the errors of the Saxon Prince, it is admitted that in the crisis of his fate he displayed a spirit worthy of the occasion. To the superstitious anxiety of his brave brothers that, as he had unfortunately sworn allegiance to the Norman, he should evade the guilt of perjury by absenting himself from the field, he turned a deaf ear; to the haughty demand of William that he should either resign the Crown, submit his title to the arbitration of the Pope, or meet him in single combat, he calmly replied that the God of battles alone should judge between them. Consulting only the high dictates of his magnanimous courage, he advanced to the vicinity of the Norman camp and posted his army on a wooded eminence facing the invaders, about nine miles from Hastings. Here, William, who trusting to the superior equipment, skill, and discipline of his forces, desired nothing more than the opportunity of deciding the war in a general battle, immediately prepared to attack him. If we may believe an often quoted authority, the brief suspense of a single night was passed by the two armies in a widely different manner: by the English in feasting and noisy mirth, by the Normans in the solemn silence of devotional exercises.† With the earliest dawn William drew out his host: in advance were posted the archers and other lightly armed foot; for their support, and immediately in their rear, were formed the heavier mail-clad infantry; and in a third line, of which both wings extended far beyond the flanks

England.

From
A. D.
1066. to
A. D.
1189.

Return of the latter to the Southern coast.

His advance to encounter the Normans.

* Malmabury, p. 94—100. Matt. West. p. 434.

† Malmabury, p. 101.

History. of the foot, were arrayed the whole numerous force of the Norman, French, and Flemish chivalry, the nerve and trust of his enterprise. The consecrated Papal banner was borne aloft in the van; and on the signal of attack, the army raising the chant of Roland, the fabled Norman Paladin of Charlemagne, eagerly moved forward towards the Saxon position. The order in which Harold had resolved to await the assault, was prudently regulated by regard to the superiority of the invaders in cavalry. He had arrayed his whole army on foot in one compact mass on the brow of the hill: himself with his brothers Gurth and Leofwin setting the example by dismounting from their horses: the flanks and rear were covered by woods and intrenchments, and the front presented a bristling and impervious surface of spears and battle-axes. In the van, their long arrogant post of honour, stood the men of Kent; the citizens of London also enjoyed an ancient privilege in the guard of the Royal standard which occupied the centre;* and beside it were placed the King himself and his brothers.

Battle of Hastings, October 14th.

A. D.
1066.

As the hostile armies closed to the encounter, they set up their respective war-cries: the English, "the Holy Rood, the Rood of God;" the Normans, "the Lord is our help." The onset of the invaders was fierce and impetuous; its reception firm and undaunted. When the Norman archers had delivered their flight of arrows, they made way for the advance of the more heavily armed infantry: but the effort of these troops upon the Saxon front was repelled with immediate slaughter; and the contest only became dubious when the Norman Knighthood, led by the Duke himself to the support of the foot, rushed in one immense body upon the English line. The physical weight of this mass of iron-clad chivalry, the solid array of the Saxon foot, and the common desperation of both hosts, rendered their collision tremendous. But favoured by the advantage of their elevated position, their serried order, and their steady footing, the English sustained the shock in impenetrable strength. The furious charge of the Norman horse broke and recoiled before the points of their projecting spears; and their sharp battle-axes cut with dreadful execution through the strongest armour of the riders. Repulsed and dismayed, the assailants everywhere began to give way; and the commencement of a general panic and rout was quickened by the cry that their leader himself had fallen. But in this hour of need, William showed himself gifted with all the courage of a hero, and all the calmness of a great commander. Removing his helmet to display his countenance, he galloped along the broken lines, exclaiming aloud that he yet lived, and by the blessing of God he yet would conquer. His indignant menaces to the fugitives arrested their flight; his presence, his voice, and his exertions rallied the wavering spirit and restored the confidence of his whole host.

Vicissitudes of the conflict.

But all his efforts might still have been vain, if the English, in the ardour of success and the recklessness of their courage, had not, unmindful of recent experience, committed the same error which had proved so fatal to their Norwegian enemies. Instead of remaining firm on their own ground, numbers broke from their ranks to chase the Norman horse down the hill. In the same instant in which the Duke succeeded in rallying his followers, he wheeled them round upon their pursuers, now disordered and breathless, and cutting them off to a man, took a bloody vengeance for his repulse. Still the main body of the English stood immovable; and a second general onset of the Norman chivalry proved equally unavailing and disastrous with the first. But hopeless of breaking the hostile phalanx by any direct attack, William was now stimulated by despair to practise upon the rashness which had already betrayed a portion of the English to their destruction. He ordered the Count of Boulogne, with a thousand horse, to make a feint of charging a third time; but on reaching the English line to flee as if in confusion. The stratagem succeeded: again the English incautiously pursued; and again were they intercepted and mowed down by another division of cavalry before they could regain their position. Yet once more, such was the want of discipline and the overweening confidence of the English, a similar artifice was successfully tried, and a similar penalty paid for their temerity.

But notwithstanding their disasters, the centre of the English army, where Harold commanded and fought, was firm and unshaken. The two valiant brothers of that Prince had long since fallen by his side: but while the dauntless Monarch lived, no Saxon heart doubted of victory. The sun was already setting upon the esanguined field; no less than fifteen thousand of the Normans had swelled its slaughter; William himself had had three horses killed under him; and all the valour that his personal efforts and example could inspire, all the expedients which his skill could suggest, only held the event in suspense: until it was decided by the random shot of an arrow which pierced the eye and entered the brain of the Saxon Prince. His fall spread an immediate panic, which favoured a last charge of the Norman horse; twenty cavaliers who had sworn to capture the Royal standard, succeeded, notwithstanding the loss of half their numbers, in penetrating to the spot and seized their prize; and the English, as the shades of night closed upon the combat, broke and fled in all directions. They were pursued for some time with merciless carnage: yet even in their flight some bands held bravely together, attempted to rally, and while the victors were entangled in the obstacles of the country, achieved more than one expiring effort of vengeful despair. But William, unconscious of fatigue and unsatiated with slaughter, still urged his cavalry upon the track of their reluctant retreat; his ardour animated his followers to complete the hardly earned victory; and darkness alone saved the wretched remains of the vanquished army.*

Such was the issue of the great and decisive battle of Hastings: an event ever memorable in the History of our Island; and worthy, as a celebrated Writer has justly observed, through the heroic valour displayed by both armies and by both commanders, to decide the fate of a mighty Kingdom. So equally was it contested, that the death of Harold† seems alone to have turned the * Guill. Pict. p. 127—138. Orderic Vital. p. 501, 502. Malmsbury, p. 101, 102. Matt. West. p. 436—439. Hunt. p. 363. See also the evidence of the famous Tapestry of Bayeux, as collected by M. Lancelot, Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, vol. ii. p. 536—561, vol. xii. 369—468.

† The dead body of Harold was found after the battle and brought to the Norman camp. It is singular that, while Malmsbury, (p. 102.) and later Saxon Writers after him, attribute to William an act of generosity in addressing the corpse of the fallen

* On this spot the Conqueror afterwards erected a Monastery, in celebration of his victory, Battle Abbey; the original splendour of which is still attested by very extensive remains.

History.
From
A. D.
1066,
to
A. D.
1169.

scale of victory; and but for the fall of the Saxon Prince, it may be doubted whether, after so tremendous a conflict, the diminished forces of his rival would have sufficed for the successful prosecution of the work of conquest. By the Norman Chroniclers it is acknowledged that one-fourth part of the victorious army had perished in the field: the amount of the English loss is not stated. But, though in the battle and the pursuit, the slaughter was probably greater than that in the Norman ranks, and though it is said to have included all the Nobility of the South of England, the military force of the Northern Provinces was yet entire; the Kingdom itself remained unsubdued; and the ancient experience of the Danish wars had shown that the national independence might survive a hundred defeats. By Saxon Writers, therefore, the panic with which the loss of a single army now filled their race, is regarded as a special work of Providence to deliver them into the hands of their enemies.* The death of their Prince was an irretrievable misfortune; for no leader of sufficient ability or influence was left to succeed him. The two great Northern Earls, Edwin and Morcar, who had followed Harold from York too late to share his defeat, endeavoured, indeed, on their arrival in London, to uphold the national cause by placing the Crown on the head of its legitimate heir, the Etheling Edgar. But the same youthful incapacity which had made it easy for Harold to set aside the pretensions of that last descendant of the House of Cerdic, rendered the Etheling utterly incompetent to sustain the falling fortunes of his Country. William, however, was, it seems, at first, far from considering the contest as decided. In addition to his heavy losses in the battle, his army was still further weakened by the alarming prevalence of dysentery; and before he ventured to advance towards the Capital, he hastened to secure a place of safety for the reception of his sick and reinforcements from the Continent, by the capture of the Castle of Dover. That impregnable fortress was surrendered on his first appearance before it; and he then directed his march upon London. Though his cavalry easily dispersed a body of the armed citizens, he found the gates of the Capital closed against him; and hesitating to tempt the dubious issue of an assault upon the walls, he contented himself with burning the suburb of Southwark, and drew off his troops to the ravage of the adjacent Counties. The good policy of this measure was shortly proved. Disension, distrust, and fear were paralyzing the Saxon counsels; the Earls Morcar and Edwin set a fatal example of desertion by retiring from the Capital; and Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, then repairing to the Norman quarters, made a merit of being the first to tender his submission to the Conqueror. William was crossing the Thames at Wallingford when he was joined by the Primate; and on his arrival at Berkhamstead, he was met by the

Attempts at further resistance, followed by a submission

of the English.

Prince for interment to his mother without ransom, the authorities in the Norman interest assert that the Conqueror barbarously refused her offer of its weight in gold for that melancholy gratification, and ordered the body to be ignominiously burned on the sea-shore: whence, however, it was afterwards removed to the Church at Waltham which Harold had founded. Guil. Pict. p. 135. Orderic. p. 502. One apocryphal tale that the mangled body of Harold could only be recognized by his mistress; and another that, though wounded, his life was preserved and prolonged in seclusion to the reign of Henry I., may be suspected to be equally the inventions of a later Age, and, nay, although gravely adopted by the credulity of some modern Writers, more of Romance than History.

* Malsbury, p. 102. Hunt. p. 369.

Etheling Edgar himself, Edwin, Morcar, and others of the Saxon Nobility and Prelates, and citizens of London, with an offer of the English Crown.*

The Conqueror was satisfied to receive, by the apparent gift of the Nation, the Kingdom which he had won by the sword. He accepted the proffered allegiance of the English; appointed the approaching Festival of Christmas for his Coronation; and, while he omitted no precautions to secure his Government against treachery and revolt, seemed anxious, by the equity of his administration, to reconcile the natives to a foreign yoke. Although he proceeded to confiscate the estates of many of the adherents of Harold who had fallen in the late battle, and gratified his principal Norman followers with the spoil, he left to the English Nobles in general the undisturbed possession of their property. Many of them, including the Etheling Edgar, he continued or installed in high offices of state and trust; and to the citizens of London he granted several new and important immunities; at his Coronation he freely took the usual oaths of the Anglo-Saxon Kings to govern according to the national laws; and he endeavoured, by the vigilance and impartiality of his administration, to protect the rights and to win the affections of all classes of his new subjects.† In his own person he granted a ready access to every petitioner; and, if we may believe one contemporary Historian, he even made some efforts, though from his time of life ineffectually, to learn the English language in order that he might the better administer justice by understanding every man's complaint in his own tongue.‡

But however sincere were these good intentions, they were soon frustrated by the inevitable consequences of his position between a victorious army and a subjugated population. The arrogance and cupidity of his Norman followers could neither be repressed nor satisfied: the natural hatred with which his English subjects repaid the insolence and oppression of their conquerors, extended itself to his Government and person. Even during the ceremony of his Coronation in Westminster Abbey, the Norman troops stationed without pretended to mistake the acclamations of the English in the Church for treasonable clamours, and immediately began to plunder and fire the adjacent houses: the natives on their part suspected a concerted design of pillage and massacre.§ The King with difficulty appeased the tumult; and this ominous occurrence was only the forerunner of other disorders which increased the mutual animosity and mistrust of the two races. William instituted many regulations to restrain the excesses of his foreign army; but even his presence and vigour were not always sufficient to curb the want of discipline in followers, whose past claims he found it difficult to repay, and whose future services, either by disgusting or dismissing them, he could not safely afford to lose. But when, early in the Spring after his accession, he paid a visit to his continental Duchy, the oppression of the Norman officers and garrisons which he had stationed in the principal towns, increased in his absence beyond all bounds, and maddened the people into a general insurrection. They were destitute of any leaders of ability or hereditary influence, for the King had been careful

England.
From
A. D.
1066,
to
A. D.
1169.
Coronation of William I.

Equity of his early reign.

Insolence of his followers.

Unsuccessful insurrection of the English.
A. D.
1067.

* Guil. Pict. p. 138—141. Orderic. p. 503. Flor. Wigorn. p. 634. Hoveden, p. 450.

† Guil. Pict. p. 141—150, passim. Orderic. p. 506. Flor. Wigorn. p. 634.

‡ Orderic. p. 520.

§ Guil. Pict. p. 145. Orderic. p. 503. Flor. Wig. ubi supra 4 q 2

History.

From
A. D.
1066,
to
A. D.
1189.

Change in the policy of William.

Grievous tyranny of his subsequent Government.

A. D.
1068.

Repeated revolts of the English.

A. D.
1069.

Completely suppressed.

to lead the principal English Nobility in his train to Normandy; and his return was immediately followed by the suppression of the revolt.* But from this period William completely changed the character of his administration, which had hitherto been temperate and forbearing, into an aspect of unmitigated despotism. Exasperated at the rebellion of a people whose attachment he had vainly striven to gain by kindness, and stimulated by the interested representations of his Norman Chieftains, he indulged the dictates of a temper naturally harsh and suspicious, and sternly resolved henceforth to bend or break the spirit of the subjugated Nation under a yoke of iron.

The first measure by which he evinced his altered policy was the imposition of an onerous tax upon the English. His next was to deny to Earl Edwin the hand of his daughter, with which he had promised to reward his submission. That powerful Noble and his brother Morcar immediately resented the injury by exciting a revolt in their Northern possessions; but the King, anticipating their design, marched against them with so much celerity, while they were still unprepared for resistance, that they were compelled to yield to his mercy. He spared their lives and affected to leave them in possession of their honours; but seized the occasion of their rebellion to erect castles, which he garrisoned with his Norman followers, in all the principal towns of Mercia and Northumbria. He no longer cared to restrain the excesses of his foreign retainers; and from this period the English, finding themselves delivered over to the insolence and oppression of their tyrants, were provoked to continual revolts, which, being undertaken without concert and quelled in succession, served only to rivet their chains and to complete their misery. The whole Body of the Saxon Nobility was goaded by injuries to participate in these popular revolts, and then by disgrace and confiscations systematically devoted to ruin. Many of them, and in the number the Etheling Edgar, retiring to Scotland, found refuge at the Court of Malcolm, and thence, in the third year after the Conquest, attempted the most formidable enterprise with which the power of William had been menaced.

While supported by Malcolm, the fugitives entered Northumbria, and, being joined by insurgents in that Province, captured the Norman garrison of York, an immense armament of three hundred sail, despatched by Sweno King of Denmark, who had been invited by others of the English Nobles to accept the Crown, appeared off the Eastern coast; and at the same time the three sons of Harold, who, on the fall of their father, had fled to Ireland, landed on the shores of Devonshire with a Body of forces. Yet the vigilance and activity of William, and the superior qualities of his veteran troops, rendered him more than a match for these numerous but ill united enemies. The sons of Harold were surprised in a predatory descent near Plymouth, their followers destroyed or dispersed, and themselves compelled to fly to their ships in such a state of destitution, that they finally withdrew in despair to Denmark. The very appearance of William with a well-appointed army in the North was sufficient to strike terror into the confederates. The Danes, who had already landed, retired to their ships; and their leader being either intimidated by the fame of William or bought off by his gold, after hovering a few months on the coast and committing some devastation, reconducted his armament home. Relieved from this danger, William, although the spirit of revolt had spread throughout all parts of England, found little difficulty in overpowering the insurgents. By himself in person, or by his officers, they were everywhere defeated; and the recapture of York completed his triumph.*

This success was followed by an act of cold-blooded vengeance, which should cover his memory with eternal infamy. As the Northern Provinces had been the repeated scene of most obstinate resistance to his authority, he resolved to punish the insurgents, to strike terror generally through that part of England, and to protect his garrison at York from further incursions, by utterly destroying the whole country from the Ouse to the Tyne with fire and sword. Throughout an extent of sixty miles, the houses and provisions were burned; the inhabitants slaughtered, or, if they escaped pursuit, left to die by hunger and cold; and so horribly complete was the work of desolation, that while no fewer than one hundred thousand persons are declared to have perished at the time, the whole fertile district from York to Durham remained for years a scathed and barren solitude.† After this barbarous and fearful burst of vengeance, William proceeded with more excusable severity to chastise the Scottish King, both for the aid which he had given to the insurgents, and for the predatory incursion into the English Provinces by which he had affected to support their cause. At the head of a powerful army which bore down all opposition, the Conqueror, entering Scotland, ravaged the whole country as far as the Tay; and desisted not until Malcolm, coming in person to his camp, swore allegiance to him, solemnly did homage for his Kingdom, and declared himself a vassal of the English Crown.‡

By the suppression of the late general revolt, the whole English race were now laid prostrate before the Conqueror. The Etheling Edgar with other Nobles fled to Scotland; the rest of the insurgents again submitted their necks to the yoke; and William, after a further brief interval of dissimulation, proceeded systematically to fulfil his design of removing every Englishman from political office or power. The two Earls, Edwin and Morcar, though they had taken no part in the recent insurrection, were doomed to destruction; and though, when the tyrant ordered their persons to be secured, they escaped from his hands for a time, the first was slain in his flight, and the second was eventually compelled to surrender, and imprisoned for life.§ At a later period, Earl Walthef, another powerful Saxon Noble, though he had received the King's pardon, and even with it the hand of his niece Judith, was betrayed by the adulterous perfidy of that Princess; and on a charge of no more than misprision of treason, in having concealed his knowledge of a conspiracy to which he had refused to become a party, he was condemned and executed.¶ Hereward, the last English Chieftain, who bravely endeavoured in the fens of Cambridgeshire to maintain the cause of national independence, was reduced to offer a * Orderic. p. 511—514. Malmabury, p. 103, 104. Herodotus, p. 451.

† Orderic. p. 515. Malmabury, p. 103. Simeon Dunelm. p. 199. Ingulf. p. 79. Chron. Sax. p. 174. Herodotus, who says, Simeon Dunelm. p. 203. Malmabury and Ingulf, who repeat.

Chron. Sax. p. 181.

§ Orderic. p. 526. Ingulf. p. 68—70.

¶ Orderic. p. 536. Malmabury, p. 103.

* Guill. Pict. p. 151—163. Orderic. p. 507—510.

History. tardy and indignant submission; and the Conqueror, touched with admiration for his valour, and confiding in his good faith, treated him with unusual generosity.* An opposite feeling of contempt which William entertained for the imbecile character of the Etheling Edgar, procured for that Prince a similar lenity. By the advice of Malcolm of Scotland, who had espoused his sister Margaret, the last male descendant of Cerdic ignominiously sued for pardon from the oppressor of his race, and accepted a courtly establishment from the bounty of the Norman Conqueror who had usurped his hereditary rights to the Crown.†

The purpose of William to transfer every place of dignity from natives to foreigners was extended even to Ecclesiastical offices; and in this part of his policy he was freely assisted by the Papal authority. At his request, the reigning Pontiff, Alexander II., sent Legates into England, who, taking advantage of the irregular means by which Archbishop Stigand had obtained the pallium from the Antipope Benedict, deposed that Prelate; and the King immediately promoted Lanfranc, a Milanese Monk, to the vacant Primacy. Upon less plausible pretexs many of the other English Prelates were next deprived of their Sees, which were given to Normans; nor were these violent ejections confined to the Episcopal Order; so that in a few years not only every Bishop, but every considerable Abbot of English birth had been replaced by some foreigner.‡ But though William had made the Papal authority thus subservient to his policy, he was not himself the more disposed to submit to its encroachments. While he allowed the Pope's Legates to minister to his own tyranny, he prohibited his Prelates from obedience to any Papal decrees until ratified by himself;§ and the energy of his character, as well as the respect which it inspired, was never more conspicuous than in the subjection in which he continued to hold the English Church, even after the accession of Gregory VII. to the Tiara, when the pretensions of the Papacy had been raised to their highest pitch by the bold and ambitious spirit of that celebrated Pontiff.

This exclusion of the native English from all dignities, Ecclesiastical as well as Civil and Military, completed the signal revolution which had only commenced with the victory of Hastings. The spectacle which it affords in the thorough subjugation of a great Kingdom and a brave and numerous People by a foreign and detested enemy, whose strength probably never exceeded its original array of sixty thousand men, is in itself so extraordinary, as to have attracted the wonder and engaged the frequent inquiry of Historians. But the catastrophe, notwithstanding the disproportion of numerical force, is explained by the relative position and qualities of the victors and the vanquished. While the Norman conquerors had the advantages of union and discipline, under a single leader of indefatigable activity and consummate talents, the Nation which they subdued were destitute of any of these means of organized defence. The English had never been an united People; and at no period in the Anglo-Saxon, or rather Anglo-Danish Annals, had the natives of the Northern, Eastern, and Southern Provinces of the Kingdom—a fact which has seldom been sufficiently considered—acquired a complete amalgamation of political and social feelings. Again, the frequent interruption in the legitimate succession of the Royal Saxon family, by the Danish conquest and the usurpation of Harold, had chilled all sentiments of hereditary attachment in the People to the line of their native Sovereigns; and the youth and imbecile character of the last male heir of the House of Cerdic, although that Prince was not deficient in personal courage, disqualified him for rekindling the popular loyalty and rousing the national spirit in a common cause. Thus it was that, after the fall of Harold, the English were left without a competent leader: for the few powerful Nobles who, under the weak sway of the Confessor, had divided with the great family of Godwin all authority in the State, were, by their mutual jealousies, each unable to secure the lead, and none willing to yield it to another. Their struggles for the national independence were therefore commenced without real union among themselves, and supported without hearty confidence by the People. To these general causes for the failure of every revolt are added, by a contemporary Historian,* the defenceless condition of the English towns,—for almost the only places of strength in the Kingdom were the castles erected and garrisoned by the Norman lords and their retainers,—and the consequent want of fortresses, as well as leaders, to sustain the desultory operations of the insurgents.†

Altogether, therefore, it may cease to excite our surprise that the English, notwithstanding the native valour of their race, were everywhere worsted in the struggle with their Norman oppressors; and that, after a few years of unavailing resistance, they yielded to their fate in sullen, hopeless despair. All their Nobility had either perished in the conflict, or been reduced to ruin by the loss of their dignities and the confiscation of their estates. Nearly the whole soil of the Kingdom, with the exclusive possession of all political power, had passed into the hands of foreigners; and the few native proprietors, who were allowed to retain their lands, held them only as Sub-vassals to the Norman Feudatories of William. From the tyranny of those Chieftains and their insolent retainers, the People were exposed to every species of rapine and indignity; and by the introduction of the Norman Tongue into all legal proceedings, their language itself seemed proscribed. Whatever was Saxon in lineage, speech, or manners, was in Norman estimation synonymous with degradation and barbarism; and the very name of an Englishman became, for above a Century, a term of contempt and opprobrium.‡ While the common mass of the Nation groaned under this bondage, some more generous spirits indignantly pre-

* Orderic. p. 511.

† The conquest of England was in fact only slowly completed by the successive suppression of these insurrections; and the struggle of the English for the recovery of national independence was, as a late Historian has insisted, protracted and honourable. (Mackintosh, History of England, vol. i. p. 106.) But that accomplished Writer, whose views of early English History are in general equally comprehensive and accurate, seems scarcely warranted in considering the chastisement of their revolts as rather "a series of wars," or regular campaigns of a foreign Prince against a people yet unsubdued. The allegiance voluntarily sworn to the Conqueror at his Coronation by the Body of the Saxon Nobility, including the great Northern Eorls, Edwin and Morcar, was as formal a recognition of his authority by every part of the Kingdom as any of his predecessors on the English throne had received.

‡ Ingulf. p. 61—71, &c. Orderic. p. 521. 523, &c. Eadmer, p. 110.

* Simeon Dunelm. p. 203. Ingulf. p. 71. Chron. Sax. p. 181.

† Malmesbury, p. 163.

‡ Heveden, p. 453. Malmesbury, (De Gest. Pontif.) p. 154.

§ Eadmer, p. 6.

England.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Submission and despair of the Nation.

Trans-ference of all landed property to foreigners.

History. ferred exile to slavery; and a Body of Nobles and their followers sailing to the Mediterranean, found their way to the Court of Constantinople, and entered the service of the Eastern Emperor. In the wars of Alexius with the Normans of Italy, these English exiles displayed their valour and revenge against the kindred race of their oppressors. United with some Danish adventurers under the common title of Varangians, their descendants, preserving the Saxon name and language for a hundred and fifty years, proved the bravest and most faithful guards of the Byzantine Throne until the fall of Constantinople before the French and Venetian Crusaders.* Other Saxons of rank sought a refuge in Scotland; and being protected and gifted with estates by its Sovereign, became the founders of many of the most distinguished families among the Southern or Lowland Nobility of that Kingdom.†

The measures by which William cemented the fabric of his despotism, display him in the light of a crafty and far-sighted statesman, as well as a vigorous conqueror. While he rewarded his followers by gradually parceling among them the lands of the Saxon Nobles, and investing his chief officers with hereditary governments in the shape of Earldoms, he in general effectually prevented any of them from becoming too powerful by distributing their estates over various parts of the Kingdom. The further subdivision of their lands among their own retainers, in exchange for military service, was a necessary consequence; and the complete introduction of the Feudal System into England was the natural result of the position in which the conquerors were placed. But while William was obviously led to establish that form of polity in his new dominions, to which his followers were already habituated by the practice of their own Country, he took care, as we have formerly observed,‡ by one signal innovation in the principles of Feudalism, to secure his own immediate authority over every class of landed proprietors: for he compelled not only his tenants in chief, but their Vassals also, to swear fealty to himself. He is believed to have divided the whole Kingdom into about sixty thousand Knights' fees: from each of which the service of a mounted soldier was due to the Sovereign, as well as to the Baron under whom the Sub-fief was held.§ By this means he could at all times call a numerous army into the field; nor did he trust only to such Feudal levies, for he besides kept large Bodies of mercenary troops in his pay.¶

These he was enabled to maintain by the extortions with which he swelled his revenues. The demesne lands of the Crown, increased by confiscations to nearly fifteen hundred manors, all which he retained for his own profit, and farmed out to the highest bidders, yielded him a great income.¶ The Feudal incidents which he rigorously levied from his great Vassals and their tenants, furnished also a continual source of revenue. Tallages, or aids in another form, with tolls and customs, were heavily exacted from the inhabitants of all cities, burghs, and sea-ports; and the whole rural English population was grievously taxed by the revival of the ancient imposition of the Danegelt, which we have seen that the Confessor had abolished. From the aggregate of these extortions, the King is declared by a contemporary authority,* to have obtained sumptuous for the times, as to appear almost incredible; and being also a great economist, he became the wealthiest Prince in Europe.

The rapacious anxiety of William to frustrate all attempts at evasion, as well by his Norman Vassals as the subjugated English, in the payment of these extortionate dues to the Crown, gave rise to one memorable work of statistical labour. This was the compilation of that curious and celebrated record, known under the name of Domesday Book.† By the Royal command, Commissioners were employed to make an exact survey of all the lands in the Kingdom: their divisions and value; the nature and obligation of the tenures under which they were held; the amount of assessment for the Danegelt to which they were liable; the names of their proprietors; and the number and condition of all the inhabitants, both free and servile, of the towns and country. The information thus obtained by the official labour of six years, was collected into two volumes, which, under the expressive title of the Book of Judgment, were deposited in the Royal Exchequer; and this great Work, though its object renders it less honourable to the genius of the Conqueror than some Writers have imagined, is the most precious monument illustrative of the ancient condition of the Kingdom, which has been preserved to our times.‡

To complete the picture of William's despotism, one act remains to be recorded, which its very wantonness rendered far more inexcusable than the severest or most rapacious measures dictated by his policy. The love of the chase was, next to ambition and avarice, his strongest passion; and to gratify this he was not contented with the possession of the numerous Royal forests already reserved by the Saxon Sovereigns for their amusement in different parts of the Kingdom, but resolved to create a new wilderness in the vicinity of Winchester, his usual residence. He therefore caused above thirty square miles of the richest and most populous country in Hampshire to be laid waste for the protection of game. The inhabitants were cruelly expelled without compensation, their cottages and even Churches and Monasteries were burned, and the whole tract was abandoned to herds of deer and other wild animals.§ The name of the New Forest which, at the distance of seven centuries, the same district still retains, marks the scene of this atrocious caprice of his tyranny; and the sanguinary laws by which he guarded his pleasures are no less execrable memorials of his inhumanity. By these, in an Age in which even the crime of murder might be commuted by a pecuniary fine, the man who killed a bear or a wild boar on the Royal demesnes was punished with the loss of his eyes. The blood of his subjects, indeed, was considered of less value in his mind than the lives of these animals: for "so much he loved the high deer," says the simple language of the Saxon Chronicle, "as if he had been their father."||

Revenues and wealth of the Conqueror.

* Du Cange, Not. ad Altered. p. 236—238. Idem sur Fillehardouin, p. 296—298.

† Hume, Hist. England, vol. i. p. 330.

‡ Vide p. 457 of this volume.

§ Ordéric, p. 523. Spelman, Glossarium, in v. TRUOVUM.

¶ Ingulf, p. 79. Chron. Sax. p. 185.

¶ Chron. Sax. p. 189.

* Ordéric, p. 523.

† See that head in the Miscellaneous Division.

‡ Ingulf, p. 79. Chron. Sax. p. 190. Munt. p. 370. Floresb. p. 460.

§ Malmesbury, p. 111. Hunt. p. 731.

|| Chron. Sax. p. 191. See also Yorke Laws in the Miscellaneous Division.

England.
Frederick
A. D.
1066
to
A. D.
1189.
English exiles at Constantinople, and in Scotland.

A. D.
1168.

Leaving waste of the New For-

Sanguinary Laws.

History.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189. maining sections Wilm's
gn.
bellion of Norman Bem.
A. D.
1075.

nd of his last son.
A. D.
1076.

A. D.
1082.

ar with e King of ance.

The importance of that great revolution which was effected by the Norman Conquest, has demanded a detailed narration of the measures of the Conqueror: the remaining transactions of his reign may be more briefly dismissed. So effectually had the spirit of his English subjects been broken by the despotic force of his government that, after the submission of the brave Hereward, the tranquillity of the Kingdom was undisturbed even by a single tumult of the native population. But the arbitrary character of his administration was less patiently endured by his own followers; and in the tenth year of his reign, during his absence from the Kingdom, the discontents of some of his Norman Barons burst forth into open rebellion. The Royal authority, however, was too firmly established to be shaken even by the efforts of these powerful malecontents; and before William could return from Normandy, the insurgents had been defeated in the field by the Grand Justiciaries, William de Warrenne and Richard de Bienfait, to whom he had committed the government of the Realm.* A second invasion with which he was at the same time threatened by the King of Denmark, was averted through the mutiny and dispersion of the armament; and the immense force of mercenaries which he had levied to repel this foreign enemy, served only to astonish and overawe the subjects of both races by the display of his resources.† But his glory and fortune could not secure him from more afflicting hostility; and the decline of his life was disquieted by the domestic feuds of his own House. Robert Courthouse, the eldest of his three sons, disgusted by his partiality for the two younger, William and Henry, rose in arms against him in Normandy; and being supported in this unnatural rebellion by some of the Nobles of that Duchy, the Prince, though expelled from its territory, for several years braved his father's authority by desultory incursions from the neighbouring Provinces of France.‡ A reconciliation was at length effected;§ but William, probably, never forgave the countenance which he suspected that the King of France, Philip I., had afforded to his rebellious son. In this temper a silly jest which the French Monarch was reported to have uttered at his expense, sufficed to produce the first of a hundred wars between the two Crowns.¶ William's revenge was fatal to his own life. In entering the town of Mantes, which had been burned by his troops, his horse, treading on the embers of the fire, suddenly plunged, and threw him with such violence on the pommel of the saddle as to produce a rupture and inflammation of the intestines. Perceiving his dangerous condition, he caused himself to be conveyed in a litter back to Rouen: where, after lingering for some weeks, he expired in the sixty-third year of his age, and the twenty-first of his English reign.*

On his death-bed the Conqueror, formally bequeathing the Duchy of Normandy to his eldest son, Robert Courthouse, who was absent, had at the same time declared his anxious wish that the Crown of England might devolve on his second and favourite, William: a disposition which, though suggested by partial affection, seems to have been justified by a recognised principle of Feudality, that, while he was bound to leave the inheritance of his fathers to his first-born, he was at liberty to bestow his acquired dominions on whomsoever he pleased. Robert no sooner heard of his death than he hastily emerged from a voluntary seclusion; and on his arrival at Rouen took peaceable possession of his Duchy. But if he were already inclined to dispute his brother's pretensions to the English Crown, he found his purpose anticipated by the activity of that Prince. William, from his ruddy complexion surnamed Rufus, or the Red, had by his fond parent's desire flown from his bedside to England, with a recommendatory letter from the dying Monarch to the Primate Lanfranc; and that Prelate exerting all the power of the Church in his cause, while his own fair promises won over the principal Nobility to his interest, he was proclaimed King without opposition, and crowned at Westminster in less than three weeks after his father's decease. The first open resistance to his title was raised by his uncle, Eudes, Bishop of Bayeux, and Earl of Kent, the uterine brother, and who had been successively, the rapacious minister, the bold enemy, and the captive of the Conqueror. The support which the Primate, Lanfranc, whom he personally hated, had given to the new King, was sufficient to induce the turbulent Earl-Bishop, now only released from his prison by a permission extorted from the dying Conqueror, to place himself at the head of a formidable party in favour of Robert. The virtues and vices of that Prince, whose portrait has been already sketched among the heroes of the First Crusade,† equally unfitted him to cope successfully with his active and crafty brother. Though he encouraged the Anglo-Norman Barons to appear in arms against the new King, he indolently delayed to place himself at their head, until William had crushed the insurrection, and driven Eudes and his principal associates into banishment. In his danger, the King had sought the aid of his native English subjects, whose hatred of their Norman oppressors induced them eagerly to answer the appeal by flocking to his standard; and he was indebted for his success chiefly to their services. These he indeed repaid only with empty thanks and hollow promises of future favour: but with the necessity which had obliged him to court their assistance, arose the first dawn of their deliverance from bondage. From this epoch, throughout the con-

England.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.
Death of William.
A. D.
1087.
He assigns Normandy to his eldest son, Robert, and England to the second, William.

Accession of William II. (Rufus).

Abusive conspiracy against him.
A. D.
1088.

* Orderic. p. 536. Ingulf. p. 73.

† Chron. Sax. p. 185—187. Saxo Gram. p. 217.

‡ Courthouse, or Sherteheor, so named by William himself, from his short, stout figure. Genssaron, or Reynard, another sobriquet which the Conqueror bestowed upon his eldest born, is equally expressive of his person, and of the coarse raillery which formed the courtly humours of the XIIIth Century.

§ Orderic. p. 545. Malmesbury, p. 106. Hoveden, p. 456, 457.

¶ Two circumstances illustrative of manners deserve to be rescued from the oblivion to which the other particulars of this petty and unnatural contest between father and son may be consigned. It was a frolic, or insult put upon Robert by his brothers, who emptied a pitcher of water on his head from a balcony, which produced the war. He rushed up stairs with his drawn sword to avenge the affront; and after the King had with difficulty saved his younger sons from the fury of their offended brother, the latter withdrew from his Court and commenced hostilities. In the course of these troubles, Robert unwittingly encountered his father in person, and wounded and unharned him before he recognised his countenance under his helmet. Horror-stricken at the discovery, he raised the aged King from the ground, threw himself at his feet, and with a flood of tears sued for pardon. William sternly replied only with a malediction; but the grief and entreaties of his Queen afterwards reconciled him to their common son. Flor. Wig. p. 619.

¶ See p. 528 of this volume.

* Orderic. p. 654—662. Kadiner, p. 13. Hunt. p. 371. Chron. Sax. p. 188. But some interesting particulars of the last illness, death, and burial of the Conqueror of England, will be found already related after Orderic, under the head of the French Annals, in p. 529 of this volume.

† Vide p. 593 of this volume.

History. tests by which the descendants of the Conqueror maintained their rival pretensions and desolated the Kingdom, the weight of the conquered race was more and more sensibly felt in the balance; and it was only in the quarrels of their Norman tyrants that the Saxons slowly recovered their independence.*

Not contented with expelling his brother's partisans from the Island, William crossed into Normandy at the head of an army, principally composed of his English subjects, and gained many advantages over the improvident though gallant Robert. A period was put to these hostilities by the exertions of the Norman Nobles, whose interest it was, as generally holding lands under both Princes in the Kingdom and in the Duchy, to preserve their possessions by maintaining their double allegiance. They, therefore, persuaded the brothers to conclude a pacification, by the principal article of which it was provided that the survivor of the two should succeed to the dominions of the other. The first use which Robert and William made of their reconciliation was to turn their arms against their younger brother Henry, who had hitherto taken part with the Duke.

Having received for his portion by his father's will only five thousand pounds of silver without landed domains,† this Prince had endeavoured to form an establishment for himself by the purchase of some territories from Robert. The elder brothers, who both were jealous of his talents and rising importance, united to despoil him of these estates; and expelling him from the Duchy, they drove him in great poverty to wander for some time over Brittany in quest of an asylum.‡ The perfidy of William in refusing to perform one of the stipulated conditions of the late Peace by delivering up the fortresses which he had acquired in Normandy, produced a second war between him and Robert, in which he maintained his advantage less by arms than by the dexterous application of bribes. The contest was terminated by the use of the same weapons in a different shape. Europe was now occupied with preparations for the First Crusade; and Robert, inspired with the general passion to engage in that enterprise, but ever straitened for money by his prodigality, offered with characteristic recklessness the mortgage of his dominions to his brother, to obtain the means of equipping himself for the expedition. For the inadequate sum of ten thousand marks, he offered him the Government of Normandy for five years; and William eagerly closed with a proposal equally advantageous to his wily ambition and grateful to his fraudulent and over-reaching temper. Hoping, doubtless, to convert the temporary pledge into a permanent possession of the Duchy, he extorted the money from his English subjects; and immediately assumed the administration of Normandy, which he continued to hold to his death.§

The reign of William was distinguished by few other events of importance. A war with the King of Scotland, a revolt of the Welch, and a second rebellion of some of his Barons, had consecutively divided his attention with his plans for the acquisition of Normandy. In revenge for the predatory incursions with which, during his absence in that Duchy, the Scottish King had afflicted the Northern Counties, William led an army across the border, and obliged Malcolm to renew the homage which that Prince had formerly rendered to his Father. This submission did not prevent Malcolm from bursting into Northumberland two years afterwards with a numerous force; but while engaged in ravaging that County he was surprised and slain, together with his eldest son, by the troops of its Earl, Robert Mowbray; and the anarchy into which Scotland was plunged by this event suspended further hostilities.* The issue of William's contest with the Welch was less advantageous; for, in the attempt, after the example of Harold, to chastise their insurrections against his supremacy by the invasion of their Country, he was twice compelled to retreat both with loss and disgrace. But thenceforth resuming the wise policy of his father, he contented himself with strengthening the chain of fortresses which the Conqueror had constructed along the English frontier, or Marches, to restrain the incursions of wild enemies, who were themselves inaccessible to attacks.† Against his own Vassals, William was more successful. Their second rebellion was headed by Mowbray, the powerful Earl of Northumberland, and appears to have aimed at the dethronement of the King. But the activity of William disconcerted the conspiracy; Mowbray himself, after a vain resistance, was captured and imprisoned for the remainder of his life; and his accomplices were variously punished with death, banishment, or heavy fines on their estates.‡

The principal feature in the domestic administration of William's reign was unbounded rapacity; and his extortions reached every class of his subjects. But the wealth of the Church especially tempted his cupidity; and taking advantage of a schism and consequent weakness in the Papacy to refuse a recognition either of Urban II. or of the Antipope Clement, he kept many Sees and Abbeyes vacant, and appropriated their rich revenues to his own uses. The death of the virtuous and able Primate Lanfranc, whose services in obtaining for him the Crown he repaid with the basest ingratitude and oppression, removed every obstacle to his schemes of spoliation and left the English Church at his mercy. He refused for four years to fill up the vacant Archbishopric: until during a fit of remorse, produced by a dangerous illness, he was persuaded to name, as successor to Lanfranc, an Ecclesiastic of similar character, the learned and celebrated Anselm. But with returning health, he began to oppress the new Primate as he had done the last; and by persecuting him with demands for money, which an impoverished See was unequal to supply, finally drove him to seek refuge from these exactions in a voluntary exile.§ The sums of which the King thus rapaciously plundered his Lay and Ecclesiastical subjects, he as prodigally consumed in the grossest debaucheries, or lavished on the vilest of minions. In the dark picture, indeed, which the Monkish Historians have drawn of his infamous life, they might be suspected, under a natural prejudice against an oppressor of their Order, to have exaggerated his vices; if the portrait were not both in harmony with every recorded transaction of his public reign, and fully confirmed by the Mortgage of that Duchy by Robert to his brother.

A. D. 1096.

Wars of William against the Scotch and Welch.

A. D. 1091.

* Orderic. p. 662—669. Chron. Sax. p. 192—195. Melmsbury, p. 120. Matt. Paris. p. 10—12.

† Orderic. p. 660.

‡ Ibid. p. 696—698.

§ Orderic. p. 714—764. Chron. Sax. p. 198—204. Melmsbury, p. 121—123.

* Orderic. p. 700, 701. Chron. Sax. p. 197—199. Simeon Dunelm. p. 218, 219.

† Chron. Sax. p. 203—205. Simeon Dunelm. p. 219.

‡ Orderic. p. 702—704. Chron. Sax. p. 204. Simeon Dunelm. p. 221.

§ Orderic. p. 764—774. Chron. Sax. p. 198, 199. Melmsbury, p. 123. Eadmer, p. 15—43.

History.
From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

and violent death.
A. D.
1100.

Accession of Henry I.
(Beauchere)

report of the Saxon Chronicler, who, in the favour affected by William to the English race, may be supposed to have seen less reason for condemning his memory.* It cannot, therefore, be doubted, that the event which suddenly cut short his violent and flagitious career, was a happy deliverance for his People. After the deep carouse of his noonday meal at Winchester, he had gone into the New Forest to hunt, and had separated from his attendants in eager pursuit of the game, when at sunset he was discovered by some peasants lifeless and weltering in his blood on the earth, with the broken shaft of an arrow sticking in his breast.† In the same forest one of his brothers had formerly perished accidentally while engaged in the chase; and it could not fail to excite the remark of a superstitious Age that he was the second of his family, who, by the retributive vengeance of Heaven, met a violent death on the same scene which had been cruelly desolated for his pleasures.‡

Robert Duke of Normandy, both by the claims of primogeniture and the faith of treaties the rightful successor of William, was now on his return from the Crusade, in Southern Italy: where, in ignorance of the catastrophe which should have given him the Crown, he lingered to wed the fair and noble Sybilla, a maiden of the Norman race of Guiscard. His absence and indolence a second time produced his exclusion from the English Throne. Henry, his youngest brother, who seems to have reconciled himself with William, and was living at his Court, had gone with him to hunt in the New Forest on the day of his death; and no sooner heard that he was slain, than he galloped back to Winchester, possessed himself of all the money which the prodigality of the late King had left in the Royal treasury, and employed it with so much address and promptitude, as, only three days afterwards, to secure his Coronation at Westminster. In thus audaciously usurping his eldest brother's rights, he declared that he had received the Crown by the common consent of all the Barons of the Realm; and he immediately proceeded to conciliate both the Clergy and the Nation by promulgating a Charter of liberties, in which he bound himself to restore and respect the ancient immunities of the Church, to keep no Sees or Benefices vacant, to abstain from the arbitrary exactions with which his father and brother had burdened the Feudal Incidents, and to revive the Laws of King Edward with the Conqueror's amendments. While the first two of these provisions gratified the Ecclesiastical Order and the Crown Vassals of Norman blood, the third was more especially acceptable to the whole English race, whose attachment to the Laws of their fathers had been increased to enthusiasm by the oppression of their foreign tyrants. The next measure of Henry was still more pleasing to his Saxon subjects. He espoused Matilda, or Maud, daughter of Malcolm, King of Scotland, who, through her mother Margaret, sister of the Etheling Edgar, was descended from the Royal Saxon line, and destined by this marriage to mingle the blood of the House of Cerdic with that of the Norman Dynasty. The nuptials of Henry with this virtuous and beautiful Princess, long affectionately remembered by the English as "good Queen Molde," were solemnized by Archbishop Anselm, who had now returned from his exile; and she was at the same time crowned by the Primate with much formality.*

William had been dead only one month when Robert arrived in Normandy; but with his usual want of energy, instead of immediately asserting his right to the English throne, the Duke of Normandy allowed the usurper, by the completion of these popular measures, to establish himself firmly in his seat, before he could be roused to some tardy and insufficient exertions in support of his own cause. At length, by the suggestions of Flambard, Bishop of Durham, the infamous Minister of the late King's extortions, who had been imprisoned by Henry to gratify the People, but had effected his escape into Normandy, Robert was persuaded to claim the Crown of England. He therefore accepted the proffered allegiance and aid of many of the most powerful Barons in the Kingdom, who were either averse from the usurpation, or disaffected to the person of Henry. Landing at Portsmouth, he placed himself at the head of a party which embraced the majority of the Anglo-Norman Nobility; while the Clergy, headed by the Primate Anselm, and the native English in general, adhered to Henry. The undoubted martial talents of Robert, the renown which he had acquired in the Holy War, the justice of his pretensions, and the natural popularity of his generous temper, might seem to promise him an immense superiority in the impending contest over the unnatural brother, who had basely profited by his absence on the sacred service of Heaven to usurp his inheritance. But all these advantages were more than overbalanced by the artful ability of Henry, and the facile temper of Robert himself. The latter credulously acceded to the proposal of his wily brother for a personal conference; was reconciled to him at the first interview; and suffered himself to be beguiled into a Treaty by which, for a yearly pension of three thousand marks, he resigned all title to the Crown of England.†

Robert had no sooner returned to Normandy on the conclusion of this Peace, than Henry, in violation of one of its conditions, began grievously to oppress the Nobles of his party; and many of these powerful men were successively ruined, either by vexatious suits in the King's Court, or by bolder sentences of outlawry and confiscation. When Robert, with the generous desire of interposing his good offices in behalf of his friends, incautiously, and unattended by an armed force, made

England.
From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Robert of Normandy claims the Crown;

and lands in England;
A. D.
1101.

but concludes an accommodation with his brother.

* Orderic. p. 682, 763, &c. Hunt. p. 378. Malmesbury, p. 122. Matt. Paris, p. 46. Eadmer, p. 24. Chron. Sax. p. 208.

† According to the common tale, which originated in the report of the time, (Malmesbury, p. 126. Matt. Paris, p. 37, &c.) William was accidentally shot by Walter Tyrril, a French Knight, who, in dismay, immediately putting spurs to his horse, fled to the sea-coast and crossed to the Continent, where he joined the First Crusade as an expiation for this involuntary homicide. But Dr. Lingard (Hist. of England, vol. ii. p. 148.) has satisfactorily shown from a passage in Suger's Life of Louis VI. of France, that Tyrril on his return from Palestine, when he had no longer any motive of hope or fear in concealing the truth, made frequent and solemn declarations before Suger himself, that he never saw the King on the day of his death, or entered that part of the forest in which he fell. It may be suspected, from the hatred which his rapacious tyranny had provoked, that he died by treason; it was easy and politic to attribute his fall to an absent individual; and his successor, as Dr. Lingard has observed, was little solicitous to inquire into the real character of the event which raised him to the throne.

‡ Orderic. p. 781, 782. Chron. Sax. p. 201. Malmesbury, p. 126.

* Orderic. p. 780—783. Malmesbury, p. 156. Matt. Paris, p. 38—40. Eadmer, p. 56—58. Chron. Sax. p. 208. Leyes Sax. p. 233—283.

† Orderic. p. 784—788. Malmesbury, p. 156. Eadmer, p. 58. Chron. Sax. p. 209, 210.

History. a second journey into England, he found that instead of being able to intercede for others, he was himself in effect a captive. Nor did he recover his liberty until he had engaged to resign his pension, which, to cover its dishonourable exaction with the hollow semblance of gallantry, Henry compelled his Queen nominally to receive as a gift to herself. After this evil usage, Robert, full of indignation at the perfidy of his brother, retired to his Norman Duchy; and, in the protection which he now openly granted to the English outlaws, who had suffered from their assistance to his cause, Henry soon found or framed a sufficient pretence for hostility. Pronouncing the existing league of friendship between them annulled by the encouragement given to these traitors, and declaring that he came to relieve Robert's Norman subjects from the notorious and increasing disorders of his government, he landed in the Duchy with an army from England, and, after one indecisive campaign, succeeded in bringing the Duke's forces to action under the ramparts of Tenchebrai. Here, notwithstanding the brilliant valour and skilful conduct of Robert, which were never more conspicuous than in this, their last, fatal field, his troops, after a long and bloody contest, were completely routed, and himself was captured. By extorting from his prisoner an order for the surrender of all his fortresses, Henry now obtained complete possession of the Duchy; and the Norman Barons immediately swore allegiance to him as their Duke.* Robert was then conveyed to England, where, though detained in sure custody, he was for some time attended with the respect and indulgence due to his rank and misfortunes: until his brother, enraged or alarmed at an attempt which he made to escape from confinement, and now steered by successful ambition against every compunctious emotion of nature, ordered his eyes to be put out. The unhappy Robert survived the execution of this inhuman sentence nearly thirty years, which he passed in darkness and captivity; and at last died at the age of eighty, in his prison of Carliſſ Castle, about twelve months before his unnatural oppressor.†

Treachery of Henry. Henry, however, although triumphant over his reckless and ill-fated brother, was destined to reap little enjoyment from his success. On the surrender of the Norman fortresses after the capture of Robert, that Prince's infant son William, (afterwards surnamed Cliton, or Court-cuisse;) also fell into his hands; but under some momentary feeling of pity for the boy's tears, and distrustful perhaps of the darker impulses of his own heart, he placed his nephew beyond his power, by committing him to the guardianship of Helie de St. Saen, a Norman Lord, who had married the natural daughter of the deposed Duke. Of this act of mercy, the jealous tyrant too soon repented: but when he endeavoured again to seize the person of the child, Helie succeeded in withdrawing his charge from danger; and nobly preferring the abandonment of his own Fiefs to the betrayal of his trust, he fled with young William from Normandy. Wandering from

He invades Normandy;
A. D. 1105.

defeats and captures Robert; and obtains his Duchy.
A. D. 1106.

Cruel fate of Robert.

Subsequent transactions in Normandy.

one asylum to another, the generous guardian, despite of the familiarity of his barbarous times with the worst deeds of violence and wrong, won sympathy and protection for his innocent and helpless charge; and from mingled motives of compassion and policy, the rightful heir of Robert found some potent supporters in Louis V., King of France, and the Counts of Anjou and Flanders. The origin and particulars of the wars which soon arose in Normandy between Henry and that Prince have already been related in the French Annals;* but the issue of the contest was little favourable to the rights of William Cliton, who during its progress had grown to man's estate; and at the pacification which followed the Battle of Brenneville, Louis, by accepting the homage of Henry's son for the Duchy of Normandy, tacitly abandoned the rival cause of his nephew.†

The life of that young Prince presented some vicissitudes of fortune, remarkable even in an Age of romantic adventure. When deserted for a season by Louis, he still found protection at the Court of Flanders; and the following year produced an event which was calculated to rekindle the most ambitious of his hopes. This was the death of his cousin and namesake William, the only legitimate son of Henry; who, after receiving the investiture of Normandy, in triumphantly crossing to England from that Duchy with a splendid train of its youthful Nobility, perished by shipwreck, in the night near Harfleur, owing to the general riot and intoxication which prevailed on board his vessel, and amidst which she was suffered to run upon a rock. The young Prince, whose premature vices, as well as his avowed and insolent contempt of the English race, notwithstanding his maternal descent from the royal Saxon stock, had already excited gloomy forebodings of a tyrannical reign, now sacrificed his life in the performance of the only generous act which is recorded to his memory. He might have been saved, if the shrieks of his natural sister, Adela, Countess of Perche, had not induced him to return to the wreck, when the crowd which leaped into his boat immediately sank it. The ship itself soon after went down with all on board; and the only survivor of the whole party was a poor butcher of Rouen, who rescued himself by clinging to a spar. Fitz Stephen, the master of the bark, a stout swimmer, might have shared his preservation; but hailing the butcher from the water to inquire the fate of the Prince, and being told that he had perished, the luckless mariner exclaimed that he would not live him, and instantly disappearing never rose more. When Henry, who had preceded his son in the voyage, and had arrived at Southampton, received the news of this dreadful catastrophe, the shock struck him to the ground; and it is said that from that hour he was never seen to smile again.‡

The parental sorrow of the King was soon aggravated by fresh accessions of political disquietude. His only surviving legitimate child was his daughter Matilda, whom he had married to the Emperor Henry V.; and one of his bereavement of a male heir encouraged the pretensions of his nephew, William, to excite new commotions in Normandy. That young Prince was becoming daily more formidable, no less by the development of many

* Orderic. p. 788—833. Kadmer, p. 59—90. Malmſbury, p. 157—160. Chron. Sax. p. 211—214. Among the prisoners at the battle of Tenchebrai, was the Ebeling Edgar, who had long attached himself to the congenial fortunes and tenor of Robert, and had (perhaps) followed him to the First Crusade. This is the last time that the name of Edgar occurs in History. Henry, like his father, showed his contempt for the Saxon Prince by granting pardon and liberty to his insignificance; and he is said to have peacefully survived in neglect and obscurity to a great age.
† Matt. Paris, p. 52. Orderic, p. 900.

• Vide p. 613—616 of this volume.

† Orderic, p. 834—866. Malmſbury, p. 160—165. Matt. Paris, p. 43—47. Chron. Sax. p. 214—221.

‡ Orderic, p. 869. Hunt, p. 384.

§ Orderic, p. 867—870. Chron. Sax. p. 222.

virtuous, able, and enterprising qualities, than by the support which the French King again afforded to his just and dangerous pretensions. Louis bestowed on him the hand of his sister-in-law, with a large landed dowry on the Norman frontiers; and the great Fief of Flanders becoming vacant soon after by the assassination of its Count, his Royal benefactor also granted him the investiture of that Province, to which he had some claims by descent from his grandmother, Matilda, wife of the Conqueror, and daughter of a former Earl. Henry, indeed, succeeded in quelling a revolt of the Norman Barons in favour of his nephew; and Louis in a new war which he undertook, parily in the same cause, gained no decisive advantages. But in the growing fame and greatness of the new Earl of Flanders, his usurping uncle had increased cause to tremble for the safety of his continental domains: when the death of William from the effects of a slight but neglected wound, which he received in a petty skirmish against a Pretender to his Flemish Fief, unexpectedly relieved Henry from his dangerous embarrassments.*

The great remaining end of his reign was now to secure the succession to his dominions for his beloved daughter Matilda. After the untimely fate of his son, the King himself, already a widower by the death of the "good Queen Molde," concluded a second marriage with the young and beautiful Adela, daughter of the Duke of Louvain; but being disappointed of issue by this union, his whole affections, as well as his hopes of seeing his race perpetuated, rested on his daughter. As Matilda was without children by her first marriage with the Emperor Henry V., he had been anxious, after the death of that Monarch, to form a second alliance for her; and had therefore compelled her to marry Geoffrey Plantagenet,† eldest son of Foulques, Count of Anjou, the hereditary enemy of his House, whom he was desirous by this measure to detach from the interest of his nephew William. This second union was extremely distasteful to Matilda, whose haughty spirit ill disposed her to exchange the Imperial honours which she yet enjoyed in her German residence for the inferior state of a Countess, and still less to submit at her maturer age to the control of a wild and impetuous youth of sixteen. She however yielded to her father's commands; and though her own temper and that of Geoffrey tended equally to destroy their domestic happiness, and to afflict the old age of the King by their disagreements, their ill-assorted union was destined to give a long line of Princes to the English throne.

Both this intermarriage indeed with a hostile House, and the prospect of a female succession, as without precedent either in England or Normandy, excited equal disgust among the Anglo-Norman Nobility. But the King disregarding every murmur, had obliged an Assembly of Prelates and Nobles, comprising all the immediate Vassals or tenants in capite of the Crown, to swear fealty to his daughter, then still a widow, in case he himself should die without male issue. Subsequently he not only insisted upon his reluctant Vassals renewing their oaths on her marriage; but took advantage of the birth of her eldest son by Geoffrey Plantagenet, who was named after himself, to convene a third general Council, at which all the Nobility and dignified Clergy again solemnly pledged their reversionary allegiance to her, and extended it to the new-born infant. A dispute for precedence, as first Prince of the Blood, which was maintained on these occasions, between Stephen, Earl of Boulogne, the King's Nephew, by Adela, daughter of the Conqueror, and Robert Earl of Gloucester, his own natural son, might have given Henry an ominous foreboding of the views which were concealed under this rivalry. The decision of the question in favour of Stephen, instructed all those who were averse from a female succession, secretly to look up to him as their future Sovereign; and the doubt respecting the claims of Matilda to the Throne entertained in that Age, although in modern views of Regal inheritance her right was unquestionable, predisposed the mass of the nation to acquiesce in the designs which the future usurper already cherished. Henry, however, seems to have been unconscious of the precarious tenure of those obligations by which he had attempted to settle the Crown on his daughter's head. For when, after an unquiet, though successful reign of thirty-six years, he found himself seized with a mortal illness—produced, as it is said, by having partaken too freely of a dish of lampreys—he tranquilly repeated his bequest of all his dominions to Matilda, and expired at St. Denis le Froment in Normandy, in the confident belief that he had secured her undisputed succession.‡

The character of Henry is, in many respects, sufficiently developed in the preceding sketch of his reign; and if the perfidious acquisition of temporal greatness were truly the evidence of wisdom, his memory might deserve the emphatic distinction, with which he is dignified by some contemporary Writers, as the wisest Prince of his times. But his abilities were exercised only in the artifices of a faithless and cunning policy; his triumphs over less wily antagonists were purchased, not by glorious achievements, but by bribes and seductions; and the lives of few Monarchs have better illustrated the trite but unchangeable moral, that the paths of ambition lead only to disquietude and misery. The enjoyment of his boasted success against his foreign enemies was blighted by his domestic calamities; his projects for the aggrandizement of his daughter produced nothing but vexation to himself and unhappiness to her; and even his political sagacity and foresight were mocked by the abortive issue of his solicitude for her interest. A cruel brother, a suspicious and tyrannical master, and an incontinent husband, his deep affection for his children was indeed the only redeeming quality of his heart.† He was celebrated in his own Age for his learning, which procured him the surname of Beauclerc; and he has been praised in later times for his vigilant execution of the laws: whereby he certainly so far conferred a benefit on his people, that the most flagrant and violent crimes of robbery and spoliation, which were rife in the land at his accession, became before his death almost unknown‡.

But his intellectual acquirements, whatever was their real extent, had failed to humanize his mind; the equity of his administration is stained with the reproach of England.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Death of Henry
A. D.
1135.

His character.

His administration of justice.

* Orderic. p. 870—886. Chron. Sax. p. 232. and p. 616 of this vol.
† This name, which the Royal descendants of Geoffrey covered with renown, was derived from his device, a sprig of broom, or plante de grant; or perhaps, as before hinted, (p. 618.) from the passion for the chase which detained him perpetually among the heathen.

* Orderic. p. 886—901. Hunt. p. 383—385. Malmesbury. p. 166—178.

† Yet even this praise must be contradicted by his cruel and indecent treatment of his natural daughter Juliana, which has been related in a former Chapter, (p. 615 of this volume.)

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 237.

History.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

His rapacity.

Spoliation
of the Clergy.

unjust and ungrateful prejudices against his English subjects; and his activity in the punishment of crimes against the public peace, was sharpened by a rapacity which converted the sentences of the Courts to the profit of his Exchequer. Throughout his reign he systematically excluded the native English, to whose support and fidelity he was chiefly indebted for the success and security of his usurpation, from every Civil and Ecclesiastical office of trust or emolument.* He extorted enormous fines in commutation for all offences; and the riches which he accumulated in immense sums, considering the value of money at that epoch, besides his great expenditure in furthering schemes of Continental aggrandizement, were unfeelingly wrung from the necessities of an oppressed and impoverished people.† His extortion: were those of a despotic tyranny, which utterly neglected any equal adjustment of its burthens, and cruelly punished as a crime the poverty which it created. "It were not easy to relate," says Roger de Hoveden, "all that the land of Englishmen endured at this time (about the year 1103) because of the Royal exactions."‡ "God knoweth," exclaims the Saxon Chronicler, "how unjust a measure is dealt to this miserable People: first they are despoiled of their goods, then butchered. If a man possess any thing, it is taken from him: if nothing, he is left to die of hunger."—"This (1124) was a grievous year: whoever had any possessions remaining, now lost them by heavy taxes and iniquitous decrees."§ When we contemplate these simple and touching pictures of popular suffering, it is a small extenuation of the tyrant's guilt that he pursued public malefactors with so much rigour and severity as to be accounted by his terrified subjects the "Lion of Justice" foretold in the fabulous prophecies of Merlin; that he punished the licensed coiners for their debasement of the currency with death or mutilation; and that his vengeance equally overtook the purveyors and attendants of his own Court, whose spoliations and outrages during the Royal Progresses had compelled the inhabitants to flee and leave the country a desert before him.¶ It could scarcely improve the lot of his subjects that the King, himself the worst robber in his Realm, was determined to suffer no sharer in the spoil.

The Ecclesiastical affairs of his reign belong to another division of our subject; and it may suffice to observe in this place that the Clergy were not much more fortunate than other ranks of men in escaping his rapacity. One contemporary Writer, indeed, himself an Ecclesiastic, excludes the Norman superiors of his Order from the sympathy of his readers, by declaring that they were "rather wolves than shepherds:" but some curious instances are given of the King's expedients for plundering them. Notwithstanding his solemn promise on his accession, he imitated his brother's example by keeping many Sees vacant for years, that he might enjoy their revenues; and he usually sold the nomination of those which he filled up. When the Bishops in Council petitioned him to assist them in enforcing the Canon of celibacy, he gladly undertook the office, and exercised it in the sale of licenses to those Ecclesiastics who were willing to purchase the indulgence of retaining their wives. Upon an earlier occasion, under the pretence of supporting the Decree of a Synod which had prospectively forbidden the marriage of Priests, he instituted a commission of inquiry into the conduct of the Clergy on this head: when finding, as it is said, the number of delinquents fall short of expectation, he was so determined not to lose the profit which he had anticipated, that he ordered a heavy fine to be levied on every Parish Priest without regard to the transgression or observance of the Canon.*

If there were any man whom Henry, having treated with unwonted kindness and generosity, might imagine that he had attached to the interests of his daughter by every tie of gratitude and honour, it was his sister's son, Stephen, the third whom she had borne to the Earl of Blois. As both he and a fourth son, Henry, an Ecclesiastic, were without patrimony, the King had charged himself with their fortunes: the latter he raised to the See of Winchester; but on Stephen he lavished every mark of parental fondness. For he not only gave him the Earldom of Moreuil in Normandy, but by subsequently obtaining for him the hand of Matilda, daughter and heiress of Eustace, Count of Boulogne, besides the vast domains conferred by the Conqueror on that Lord in England, he secured his succession to the title and territories of the Count's more princely French Fief. The character of Stephen, having gained the affection, might seem to justify the confidence with which the King regarded him as the future champion of his daughter's cause. He was by nature active and valorous, kind and generous, courteous and merciful; qualities which, besides the popular favour, won him the hearts of his friends, and were freely acknowledged even by his enemies.†

But in the most trying hour of his life, the ambition of the Earl of Boulogne proved too strong for his better feelings: and thus impelled, in shameless disregard of every oath and obligation, he was guilty of the blackest ingratitude to his benefactor, by usurping the inheritance of his daughter. He had not a shadow of just pretension to the Throne: for, if the claims of Matilda and her infant sons were to be set aside by the repugnance of the Nobles to a female succession or a minority, a prior title of hereditary descent from the Conqueror was vested even in his own elder brother, Theobald, Earl of Blois. But relying on his influence and popularity, and the advantage which, at the moment of Henry's death, his residence at Boulogne gave him over Matilda, who was living with her husband in the more distant Province of Anjou, he hastened to London, was received with acclamations by its citizens, and immediately caused himself to be proclaimed King of England. By the assistance of his brother, the Bishop of Winchester, that City, with its Castle and the Royal treasures which it contained, was betrayed into his hands; and the two powerful Prelates of Canterbury and Sarum also were gained over to his cause. The former, indeed, affected to feel some scruples in violating the oaths which he had taken to Matilda; but he allowed them to be removed by the audacious perjury of Bigod, steward of the late King's household, who, at the instigation of the Bishop of Winchester, deliberately swore that Henry on his death-bed had disinherited his daughter and appointed Stephen his successor; and upon pretence of being satisfied by this miserable fraud,

* Kadmer, p. 94—110.

† Chron. Sax. p. 211—213, &c.

‡ Hoveden, p. 470.

§ Chron. Sax. p. 228.

¶ Kadmer, p. 94. Chron. Sax. p. 212, 228, 229, &c.

* Kadmer, p. 67, 83, 84, &c. Chron. Sax. p. 234.

† Orderic. p. 810. Malmesbury, p. 179—192. Gesta Stephani; apud Duchesne, p. 328.

England.
—
From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Story and character of Stephen and Henry's
reign.

His legitimacy and succession.

History. the Primate consented to place the Crown on the head of the usurper. The ceremony of his Coronation was performed at Westminster with indecent haste, before the other Prelates or the Barons of the Realm had time to arrive or declare their assent: but a lavish use of the late King's treasures, and the ready promulgation of a Charter promising to the Clergy, Nobles, and People a full redress of the grievances of the last reign, so easily reconciled all Orders of men to the usurpation that no attempt was made to oppose it; and even Robert, Earl of Gloucester, the natural brother and principal counsellor of Matilda, found it necessary to yield for a season to the general example, and swear allegiance to Stephen.*

Affairs of Normandy. Meanwhile the progress of affairs in the Continental dominions of the late King promised those possessions also to the usurper of his English Throne. When Matilda entered Normandy to take possession of that Duchy immediately after her father's death, she was at first peaceably received as its Sovereign: but being attended by a numerous Body of Anjevins under her husband, the insolent conduct of those followers towards her Norman subjects so exasperated the long-cherished animosity between the two races, that the People of the Duchy flew to arms. The Count of Anjou and his Vassals were ignominiously expelled; and the Norman Barons were on the point of offering their Ducal Crown to Theobald, Count of Blois, elder brother of Stephen: when an opportune message from the latter Prince determined them to maintain their connection with England by tendering their fealty to himself. Stephen, in order to sustain his Sovereignty, despatched a large force of Flemish mercenaries into the Duchy under William of Ipres; and Count Geoffrey, with his Anjevins on the other hand, frequently renewed his invasions in support of his wife's title. The whole Country, therefore, was for some years cruelly ravaged by foreign partisans who, on both sides, were equally odious to the natives. The Norman Barons, on pretence of supporting either cause, aimed only at making themselves independent of all control, and by their private wars aggravated and prolonged the public wretchedness: but between the two rivals for the Sovereignty, the advantage lay almost wholly with Stephen, who had not only obtained possession of the principal places in the Duchy, but had prevailed on the French King formally to grant him its investiture.†

Scottish invasions of England. Nor were repeated diversions which Matilda prevailed upon her maternal uncle, David King of Scotland, to make in her behalf on the English borders, more successful than the arms of her adherents in Normandy. The first of these attempts, a few months after the seizure of the Crown by Stephen, produced only some indecisive hostilities, and was closed by a Peace. But two years later, prompted either by regard to oaths which he had formerly sworn to Henry I. to support the succession of his daughter, or by resentment at the failure of Stephen to invest him with the Earldom of Northumberland promised by the late pacification, David undertook a new and more formidable invasion of England; and overrunning the Northern Counties with a great army of his barbarian Scots, he was unable to restrain them from the commission of the most horrible cruelties. Churches, Monasteries, and whole Villages were subjected to a common conflagration, and their inhabitants to promiscuous slaughter. At length the Barons and people of Yorkshire, nerved by despair, and animated by the religious exhortations of their venerable Metropolitan, took post near Northallerton, in close, deep, and immovable array around a lofty mast, surmounted by a silver crucifix, which was fixed in the body of a waggon, and gave a lasting name to the "Battle of the Standard."‡ Here, the English awaited an assault with so much resolution, and in such impetuous order, that the invaders were defeated with tremendous slaughter; and the King of Scots and his son, with the remains of his army, not more than one half of whose numbers escaped from the flight and the pursuit, rallied not until they reached the border City of Carlisle. Early in the following year, the horrors of this Northern war were terminated by a second Peace, of which, notwithstanding the late victory, the terms were rather favourable than otherwise to the King of Scotland: but the attention of Stephen was now engrossed by the domestic troubles of his Government; and the calamities of a Civil war were already impending over his Kingdom.†

The causes of the dreadful miseries which followed must be sought, partly in a quarrel between Stephen and the Clergy, partly in the facilities which the weakness of a government founded on so fugitious wrong had afforded to the Nobility for the erection of private fortresses in every quarter of the Realm.‡ The origin of the disaffection, which it is certain that the Clergy in general had now conceived against the King, seems involved in much obscurity. But it has been conjectured with sufficient probability that Stephen had provoked the enmity of that powerful Order, by disappointing the expectations of an increase to their already enormous privileges, which had induced them originally to support his usurpation. However this may have been, we find that the King, on the occasion of an Assembly of Prelates and Barons, held at Oxford in the same year in which the Battle of the Standard was fought, outraged the whole Ecclesiastical Body by seizing the persons of the Bishops of Sarum and Lincoln, upon a charge of breaking the King's peace by the excitement of a tumult in his Court. At the same time the Bishop of Ely escaped only by flight from similar violence; and an immediate surrender of the fortresses of the captive Prelates—for, like the Lay Barons, even these Ecclesiastical Lords now possessed fortified Castles—was demanded and obtained by the King as the price of their lives and liberty. Amidst the indignation with which these proceedings were received by the Clergy, the Bishop of Winchester, who had lately been invested with the dignity of Papal Legate, probably found himself placed in a situation of extreme embarrassment between his relationship to the King and a

England.
From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Great Battle of the Standard.
A. D.
1138.
Defeat of the Scots.

Quarrel of Stephen with the Clergy.

* This standard with its carriage, as already noticed in p. 639 of the present volume, closely resembled the Corporalis, or Sacred Battle car, so often mentioned in the wars of the Lombard Cities. On the mast, below the crucifix, waved the banners, as they are described, of several Saints; of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred of Ripon; and from the carriage itself, the Bishop of Orkney, as officiating for the aged Metropolitan, Thurstan of York, whose infirmities prevented his presence, pronounced an absolution and blessing upon the embattled host. Ricardus Hugustaldensis, p. 321.

† Orderic. p. 917. Gesta Stephani, p. 938, 939. Ricardus Hugus p. 312—330.

‡ Gesta Stephani, p. 935, &c. Malmesbury, p. 160.

* Orderic. p. 902. Malmesbury, p. 179. Matt. Paris, p. 52. Gesta Stephani, p. 928, 929.

† Orderic. p. 902, 903.

History. common interest and sympathy with his professional Brethren. But it is manifest that his attachment to his Order was stronger than the ties of blood: for, in his Legatine capacity, he summoned his brother before a Synod of Bishops, to answer for his conduct and make restitution of the Church property which he had seized; and the King, although he refused to give up the Castles which he contended that it was unlawful for Ecclesiastics to hold, condescended to plead by Counsel against the demand. But finding the Synod disposed to insist on his compliance, he forbade all further proceedings, and drove the Legate by his threats and demonstrations of military force to dissolve the Assembly.*

Landing of the Empress Matilda. Stephen had soon sufficient reason to repent the imprudent violence with which he had drawn upon himself the hostility of the Church. Within a month after the dissolution of the Synod, the Empress Matilda, (for she still bore that title,) whether invited by the Prelates or induced by knowledge of their disaffection to her rival, landed in England with a slender train of no more than one hundred and forty Knights: but her enterprise was supported by the presence of her brother, the Earl of Gloucester, and encouraged by the promised aid of numerous partisans.† Her arrival was the signal for the immediate commencement of Civil war in every part of the Kingdom; and as the strength or weakness of the contending parties was very equally balanced, the whole Country was for several years exposed to frightful devastation from both factions, without any decisive event. While the rightful pretensions of Matilda were now zealously supported by the Clergy, by the stout Earl of Gloucester, and by all the influence which he could command among the Nobles; the cause of the usurper was upheld by numerous partisans who had enjoyed, or who expected, his lavish bounty; by the citizens of London with whom he was personally popular; and by bands of Flemish and other foreign mercenaries, whom, ever since his accession, he had retained in his pay for the security of his ill-founded power. But the great Barons in general, retiring to their Castles, kept aloof from the contest, and either affected a complete independence and neutrality between the competitors for the Sovereignty, or embraced either cause only for the unrestrained indulgence of their private feuds, and their greediness for oppression and rapine. It would redound little to the pleasure or the instruction of the reader to rescue from oblivion the barbarous and desultory circumstances of a warfare, which was fertile only in crimes. But, in the third year of the contest, a signal advantage was gained by Matilda, which, but for her own misconduct, might have placed her in secure possession of the Throne. While engaged in the siege

Civil war.

Battle of Lincoln.
A. D.
1141

of the castle of Lincoln, the King's forces were attacked and totally defeated by her army under the Earl of Gloucester; and Stephen himself, after performing prodigies of personal valour, was wounded and made prisoner. He was conveyed in custody to Bristol, and soon after ignominiously thrown into a dungeon and loaded with chains.*

This misfortune of Stephen, as might be expected, overwhelmed his own party with despair, and induced most of the Barons, who had hitherto observed a suspicious neutrality, to offer their allegiance to his victorious rival. The faithful Queen of Stephen (who was also named Matilda) alone remained in arms in Kent, rather with the view of obtaining better terms for her husband, than with any serious hope of prolonging the contest: but the victors, despising the efforts of an adversary apparently so feeble, conducted the Empress to Winchester, where, after some negotiations, she was openly acknowledged as Queen by the Bishop-Legate, the Primate, and a Synod of the Episcopal and dignified Clergy. From that City she repaired to London to receive the Crown:† and her triumph seemed completed by the favourable reception with which she was welcomed by the citizens of the Capital, who already formed a Body of considerable power in the State, and had hitherto shown themselves the strenuous partisans of Stephen.‡

But when her fortunes had thus attained the ascend-^{ant}, they were suddenly humbled by her arrogant and vindictive temper. She offended the Bishop-Legate of Winchester by contemptuously refusing to accept Stephen's formal surrender of the Crown upon condition that his Norman Earldom and English domains should be secured to his son. And with equal imprudence, instead of endeavouring to conciliate the affections of the citizens of London, she not only instantly rejected their suit for the restoration of the privileges which they had enjoyed under the Conqueror, but imposed a heavy tax upon them as a punishment for their previous adherence to the cause of the usurper. The Bishop of Winchester immediately retired in disgust from her Court: but the citizens meditated a quicker vengeance; and animated by the opportune appearance of a Body of horse which Stephen's Queen had caused to approach the Capital, they so unexpectedly rose in arms, that the Empress only escaped captivity by a precipitate flight to Oxford. The Bishop of Winchester now once more espoused his brother's party; and the Empress assembling her principal adherents with their forces, attended by her brother, the Earl of Gloucester, and her uncle, David, King of Scotland, proceeded from Oxford to surprise the Bishop-Legate in his own City. But that Prelate escaped in time to join Stephen's Queen, who, at the head of the Londoners, and reinforced by other partisans of her husband, was advancing to his aid. The Empress and her friends were soon hemmed in on every side; and after enduring a seven weeks' siege in the Castle of Winchester, were compelled by hunger to attempt cut-

* Orderic. p. 919. Gesta Stephani, p. 943—945. Malmesbury, p. 182, 183. This last Writer was present at the Synod.

† A circumstance which attended the opening of the struggle is characteristic of chivalrous manners. The Empress on her landing repaired to the Castle of Arundel, the residence of her mother-in-law Adelais, Queen-dowager of Henry I, who was now married to the Earl of Sussex. Stephen soon appeared before the fortress with a superior force; and Adelais, dreading a siege, demanded free permission for Matilda to quit the Castle and join her brother, the Earl of Gloucester, in the West, which Stephen immediately granted; for, adds Malmesbury, no true Knight could in courtesy do less. This strange piece of gallantry, however, is rather referred by the anonymous Biographer of Stephen to an ill-judged expectation that, by allowing the Empress to withdraw, he should be enabled to cut off her communications with her partisans in the centre of the Kingdom, and confine her efforts within a distant Province. Gesta Stephani, p. 947.

* Orderic. p. 919, ad finem. Malmesbury, p. 184—186. Gesta Stephani, p. 946—952. At this crisis the valuable Chronicle of Ordericus Vitalis terminates.

† Hume has, however, fallen into one of his frequent inaccuracies in stating (History of England, vol. i. p. 487, that she was actually crowned.

‡ Chron. Sur. p. 242. Malmesbury, p. 187, who again describes as a witness the proceedings of this Synod at Winchester.

History.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Stephen obtains his release.

Final result of Matilda from England.
A. D.
1147.

Loss of Normandy
by Stephen.

Henry Planta-genet, son of Matilda.

ting their way through their enemies. The effort was only so far successful that the gallant Earl of Gloucester covered the flight of his sister, by sacrificing himself with a chosen Body of Nobles and Knights to her safety. She escaped, while her whole escort, after bravely sustaining the assaults of her pursuers, were either slain, captured, or dispersed. The Scottish King himself was thrice taken, and as often extricated himself from the hands of the victors; but Robert of Gloucester was less fortunate, and with many other Nobles remained a prisoner.*

The Earl, however, had been so completely the soul of every enterprise, that his sister was glad to purchase his release by that of Stephen; and this exchange restored both parties very nearly to the same position in which they had been placed before the Battle of Lincoln. It is useless to pursue further the shifting vicissitudes of a struggle from which Matilda, after passing through many wild adventures,† was at last induced or compelled, by weariness of the struggle or despair of the result, to retire into Normandy. But she did not yield until a desultory and indecisive warfare of six years since the release of Stephen had tried and exhausted her endurance and hopes; and until, by the death of her brave brother, she had lost the firmest support of her cause. Meanwhile, the diversion produced by her having carried the war into England had not been without benefit to her rights over Normandy. For the usurper being too much occupied by the defence of his English Crown to support his Norman adherents, her husband Geoffrey had succeeded in reducing that Duchy to obedience; and thence Stephen, after a brief season of repose which succeeded the departure of the Empress, soon found himself assailed by a more youthful and formidable opponent.‡

This was Henry Plantagenet, eldest son of the Empress, who had already, when a boy, been conducted into England by his uncle, the Earl of Gloucester, and remained under his warlike tuition until the death of that Nobleman. Subsequently he had revisited the Island, and received his Knightly investiture at Carlisle from another uncle, David, King of Scotland. As he approached the age of manhood, the young Prince displayed talents and energies of the highest order. By the death of his father he had now succeeded to the Earldom of Anjou; in the name of his mother he held the government of Normandy; and by his unscrupu-

* The captive Earl of Gloucester was treated with all the consideration due to his valiant and faithful character; and the conduct of Stephen's Queen in this respect formed a generous contrast to that of the opposite party towards her unfortunate husband. The unshaken and devoted attachment of the Earl to the cause of his sister, and of the Queen to that of her Consort, render these two by far the most, perhaps the only, interesting personages in the perplexed and troubled drama of their times.

† Many of the incidents presented by this contest in common with the desultory vicissitudes of every partisan warfare, are not without Romantic interest, although too confused and inconsequential to be worthy of Historical record. On one occasion, after enduring a winter's siege in Oxford, the Empress effected her nocturnal escape, while the ground was covered with snow, by dressing herself, and three Knights her attendants, in white. After passing by this stratagem unobserved through the enemy's beleaguers, she was obliged to cross the Thames over the ice on foot. Gesta Stephani, p. 959. Another tale told by the continuator of Florence of Worcester, (p. 677.) of her being carried in a barge from Devizes to Gloucester after her flight from Winchester, should probably be rejected, as tacitly contradicted by the silence of other contemporary authorities of better credit.

‡ Malmesbury, p. 187—189. Gesta Stephani, p. 953—959.

lous union with Eleanor, the repudiated Queen of Louis VII. of France, which we have already recorded in the Annals of that Kingdom,* he acquired possession of the Duchy of Aquitaine, her inheritance. Attracted by the rising fortunes of this young Prince, the enemies of Stephen, who, unwarned by adversity, had imprudently embroiled himself anew with his Clergy and Barons, invited him again into England; and his landing produced an immediate renewal of the Civil wars. But when the armies of the hostile factions drew out against each other to dispute the passage of the Thames at Wallingford, many of the principal Barons on both sides suddenly showed their weariness of the long disorders which had afflicted the Realm. Agreeing in this feeling, they compelled the rival Princes to conclude a solemn accommodation, by which Stephen, on receiving the allegiance of Henry for his own life, adopted him as his successor. The ambition of Eustace, the King's eldest son, whom the Archbishop of Canterbury, although solicited by Stephen, had already refused to crown as his heir, presented the only obstacle to a settlement; but this was shortly removed by the opportune death of the young Pretender, who, withdrawing from the Court in furious indignation on the first proposal of the Treaty, suddenly expired in a paroxysm of phrency. The Duke of Normandy, after accompanying the King in an amicable Progress through the principal Cities of the Realm, returned to Normandy; and only a few months afterwards Stephen peaceably ended his distracted reign and troubled existence.†

The horrors inflicted on the Kingdom by his criminal and fatal ambition, cannot be more forcibly described than in the simple and coincident language of two contemporary Chroniclers; and the best personal qualities of a nature neither ungenerous nor cruel in itself, will poorly extenuate the guilt which his usurpation engendered. In the days of this King, say their faithful witnesses, all was feud and disorder and wickedness. Strong Lords, who heeded not the troth which they had sworn to him, built Castles and held them against him, filling these with evil and devilish men, by whose hands they seized and cruelly oppressed the poor folks of the land, forcing them to grievous labours; shutting up in dungeons full of noisome reptiles such as had gold or silver; and wringing out their spoils with strange and sundry torments. Some hanged they by the feet in deadly smoke, some by the hair, and the thumbs; some upon hot iron; of some crushed they the bodies in boxes of stones, or twisted knotted cords round their temples, or encircled their necks with spiked collars. Very many they vexed to death with hunger and thirst. And so it ever grew worse for all the years that Stephen was King. The towns were burned with fire, the lands left waste, the poor folks driven forth to starve. A whole day's journey might the traveller ride, and not find a man left in a town, nor a land in tillage.‡ It has been well observed, that by this language of general horror the universal misery of England is better expressed than would be possible by examples;§ but some signal examples of wanton devastation may still be selected from the long catalogue of ruin which was filled by the wickedness of England.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189. invited by her partisans into England.
A. D.
1152.

Accommodation between him and Stephen.
A. D.
1153.

Death of Stephen.

Horrors of his reign.

* Ibid supra, p. 619.

† Malmesbury, p. 180, &c. Gervas. p. 1360—1376.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 248, 239. Gesta Stephani, p. 961.

§ Macintosh, (Hist. of England), vol. i. p. 135.

History.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1159.

Causes of its anarchy and disorders.

Accession of Henry II.

A. D.
1154.

both factions. During the siege which the Empress sustained in the Castle of Winchester, the combatants on either side fired and plundered the City; and the extent of the conflagration in that ancient Capital of Wessex may be estimated by the fact, that it consumed no fewer than forty Churches and two Monasteries.* Worcester shared nearly a similar fate; and Nottingham, which had already become populous and wealthy for that Age, was the scene of a more horrid catastrophe: for the greater number of its inhabitants perished in the flames. Amidst these disorders even Churches and Religious Houses, of which the sanctity was wont to claim the awe and respect of a Christian Knighthood, and whose walls had often been the last refuge of the oppressed and defenceless, and afforded a secure asylum to female innocence and helpless age, were unscrupulously desecrated and remorselessly defiled with nameless atrocities.

Two circumstances may chiefly be remarked as the causes of these frightful disorders: the license of erecting strong-holds to secure an impunity for their crimes, which Barons of every degree assumed at the commencement of Stephen's usurpation; and the employment, not only by the King but by his Feudal supporters and opponents, of Bodies of Flemish mercenaries, or Brabançons as they were commonly called from the Province in which they were most numerous recruited. The number of new Castles alone, which these handitti were levied to garrison, exceeded one hundred and twenty; but, moreover, such Chieftains as were unwilling or unable to incur the expense or trouble of fresh constructions, not unfrequently seized on some neighbouring Church or Monastery; and in this manner it is especially recorded that the Abbays of Coventry and Ramsey, and the Minster of Bridlington, were converted into fortresses by three Barons, Robert de Marmion, Geoffrey de Granville, and William d'Aumerle. But, indeed, no dread of incurring the guilt of sacrilege, one of the few crimes which the tyrants and spoilers of the Middle Ages usually shuddered to perpetrate, any longer restrained the contending parties. Whether the objects of greedy rapacity, or more cruel passions, were contained within the walls of Lay or Ecclesiastical edifices, the Brabançons sacked, burned, murdered, and violated, with the same devilish ferocity, and the same impious scorn of all compunctious feeling. Nor were such crimes confined to these wretches: the Feudal Nobles, who sought their services, imitated their lives; and it is the indignant reproach of the Chronicler, that these Christian Knights made a shameless boast of atrocities, at which their Pagan forefathers might have blushed.†

The death of Stephen, and the energetic character of the youthful Duke of Normandy, inspired the English with eager hopes of deliverance from the long and frightful anarchy with which the misrule of the usurper had afflicted the Kingdom; and the accession of Henry Plantagenet to the Throne was welcomed with the universal joy of the Nation. Nor were their expectations disappointed. On his arrival from Normandy, after celebrating his Coronation, and securing the popular affection by a renewal of the Charter which his grandsire had granted and violated, the young King proceeded to signalize the commencement of his reign by the most vigorous measures for the restoration of order. He immediately issued a Proclamation, commanding the foreign mercenaries, who had been the scourge and terror of the People, to quit the Country by an appointed day under pain of death. He reclaimed the possession of all the Royal castles and demesnes which the powerful partisans, either of his mother or of the usurper, had extorted as the price of their wavering allegiance; and he insisted on the demolition of the numerous private fortresses, which the adherents of both factions, amidst the public confusion, had illegally erected. These demands were not of a nature to require a voluntary compliance: but neither were they made until Henry had prepared to enforce them by the assemblage of a formidable army; and either aided by this display of the Royal power, or chastised by its exertion, each of the great Barons, who had so long reigned the tyrant of his Province, was successively compelled to submission or surrender. Royal garrisons were placed in all the Castles which had originally belonged to the Crown; and those which Henry, Bishop of Winchester, Stephen's brother, as well as many Lay Barons, had constructed, were everywhere razed to the earth. At the same time, an equitable administration of the laws was firmly established and rigidly observed; and under these salutary reforms the Kingdom soon began to recover from the calamities by which it had been oppressed. An insurrection of the Welch, who had often ravaged the English Marches with impunity during the life of Stephen, alone disturbed the national tranquillity. But, although the Royal arms were not eminently triumphant against that restless and inaccessible People, their depredations were severely chastised; and the war was successfully concluded by the submission of their Princes, who were reduced to swear allegiance to Henry, and to leave hostages in his hands for their fealty.*

While Henry had thus reestablished the peace and secured the possession of his Insular Kingdom, various circumstances had conspired to render him one of the most powerful Continental Princes of his Age. Including Brittany, always an Arriere-Fief of his Norman Duchy, and of which he found occasion to obtain a more effectual possession, he was master either by inheritance or by marriage of all Western France, in uninterrupted extent from the British Channel to the Pyrenees, and from the Atlantic coast to the confines of Flanders, the Orleansois, and Toulouse. These great possessions, which far surpassed in space and value the whole territory immediately subject to the French King, rendered Henry, though nominally the Vassal of Louis VII., in reality his political superior; and the hereditary office of Great Seneschal of France, which the English Monarch held by descent from his paternal grandfather, Foulques V. of Anjou,† as it strangely intrusted to his administration the highest judicial prerogatives of the Crown, without permitting an appeal to the Sovereign himself, completed his total independence of the nominal Lord Paramount. It is not therefore surprising that, as we have formerly observed,‡ the aggrandizement thus attained by a Vassal, and in a great degree at his own * Matt. Paris, p. 65—81. Hoveden, p. 491. Guilielmus Norwicensis, lib. ii. p. 1—5. Gervasius, p. 1077—1080.

† Vide p. 614 of this volume.

‡ Ibid. p. 619.

* Gesta Stephani, p. 956.

† Ibid. p. 961—970, &c. Chron. Sax. p. 228, 239.

History.
From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.
His first war with Louis VII.
of France.

A. D.
1160.

Rise and character of Thomas à Becket.

His promotion to the see of Canterbury.

expense by marriage with his repudiated Queen, filled Louis VII. with alarm and jealousy; and these feelings, continually irritated by the ambitious projects of Henry, occasioned, throughout the reign of both Princes, a long series of quickly rekindling, though desultory contests. The first of these arose, as already related in the French Annals, from the claims which Henry laid to the County of Toulouse in right of his wife, whose father had once held it by marriage, but mortgaged it to Raymond, Count of St. Gilles. The French King himself, before his divorce from Eleanor of Aquitaine, had advanced the same pretensions on her behalf: but this did not now prevent him from extending that protection to Raymond, through which the design of Henry was finally frustrated. We have seen that the pacification which closed this war was almost immediately broken by the dishonourable fraud, through which Henry obtained possession of the Vexin as the promised dower of the infant Princess Margaret of France, the betrothed bride of his son, Henry Courtmanteau: but though Louis consented to smother for a season the indignation which he felt at having been overreached in this affair, and allowed himself, by the Papal mediation, to be again reconciled with his more artful and unscrupulous adversary, he subsequently found, and eagerly seized, a more promising opportunity of vengeance. This was afforded by the famous quarrel between Henry and Thomas à Becket.*

The conspicuous part acted by that extraordinary person in the Political and Religious affairs of the Reign before us, claims some particular notice of his personal history and character. Thomas à Becket was the son of a London citizen, of the native Saxon race;† and his fortunes present this, among other remarkable singularities, that the individual, who so long defied the power and embittered the existence of his Sovereign, was the first Englishman who, since the Conquest, had been permitted to attain any Civil or Ecclesiastical dignity. Becket was bred to the Church; and an early display of the abilities by which he was subsequently distinguished, recommended him to the notice of Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury. Through the favour of that Primate he received some preferment, and was enabled to travel to Italy for the purpose of improving his knowledge of the Civil and Canon Law; which he studied under the famous Gratian at Bologna, the great seat of those branches of Learning. On his return, his patron, who found such acquirements useful in transacting the affairs of his Church, rewarded his services by obtaining for him the rich Archdeaconry of Canterbury, and introduced him to the special notice of the King.‡

The share of the Primate in securing the succession of Henry, gave weight to this recommendation; and the rise of Becket was thenceforth assured. Attracted both by his talents for business and his agreeable manners, which at that period of his life were little restrained within the bounds of professional decorum, the King freely admitted him both into the confidence of his serious, and the familiarity of his lighter hours. The Royal Favourite was appointed Chancellor; received the Wardenship of the Tower of London and other lucrative offices; and was intrusted with the principal administration of all his master's dominions, both Insular and Continental. These dignities he supported with a magnificence more Regal than Clerical; maintained a sumptuous establishment and an immense retinue; dispensed a splendid hospitality, and lived on the easiest and most intimate terms with a Sovereign, who shared his pleasures too heartily to feel jealous of the style which they affected. The political abilities of the Minister were devoted to the service of his master, with as much success and with as little scruple as his convivial accomplishments; and it was by the adroitness of Becket, in an embassy to the French King, that Louis was induced to conclude that alliance of his infant daughter to the son of Henry, which subsequently cost him the loss of the Vexin. In the hostilities between the two Monarchs, Becket appeared in the new character of a warrior; and at the head of a large body of Knights and gens d'armes, whom he levied and maintained at his own expense, the Archdeacon of Canterbury, though the example was less uncommon than shameful among Churchmen of that Age, marched and fought with more reputation for martial conduct and prowess, than for religious propriety.*

While Becket publicly exhibited this unseemly spectacle of a dissipated, worldly, and militant Ecclesiastic, it is not wonderful that Henry, although himself a Prince of great sagacity, should have fatally mistaken the real character of the man, and expected to find, in the able and unscrupulous Minister, a ready instrument for the design which he had entertained, from the beginning of his Reign, of repressing the multiplied encroachments of the Church upon the Royal authority. The debt of personal gratitude which he owed to Archbishop Theobald, induced him to suspend the execution of his project during the life of that Prelate: but when the death of Theobald released him from his obligations, he resolved to forbear no longer; and to ensure the

* Stephan. p. 10—21. Several casual notices, not without interest in their way, of the manners of the times may be gleaned from this narrative of Fitz Stephen, the Secretary and Biographer of Becket. It was an instance of the sumptuous hospitality of the Chancellor, that his apartments were daily strewn with fresh rushes or hay, lest his guests, who were usually more numerous than could be accommodated with seats at his table, should dirty their clothes as they sat on the floor! Yet the costliness of his furniture, the luxury of his banquets, and the general splendour of his state, were the theme of contemporary wonder and admiration. When he went on an embassy from his master to the French King, he travelled with a train which astonished all beholders by its magnificence. He was preceded, on his entrance to every considerable town, by an incredible number of choristers or singing boys, who struck up some triumphant chant. These were followed by several wains laden with his plate, wardrobe, and bedding, and the utensils of his chapel and kitchen; not forgetting stores of ale to be distributed to the populace. Sumpter horses with led chargers, hounds, falcons, and monkeys, also figured in the procession, with a crowd of Knights, Esquires, and Clerks; and last of all rode the Chancellor himself, encircled by the principal members and attendants of his household. Henry was probably flattered by this imposing display of pomp in his Minister: for it was a common remark of the People in the French Provinces through which the embassy passed, that he must needs be a mighty Monarch, whose very servant was wont to maintain so Royal a pageantry.

* Hoveden, p. 492. Gul. Neubrig. lib. ii. p. 5—24.

† A curious and romantic tale has been sometimes copied from a Chronicler, (John of Brompton,) who lived scarcely within two Centuries of the event, ascribing the birth of Becket to his father's marriage with a noble Saxon dame; who had become acquainted with, and loved him, in the Holy Land, and found her way to rejoin him, after many marvellous and touching adventures, in London. But the story, of which all the details are highly improbable, was evidently unknown to the Biographer of Becket, or to any other extant Writers nearer to his times than Brompton; and may therefore be dismissed as utterly unworthy of credit.

‡ Stephanides, p. 1—9.

History.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.
Henry creates him
Archbishop of Canterbury.
A. D.
1162.

Total change in the conduct of Becket.

Question of its sincerity.

His quarrel with the King.

success of his intended measures, it seemed only necessary to elevate his compliant Favourite and Chancellor to the vacant Primacy. It is recorded to the honour, and, if true, it forms some extenuation for the subsequent conduct of Becket, that when the King announced his intended promotion, he at first, with a jocular allusion to his luxurious and unclerical dress, observed that there was little in that garb to indicate an Archbishop elect: but finding his master serious in his purpose, he as earnestly conjured Henry not to force him into the only situation, in which he might find his continued services to his benefactor incompatible with higher duties.* But the King would hear of no scruples, and Becket became Archbishop of Canterbury.†

From that hour the new Primate assumed a deportment, in every respect the most opposite from the whole tenour of his former life. He immediately changed the pomp of secular state and luxurious magnificence, for a yet prouder ostentation of humility and self-denial. He discarded his splendid retinue of Noble and Knightly dependents, his costly habiliments, his sumptuous fare, and his worldly amusements; he rejected the common attendance prescribed by his dignity, wore sackcloth next his skin, used only the most abstemious diet, inflicted on his body the severest penances which the fanaticism of his Age mistook for the means of sanctification, and diverted the prodigal expenditure of his recent hospitalities to as lavish a distribution of alms and charitable uses. His time was entirely occupied between devotional exercises and Ecclesiastical duties; and his desire thenceforth to abstract his mind wholly from mere temporal business was formally declared in the resignation of his office of Chancellor.† Much discussion has been wasted by Historians on the motives which produced this surprising change of conduct: for the subject has usually been converted into a party question between the champions and opponents of the Church of Rome. But when viewed apart, both from Religious prejudice and the worse affectation of an overstrained charity of judgment, a dispassionate survey of the preceding life and subsequent behaviour of Becket will supply to the common sense of mankind only one conclusion. The pious conversion of the new Archbishop was too sudden to be sincere: its exact coincidence with his elevation, and its necessity for his further aggrandizement, were too palpable not to betray the workings of a worldly and ambitious temper. The ambition of Becket, indeed, had nothing in it either sordid or vulgar. He was contented to forego the enjoyment of wealth, luxury, courtly favour, and homage, and even of political office and power: but it was only that he might exchange such toys of common-place passion for that unbounded spiritual ascendancy over the public opinion of his times, to desire which is most congenial to the loftiest natures. He surrendered, indeed, his influence over the affections of his Sovereign, and the temporal government of a Kingdom, but he aspired to gain the veneration of a devout People, the absolute rule of a triumphant Church, and the universal admiration of the Ecclesiastical Order throughout Europe, an Order which engrossed all the Learning and intellectual superiority of its Age.

The first circumstances which hastened an open quarrel

* This tale of the scruples of Becket, however, seems to rest only on his own assertion. St. Thomas, in Hist. Quadr. c. xxxiv.
† Stephan. p. 21—25. Gervas. p. 1384.

between the King and the new Primate have been variously related: but it would be to little purpose to inquire the ostensible cause of a rupture, which the position and views of both parties rendered inevitable. The sudden and ostentatious change in the deportment of Becket was sufficient to excite the suspicion and alarm of Henry; and some acts of covert hostility on either side completed the alienation of feeling between the Sovereign and his late Favourite. But the great and final subject of controversy was the extent of Ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The scandalous consequences of the exemption claimed by the Clergy from trial before any secular tribunals, furnished the King with a fair plea for entering on his long-cherished design of humbling their Order. As the Ecclesiastical Courts, while they pretended to the sole cognizance of offences committed by Clerks, were not vested with the power of inflicting capital or other sufficient punishments, their protection amounted to an impunity for the most enormous crimes. More than a hundred murders, it is said, had thus been perpetrated by Ecclesiastics, and visited with very inadequate penalties, since the King's accession;‡ and Henry, availing himself of the public indignation produced by one of these cases, now demanded that, whenever a Clerk was convicted of any atrocious offence against the laws of the Realm, he should, after degradation from his sacred office, be delivered up to the judgment of the secular tribunals. This reasonable proposal was immediately resisted by Becket; and the King, resolved at once to bring the whole question of Ecclesiastical usurpation to an issue, formally demanded of the Primate and his Bishops, whether they were willing to observe the ancient laws and customs of the Kingdom. They at first endeavoured to evade the demand, by qualifying their reply with a reservation in favour of the privileges of their Order; nor was it until the just anger of the King at this artifice had shown itself with so great violence as to terrify the Bishops, that the bolder Primate was induced by their entreaties to withdraw a saving clause which had been designed to nullify the apparent assent.†

But Henry, not choosing to rest the security of his prerogative even upon an unconditional concession, thus reluctantly yielded, was now determined both to define the ancient usages of the Kingdom, and to reduce the growth of Ecclesiastical pretensions within surer limits, by obtaining the formal sanction of national assent and enactment. For this purpose, he summoned one of those great Councils of the Realm, composed of all its Barons and Prelates, which in that Age were only convened on the most solemn occasions, and which, in the absence of any more direct form of public representation, were reasonably held to be invested with the supreme legislative authority of the Nation. In this Assembly, which met at Clarendon, the King proposed a series of Resolutions declaratory of those customs applicable to Ecclesiastical affairs, which, as derivable from the old Saxon laws, had received a full confirmation, however neglected in more recent practice, by the Charter of his grandfather. These propositions the Lay Barons, who appear to have sided on this occasion wholly with the King, at once cheerfully ratified; and the Clergy, though not without some murmurs, being overawed by the unanimity of the Nobles, attempted no resistance, • Neubrig. lib. ii. p. 16.

† Stephan. p. 26—32. Gervas. p. 1385. Hoveden, p. 492, 493.

History. and subscribed to sixteen articles, which became deservedly memorable under the name of the Constitutions of Clarendon. By the most important of these Articles it was enacted, that all Clerks accused of crimes should, in the first instance, come before the King's Courts, and if there convicted, should forfeit the protection of the Church; that in each suit to which a Clerk was a party, it should be left to the Royal Justices to determine whether the matter properly fell under Civil or Ecclesiastical jurisdiction; that no Priest should quit the Realm nor carry an appeal from any Spiritual tribunal beyond the Archbishop's Court, without the Royal permission; that none of the King's tenants in capite should be excommunicated without his consent; that the custody and revenues of vacant dignities in the Church should be vested in the King; that elections to such vacancies should be made on his Writ and with his assent only, by the principal Clergy of the See, or Abbey, if of Royal foundation; that the individual elected should take the oath of fealty and do homage to the King as his liege lord; and that all Clerks holding immediately of the Crown should be subject to the same suit and service in his Courts as his Lay tenants.*

Resistance of Becket. It was not without the greatest reluctance, that Becket had been persuaded or compelled to give his assent to the Constitutions of Clarendon. But he had no sooner retired from the Assembly, than he openly condemned his own compliance; performed self-imposed penances for his weakness; suspended himself from the exercise of the Archbishop's office; and applied to the Pope, both to withhold his ratification from the Articles, and to grant him absolution for his own share in their enactment. The reigning Pontiff, Alexander III., doubtless had the sagacity to view the whole transaction as an important crisis in the great struggle of Civil and Ecclesiastical Power; and when solicited by Henry to confirm the Constitutions, he at once boldly espoused the cause of the English Primate, and rejected the most obnoxious of the Articles. This decisive measure was the less expected by Henry, as he had warmly supported the pretensions of Alexander against the Antipope Victor; and it accordingly filled him with the greatest perplexity and indignation. But his chief resentment was directed against Becket, whom he, not unnaturally, regarded as an ungrateful rebel to his former favour and present authority, and as the instigator of the Papal refusal.

Tyrannical measures of Henry against him. These irritated feelings hurried him into many acts of unjustifiable violence. Hitherto he had appeared to assert no more than those reasonable prerogatives of his Crown, which were necessary for the due execution of the laws; but he now commenced a course of petty persecution against the property of the Archbishop, which was equally iniquitous in itself, and unworthy of his own honour. He deprived Becket of estates which he had formerly bestowed upon him; harassed him with vexatious suits in the Royal Courts for the recovery of fictitious debts, which it was pretended that he had incurred in his Chancellorship; and employed every legal chicanery for his oppression and ruin. The Primate met these attacks with a dignified firmness, which placed his conduct in a striking and advantageous contrast to the meanness of the Royal revenge. Some of the King's unjust demands he satisfied, with a lofty declaration that money should never form a subject of contention between his Sovereign and himself; to others he demurred only when their enormous amount flagrantly exposed their design, and exceeded all possibility of payment. Against the partiality of the Royal tribunals, resistance was ineffectual; and it then became evident that flight was his only resource. Retiring secretly from the Court, before which he had been summoned at Northampton, he succeeded in reaching the coast in safety; and crossing the Channel to Flanders, proceeded first to visit the King of France, and afterwards the Pope, who was then residing at Sens. By both these Potentates, from different motives, he was received with the utmost distinction: In one case, as an ally who might be useful in the game of Political hostility; in the other, as a devoted champion to the cause of Ecclesiastical supremacy.*

The favourable reception thus accorded to his enemy was calculated to excite the most serious apprehensions in the mind of Henry, who was not ignorant of the rankling jealousy of the French King, and of the facility with which the turbulent and disaffected Vassals, of his Continental States in particular, might be absolved and seduced from their allegiance. But he met the danger with firmness and ability; and while he laboured to conciliate the Pontiff, took the most effectual precautions for defending his dominions, and for preventing the introduction of any Spiritual decrees into England, either from the Pope or the Primate. At the same time, he pursued the latter with unrelenting hostility; confiscated not only the revenues of his See, but the property of his friends; expelled all those attached to him from the Kingdom to share his exile; and even compelled the French Benedictines to refuse him a continued asylum in their Abbey of Pontigny, by the threat of seizing all the rich possessions of their Order in England. But the proud spirit of Becket mounted only the higher under these persecutions; and it may be believed that, brooding in seclusion over his sufferings, his heated imagination was gradually inflamed into fanatical enthusiasm, which really misled him to confound his cause with that of Religion and Heaven. Thus exalted by pride and passion, and emboldened by the Papal support, he proceeded solemnly to excommunicate all his personal enemies, and all who should maintain the Constitutions of Clarendon; he laid the whole of the Ecclesiastical Province of Canterbury, which embraced the greater part of England, under an Interdict; and while his Sovereign alone was still excepted from his anathemas, Henry was admonished that even this forbearance might have its term.†

But the vigour of the King's measures intimidated the English Clergy from observing the Interdict; and the more cautious temper of the Pope prohibited Becket from proceeding to the last extremity. The danger to Henry of a revolt in his Continental States would have been less easily surmounted, if the French King had been a Prince of more skilful and energetic character. But although Louis was not averse from using every weapon to harass so obnoxious a rival, he wanted perseverance and talent to improve the occasion; and after some years of irritating but desultory hostility, Henry

England.
From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Flight of the Archbishop.

His cause supported by the Pope and King of France.

Firmness of Henry.

Renewed hostilities between him and Louis VII. of France.

* Stephan. p. 32—35. Gervas. p. 1396—1398. Wilkins, Leyes Sax. p. 321.

* Stephan. p. 36—46. Gervas. p. 1399—1399. Epistole St. Thom. lib. ii. 5—33, &c.

† Stephan. p. 47—56. Gervas. p. 1399—1403. Ilroeden, p. 496—499. Epist. St. Thom. lib. i. 13—140, ii. 9—17, &c. passim.

History. had the address to lure him into a Peace by the offer of an advantageous Family alliance. By this Treaty, the English Monarch agreed to cede Aquitaine fully to his second son Richard, in order that, espousing a daughter of Louis, the young Prince should hold that great Fief immediately from his father-in-law. Henry flattered Louis still more, by proposing to make him the umpire of his quarrel with Becket; and several conferences were accordingly held upon the subject between the two Monarchs and the exiled Primate. On one of these occasions, Henry, with the appearance at least of great moderation, declared that he would be satisfied if Becket would so behave towards him, as the holiest of the Primate's predecessors had done to the meanest of his. But Becket insolently or prudently evaded a proffer, of which either his pride could ill digest the qualification, or his acuteness foresaw the insecurity.*

Peace of Montmirail. A. D. 1169.

Compromise between Henry and Becket.

At length, however, the meanness of Henry on the one hand, and probably the discovery of Becket on the other, that his protectors, the King of France and the Pope, were becoming equally weary of his quarrel, disposed both parties to an accommodation. But when the articles of a mutual compromise had been adjusted, the reconciliation was still for some time delayed, because Henry objected to afford a pledge of his sincerity by giving the Primate the customary kiss of peace. This he obstinately withheld on the excuse of a vow by which he had rashly bound himself in his anger; and the growth of Becket's distrust was naturally measured by the pertinacity of Henry's refusal. Such conduct in the King has been regarded as an evidence of dissimulation by some Writers, who have overlooked the obvious conclusion that the very avowal of a scruple must defeat any purpose of duplicity: but the circumstance is worthy of remark only as a proof of the importance attached, by the gross superstition of the Age, to a mere quibble of conscience. For, if sincere, Henry was contented to break the spirit, as long as he adhered to the letter of his vow: if otherwise, it was believed that he might more safely break his Moral faith and Kingly honour, than violate an oath of implacable resentment. But this difficulty, like the more material subjects of dispute, was finally waived. It was agreed tacitly to abandon all reference to the original grounds of the quarrel. No recognition of the Constitutions of Clarendon, or other submission, was required from Becket; and the Primate, upon restoration to his Archiepiscopal office and revenues, promised to serve the King with all honour and faithfulness. Upon this compromise, Becket returned to England, and took possession of his See.†

Intemperance of his subsequent conduct.

The first measure of the Primate on his landing is confessed, even by his advocates, to have been rash and intemperate.‡ Henry, according to the practice of that Age, had desired to see his eldest son crowned during his own life-time; and the Archbishop of York having accordingly performed the ceremony, at which it was considered the right of the Primate alone to officiate, the Pope had, at Becket's instigation before the late compromise, issued Decrees of Spiritual censure against the usurping Prelate and his assistants, the Bishops of London and Salisbury. These Instruments having been originally intrusted to Becket, he no sooner arrived in England than he caused them to be publicly served upon the three Prelates. It is stated that he was provoked to this insult by intelligence that the Bishops, who knew that he carried the papers with him, designed to have seized them on his landing: but it is obvious that the use which he made of the Papal censures was a violation of the spirit at least of the recent Treaty. He shortly followed up this act of hostility by another, which still more plainly showed how little he was disposed to bury in oblivion the offences which had been committed against him by his enemies: for, from the pulpit of his Cathedral at Canterbury, he proceeded publicly to excommunicate two of the King's servants, Ranulf and Robert de Broc, for oppressing his Clergy by their master's command before the accommodation. When the first news of these outrageous aggressions reached Henry in Normandy, he resolved to encounter them by some legal proceedings against the Primate: but reiterated complaints from his servants, of the course which the vindictive Prelate continued to pursue, at length provoked the passionate and fatal exclamation, that "of all the cowards who ate his bread, there was none to rid him of a turbulent Priest."*

This inconsiderate burst of fury was interpreted to literally by four Knights of distinguished rank in the Royal Household, William de Tracy, Richard Brito, Hugh de Moreville, and Reginald Fitz-Urse, who immediately binding themselves mutually by oath to avenge the King's quarrel, quitted the Court in Normandy, and repaired to Canterbury. On their arrival in that City, they rudely thrust themselves into the presence of the Primate; and imperiously desired him to retract his late measures. The dauntless spirit of Becket rose with the very imminence of his personal danger; and he scarcely condescended to make any other reply than an indignant rebuke at the intrusion. Contenting themselves for the moment with menaces sufficiently intelligible, the four Knights withdrew; and their intended victim might either have securely guarded his person, or retired again from his See. But he magnanimously spurned every counsel of precaution; rejected the entreaties of his attendants to absent himself from vespers at the Cathedral; and even refused to allow the doors of the Church to be closed. He had scarcely entered the Choir, when the four Knights, with twelve attendants all in complete armour, burst with drawn swords into the Cathedral. To their loud demand, "Where is the traitor? where is the Archbishop?" he calmly replied, "Here am I, the Archbishop, but no traitor." They told him he must instantly absolve the suspended Bishops: he answered that he would not until they offered satisfaction. To one of the Knights, whose patron he had formerly been, he observed, "Thou I have rendered many services: what wouldst thou with me?" The only reply was an attempt to grasp his person as a prisoner: when, in a momentary ebullition of passion at the insult, he seized the assailant by the gorget, and violently threw him off to some distance. Then, as suddenly recovering his self-possession, he exclaimed that he was ready to die in the name of Christ and in defence of his Church; and bowing his head, he unresistingly awaited the repeated blows of his assassins. The first stroke, * Gervas. p. 1408. Epist. St. Thom. lib. ii. 66.

† Stephan. p. 57—69. Gervas. p. 1412. Hoveden, p. 525.
Epist. St. Thom. lib. v. 21. 45, &c.
‡ Gul. Neubrig. lib. ii. p. 23.

* Stephan. p. 70—77. Gervas. p. 1412—1414. Epist. St. Thom. lib. v. 34—73.

His.ory.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

General indignation excited by this crime.

Danger of Henry.

The Pope reconciled by his submission.

already aimed at him, having been partially warded off by the only faithful attendant who had not fled, and whose arm it broke, had wounded him but slightly; but the second brought him to the earth; and the third clave his skull and laid him prostrate at the foot of St. Bene's Altar. His murderers desisted not, until they had literally strewed the pavement with his brains.*

The news of this sacrilegious and shocking tragedy was received with universal execration. Among the Clergy throughout Europe, it excited all the indignation which was due to the fate of a man, who having been the most distinguished champion of their Order, was not unjustly deemed a martyr to their rights. By the superstitious Laity, the scene of its perpetration, and the sacred rank of the sufferer, were regarded as fearful aggravations of a crime, the real atrocity of which, divested of these circumstances, would probably have produced far less sensation. The catastrophe altogether had the effect of incapacitating men's minds for any calm retrospect to the original merits of the quarrel between Henry and the murdered Primate; and the triumph of the Church was completed in the one unmingled feeling of Religious horror, which superseded all differences of opinion on the question of Ecclesiastical encroachments. Henceforth, the King of England, instead of receiving the support of Princes and Nobles who were equally interested with himself in repressing the growth of Ecclesiastical usurpation, might expect to find the strongest sympathies of mankind enlisted against a cause, which his partisans had stained with so foul a murder. Henry was too quick-sighted not to perceive his danger, and too sagacious not to discover the only expedient for averting the storm which threatened to overwhelm him with destruction. He showed—and there appears no reason to doubt his sincerity—the deepest grief at the catastrophe; and immediately dispatched an embassy to the Pope to assert his own innocence of any participation in the deed, and to deprecate the vengeance of the Church against himself for the guilt of his servants. At the same time he confessed and deplored the unintentional encouragement, which he was sensible that his rash ebullition of anger had given to the assassins; and he declared that, on such account only, as a self-imposed penance for the intemperate language which had tended to the fatal result, he would submit to purge himself by oath, of the suspicion of having desired or designed the murder of the Primate.

The Pope, who saw that more was to be gained for the cause of Ecclesiastical supremacy by accepting his apologies than by pushing matters to extremity against him, improved the victory of the Church to the greatest advantage, while he affected to use it with moderation. He therefore contented himself with excommunicating in general terms the murderers of Becket and all their abettors.† He received by his Legates the solemn and public purgation of the King, from whom, as the price of reconciliation, oaths were at the same time extorted; that he would render due obedience to Alexander III. as the true Pope; restore the possessions of the See of Canterbury; abstain from enforcing any customs which had not been introduced before his Reign, or from preventing appeals to the Holy See, in Ecclesiastical affairs; and assume the Cross against the Infidels, if called upon, for three years. Upon these conditions, absolution was finally granted to Henry; and a termination was put to a contest which had disturbed several years of his Reign, and latterly foreboded the most disastrous consequences to his life and fortunes.* The clause by which he might seem to abandon the Constitutions of Clarendon was far too loosely worded to convey any definite meaning; and the King, on his side, was probably, by this time, but too happy to close his struggle with the Church by an accommodation which, if it formally confirmed the Ecclesiastical immunities of preceding Reigns, left him at liberty in detail to contract their extent by disputing their prescription.

While his negotiations with the Papal See were yet pending, and probably as a means of escaping from the embarrassing position in which he was personally placed by remaining in his Continental dominions, Henry had undertaken an enterprise, which was destined to prove the most memorable of his Reign. This was the conquest, or rather an assumption of the paramount Sovereignty, of Ireland. It has been usual to introduce the details of that event by a long reference to the previous condition of the Island: but the early History of the Irish, like that of every People in a similar state of utter barbarism, is obscure and fabulous; their political Annals, if the term may be used, present nothing, so far as the genuineness of such records may be admitted, but a confused series of savage wars and petty revolutions; and the establishment and fate of the Christian Church in the Island, which was very early founded,—the only part of its primitive History which may claim any real interest,—belongs to the Ecclesiastical Division of our subject. It may, therefore, in this place, suffice to say, that the Irish People were evidently of the great Celtic race, with an admixture of colonies of Northmen, who had occupied parts of the sea-coast, and built several places of trade;† that the state of Society among the native Tribes was pastoral, predatory, and warlike; and that they were governed by a number of petty Chieftains, more or less subject to five Kings of as many Provinces: Connaught, Leinster, Ulster, and Tuamond and Desmond, or North and South Munster. But it may be discerned that, amidst the incessant vicissitudes of barbarian strife, a kind of paramount authority over the whole Island was usually conceded to the most powerful of these Provincial Sovereigns; and this supremacy, at the epoch before us, was claimed by the O'Connors, Kings of Connaught.‡

* Stephan. p. 77—85. Gervas. p. 1414—1417. Matt. Paris, p. 86, 87.

† The fate of the assassins of Becket was curious. They had at first fled to the Castle of Knaresborough in Yorkshire, which belonged to Hugh de Moreville, one of their number; but the King, though he abstained from punishing by the secular law the zeal for his service which had fatally prompted them, was compelled, lest he should appear to countenance their crime, to abandon them to the judgment of the Church. To obtain relief from the Papal sentence of excommunication, they then made a penitential journey to Rome, whence the Pope ordered them to proceed, in expiation of their guilt, on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem: where some, or all, of them died and were buried before the Gate of the Temple. Gul. Neubrig. lib. ii. p. 25.

* Gervas. p. 1417—1422. Epist. St. Thom. lib. v. 84, 85, 88, 89. Hoveden. p. 526—529.

† O'Connor, Prolegom. &c. ob init. It is remarkable that the Northmen, who, from the quarter whence they came, were here called Ostmen, or Eastmen, and who at first ravaged Ireland with their insatiable fury, no sooner became comparatively civilized, built towns, and settled permanently on the Coast, than they were attacked in turn and oppressed by the wilder natives. Giraldus Cambrensis, p. 750.

‡ O'Connor, Prolegom. lib. vii. lib. ix. Giraldus, p. 739.

England.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Ireland.

Retrospect
Irish, like that of every People in a similar state of its condition.

History.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Views entertained by the Anglo-Norman Kings for its subjugation.

Both the Conqueror of England and his sons appear to have entertained some projects for the subjugation of Ireland; from which probably they were only diverted by the distractions of their own unquiet Reigns. But Henry II., even from the first year after his accession to the English Crown, had evidently formed more serious intentions of prosecuting the same design: for one of the earliest acts of his Reign was to solicit and obtain from Pope Adrian III. a formal sanction for assuming the Sovereignty of Ireland. It has been disputed whether this suit was in submission to the right already claimed by the Pontiffs to dispose of the temporal Kingdoms of the Earth; or merely intended to propitiate the Papal support by the prospect of extending the Spiritual jurisdiction of the Romish See to an Island, by the Clergy of which the authority of the Popes had been very faintly, if at all, recognised. But it was natural that Adrian should in any case construe the application in the sense most agreeable to the Papal pretensions; and he issued a Bull accordingly, by which he granted the Sovereignty of Ireland to Henry and his heirs.* The King, however, found his Barons, whom he soon after assembled in a great Council to deliberate on the enterprise, averse from its prosecution; † and engaging in other designs on the Continent, he forgot or suspended his first scheme for many years: until, while he was residing in Aquitaine in the height of his dispute with Becket, his ambition was tempted by the appearance at his Court of one of the Irish Princes.

Occasion furnished to Henry for prosecuting their designs.

This was Dermot, King of Leinster, who, in consequence of a feud which he had originally excited by carrying off the wife of O'Ruarc, Chieftain of Leirrim, had, after some changes of fortune, been finally expelled from his dominions by Roderic O'Connor of Connaught, the King-paramount and supporter of O'Ruarc. Dermot, to secure the powerful protection of Henry, now came personally to do homage to him, and upon these terms obtained his consent to levy a force of English adventurers for the recovery of his dominions. With this Royal sanction, he found little difficulty in inducing Richard Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, with two Knights, Robert Fitz-Stephen and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, all three men of broken fortunes, to engage in his service. They successively enlisted and carried over small Bodies of troops to join the exiled Prince, who had secretly preceded them to Ireland; and by the aid of their mailed cavalry and archers, who easily prevailed over the brave but half-armed and undisciplined natives, Dermot was not only restored to his dominions, but gained many victories over his enemies. Wexford, Waterford, and Dublin rapidly fell by storm before the English auxiliaries; and in attempting to expel the invaders, Asculf, the Northman Chieftain of Dublin, the King-paramount O'Connor, and his dependant O'Ruarc, were severally defeated with fatal slaughter. Meanwhile Dermot, who had begun to aspire to the Sovereignty of the whole Island, died in the midst of these conquests; and the Earl of Pembroke, who had espoused his daughter Eva, with the promise of succeeding him, immediately assumed the Royal authority.‡

Jealousy of Henry.

But the fortunate adventurer had soon reason for alarm at the jealousy which was excited by his enterprise in his own Sovereign, with whom he had fallen into disgrace before these transactions. The distrust of Henry was with difficulty appeased by the politic submission of the Earl: who, returning to England to meet the King, assured him that he had effected his conquests only for his liege lord; and immediately surrendering Dublin and the other captured Cities to his disposal, did homage for the rest of his Irish possessions, as a Vassal in chief of the English Crown. Henry, at the moment glad to evade the expected visit of the Papal Legates, hastily assembled a large fleet and numerous land force at Milford Haven: whence embarking for Ireland, with the Earl of Pembroke in his train, he landed at Waterford; marched to Dublin; received the submission of most of the native Princes, who were overawed by the splendour of his Royal progress and the imposing array of his troops; and before his departure, though he added nothing to the conquests of Strongbow, extended his real or nominal supremacy over four out of the five Provinces of the Island.* A few years afterwards, having obtained a Papal Bull authorizing him to erect his conquests into a great Fief of the English Crown in favour of one of his sons, he bestowed it upon the youngest, Prince John; and sent him over to assume the government with the title of Lord of Ireland and a numerous force. But such were the disorders caused by the dissensions of the English adventurers under the feeble rule of the youthful Prince, that his father was compelled within a few months to recall him, and to appoint in his room Hugh de Lacy, a Nobleman of courage and ability, as Lord Deputy:—a title under which the government long continued to be administered by an English officer. But the effective authority of the Lord Deputy did not reach beyond the pale of the English conquests, which, during the Age before us, comprehended little more than the Eastern coast, with a connecting chain of fortresses from Downpatrick to Cork; the intruders were engaged with various fortune in perpetual hostilities against the native Princes; and so obstinate was the resistance of a gallant though uncivilized and divided People,—so slow, notwithstanding the superiority of their enemies in arts and arms, the progress of permanent conquest,—that the total subjugation of Ireland was scarcely effected at the distance of four Centuries from the original settlement.†

The paramount Sovereignty of Ireland, therefore, was long a barren honour of the English Crown. But as an undue importance was at first attached to its acquisition, it conferred a momentary splendour on the Reign in which it was effected, and dazzled the Age with the semblance of a glorious conquest. In this respect, the enterprise was eminently serviceable to Henry. For having thus easily enhanced the fame of his policy and arms, being now freed from the disquietude of his long struggle with Becket, and relieved by his reconciliation with the Papal See from the dangerous consequences which the murder of that Prelate had threatened, he seemed to have attained the summit of fortune and greatness. He had, in fact, become the most successful and powerful Prince in Europe; and as such was equally respected and feared by his contemporaries. But he was destined, among a thousand other examples of Royalty, to prove and to feel the vanity of human grandeur;

* Giraldus, p. 787. Irish Sax. (quod Wilkins) p. 319.

† Chron. Norman. p. 290.

‡ Giraldus, p. 760—775.

* Giraldus, p. 775, 776. Gervas. p. 1420. Guil. Neubrig. lib. ii. p. 26.

† Giraldus, p. 777—807. Howden. p. 322—328.

History. and from the very season at which he had gathered the full harvest of ambition, the declining years of his existence began to be harassed by machinations of foreign hostility, and by the more cruel persecution of filial ingratitude. The natural jealousy with which the preponderance of his vast possessions, and his personal talents and prosperity, were regarded by other Princes, caused an extensive confederacy to be organized against him, with closer concert and greater secrecy than was usual in the loose combinations of that rude state of political society. The French Monarch was the principal mover of the plot; the assistance of the King of Scots, William the Lion, was engaged, partly through alarm at the increasing power of a formidable neighbour, partly by the hope of obtaining Northumbria for his share of the spoil; and the Earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois were tempted by similar views, the first of receiving the County of Kent, and the two latter of dismembering the Continental Provinces of a common enemy.*

ellion of But the confederates relied less on their own united arms, than on their success in dividing the power and breaking the spirit of the English King, by the agency of the unnatural foes whom they stirred up in the bosom of his own family. Whatever political motives had mingled with his parental affection, Henry had deserved the gratitude of his children by the splendid establishments which he had fondly prepared for them even during his own life. Henry Courtmanteau, the eldest, he had caused to be crowned as his successor to the English throne; Richard, the second, he had invested with the great Fief of Aquitaine; and for Geoffrey, the third, he had secured the Duchy of Brittany by betrothing him to his Ward Constance, the heiress of that Province.† The first practices of the French Monarch were tried upon Courtmanteau, as his son-in-law; and the young Prince was easily instigated, first, to demand from his father the complete possession either of Normandy or of England for enabling him to maintain the dignity of his nominal Crown, and on meeting with a refusal, to throw himself into the arms of the confederates. But the bitterest enemy of Henry was his own Queen Eleanor, whose affections he had long alienated by his numerous infidelities;‡ and who had learned to regard him with all the hatred, which the sense of injury could inspire in a passionate and unprincipled woman. She it was, who not only encouraged the rebellion of her eldest son, but induced his two younger brothers, Richard and Geoffrey, then mere boys, to imitate his example, and herself fled from her husband's Court.*

Henry was more heart-stricken by this unnatural combination against him in his own House, than appalled by the formidable array of his foreign and domestic enemies. On his very Vassals he could place no dependence; for they had been seduced from their allegiance by his wife and children. But with the courage and activity which always distinguished him, he immediately by his god levied a great army of the Flemish mercenaries, or Brabançons, and soon made head against all his Continental opponents. The person of Eleanor, by a lucky chance, fell into his hands at the commencement of hostilities; his rebellious children were thus deprived of her evil counsels; and he detained her in captivity, with one short interval, during the remainder of his life. Without any single action of importance, his forces were every where victorious in the Continental war: but in England the confederates had succeeded in throwing the whole Kingdom into confusion; and while malecontent Barons appeared in arms in every quarter upon pretence of supporting the cause of Henry Courtmanteau, that young Prince himself was preparing an invasion from the French ports; and the Scottish King had poured his barbarous forces into the Northern Cantons.†

On the report of these complicated dangers, Henry flew from Normandy to England; and his presence alone sufficed to overawe the rebels and paralyze the designs of the invaders. The first act of the King after landing at Southampton may be received as a striking proof of the degree, to which the strongest minds of that Age were the slaves of a grovelling superstition. Instead of attributing the ingratitude of his children to his own false indulgence and crooked policies, or the hostility of his revengeful Queen to the provocation of his dissolute life; instead of seeking in his own ambition and misconduct for the seeds of all the retributive evil which had fallen upon him; he imagined that the wrath of Heaven had been kindled by an involuntary offence. He believed that his misfortunes were judgments of God against him for the rash exclamation by which he had unconsciously instigated the murderers of Becket. To expiate this guilt, he hastened to make a pilgrimage to the tomb of the Archbishop, whom the Pope had lately canonized; and the greatest Sovereign of Europe, barefooted and in the garb of a penitent, before the shrine of his ancient enemy, after publicly and solemnly appealing to Heaven that he was innocent of having designed the murder of the Saint, implored pardon for his unintentional fault, and submitted his naked back to be scourged by the Monks of Canterbury. At the con-

England.
From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.
Successful resistance of Henry.

His pilgrimage to the shrine
of Becket.
A. D.
1174.

* Gervas. p. 1424. Hoveden, p. 532.

† The Family alliance which the policy of Henry had led him to contract with the King of France, produced no other fruits than dissension and misery: but he concluded a marriage for Maud, one of his daughters, which, though probably less regarded at the time and not unclouded with vicissitudes, was endowed with more auspicious fortune, in commingling the blood of the Plantagenets and Guelfs. To Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony, the chief of the latter House, which was then in the plenitude of its original pride and power, the Princess Maud was married in the year 1165; and, by a singular chance, the Duke, in his subsequent reverses, twice found an asylum in a Country, over which his posterity by Maud, after an interval of above five Centuries of comparative obscurity, were fated to reign with glory and happiness. It is from William, the fourth son of Henry the Lion, whom Maud bore to him during his exile in England, that the present Royal family of Great Britain deduces the right line of its illustrious descent.

‡ The most celebrated among the rivals who are supposed to have provoked the jealousy of Eleanor, was Rosamond, daughter of Lord Clifford, the "Fair Rosamond" of our Romances, by whom the King had two natural sons. But the tale of the deadly revenge of Eleanor, and the tragical fate of her victim, appears to be wholly fabulous; and it may be learned from Hoveden, (p. 712.) that Rosamond died peaceably in the Convent of Godstow, whither she had retired to reside, by the penance of her latter years, the errors of her youth. The King, says the Chronicler, was kind for her sake to the Nuns of Godstow, who buried her in their choir; and he sent them a silken pall to hang over her tomb, as well as costly lamps to illuminate it. But it seems that the Bishop of Lincoln was scandalised by these honours to the memory of one "as frail as beauties;" and obliged the Nuns to exhum her body and cast it into the common cemetery, telling them that the mistress of a King was no better than the mistress of a humbler man: which indeed was true, though the justice of the sentiment will hardly excuse the indecent and uncharitable insult against the mortal remains of the fair penitent, by which it was accompanied.

* Hoveden, p. 536. Neubrig. lib. ii. p. 27.

† Gervas. p. 1424. Hoveden, p. 536—538. Neubrig. lib. ii. p. 28—33.

History.

From
A. D.
1066.

to
A. D.
1159.

Capture of the King of Scots.

Peace of Montlouis.
A. D.
1175.

Henry enjoys a period of tranquility.

clusion of this edifying* scene of Royal degradation, which the Clergy were careful to improve by a Sermon to the congregation assembled in the Cathedral, Henry resumed the more dignified courage and bearing of his natural character, and prepared to encounter every peril with his usual promptness and energy.†

The capture of his dangerous enemy, the King of Scots, who had already commenced his invasion and was surprised by Ralph de Granville, while tilting with a few Knights under the castle of Alhwick, was the first auspicious event which raised the hopes of Henry; and the alleged coincidence! of this success with the late pilgrimage to Canterbury failed not to confirm the superstitious confidence of the English Monarch and his party, that his atonement at the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket had been accepted by Heaven. Perhaps this belief was as serviceable to the King, as the Clergy of Canterbury found it conducive to the reputation of their Saint. For from the same period the forces of his enemies melted away in every direction. The Scotch army on learning the captivity of their Sovereign immediately dispersed; the rebel English Barons laid down their arms and submitted to the Royal clemency; and Henry was enabled to despatch into Normandy the levies which he had collected to repel the threatened descent of his own son from France. The war which was thus diverted anew into his Continental States produced no signal event; and both Louis VII. of France and Henry, as they now found themselves advancing in years, having become sincerely desirous of a pacification, the Peace of Montlouis, of which we have elsewhere related the circumstances,‡ was concluded without difficulty. The King of Scots was the chief sufferer by the war; for he was compelled to purchase his release by the humiliation, not only of renewing in his own person the homage which he had formerly paid to the English Crown, but also of summoning his Vassals to swear fealty to Henry as their lord paramount, and of surrendering several Castles and hostages as pledges of his good faith.||

After this pacification, Henry was at length permitted for some years to enjoy an unusual interval of repose.¶ But as his sons grew up into full manhood, they discovered tempers equally incapable of filial obedience to him, or of fraternal agreement among themselves. Henry, the eldest, was foremost in exciting new family convulsions by an attempt to exact homage for Aquitaine from his next brother, Richard. On the refusal of Richard, Henry, in concert with Geoffrey, the third brother, invaded that Duchy with an army of Brabant; and the efforts of the old King to reconcile his sons being resented as injuries by the two latter, they turned their arms against their father also. It would, however, serve little purpose to trace the alternations of hostility and agreement, by which these disgraceful family feuds were varied. They were only suspended for a time by the premature death of young Henry, the agonized remorse of whose last hours offered but a feeble atonement for the sorrows which his undutiful life had inflicted upon his parent.* Geoffrey did not long survive his elder brother; but his death only produced new contentions: for Richard, now become their apparent to the English Crown, and jealous of his father's affection for John, his only surviving brother, found or feigned several pretences for flying into open rebellion. The chief ostensible cause of dispute was the Princess Adelaïs, daughter of Louis VII. of France; and the same who formerly when a child had been betrothed to Richard, and consigned to the care of his father: but the King, from some jealousy of his son's designs, had ever since kept her immured in one of his Castles, and now refused to allow the nuptials to be concluded.† Richard immediately leagued himself with Philippe Auguste, the successor of Louis VII.; who had for some years filled the throne of France, and who, from the commencement of his Reign, seems to have formed that insidious policy of fomenting the family discords of the Plantagenets, through which he finally succeeded in possessing himself of the greater portion of their ample Continental inheritance. Aided by this young and vigorous Monarch, Richard, at the head of the malecontent Barons of Normandy, experienced little trouble in driving his father before him through that Duchy; and Henry, enfeebled by bodily infirmities, and oppressed by a sense of the weakness of his age, was glad to conclude a Peace on almost any terms with his enemies. His health had long been declining; but his heart was broken by a discovery which he made in the course of his negotiations with Philippe, that his favourite son, John, had basely entered into the conspiracy against him. From that hour he fell into a settled melancholy, which was followed by a mortal fever; and in a few days he breathed his last, deserted by all his family but an illegitimate son, at the Castle of Chinon, near Saumur.‡

pears that no resistance was made by either party to the justice of this award. Rymer, vol. iv. p. 43—50.

* Gervas. p. 1486—1483. Hoveden. p. 620, 621.

† There appears to have been no foundation for the contemporary scandal, which attributed Henry's seduction of Adelaïs to a passion he had himself conceived for her. See p. 64 of this volume.

‡ Gervas. p. 1545. Hoveden. p. 622—654. Gul. Neuburg lib. ii. p. 25. The reign of Henry II. presents a remarkable epoch in the History of English Law, by several changes and improvements which that Monarch introduced or prosecuted in the internal administration of the Kingdom: especially by the regular appointment of Itinerant Justices; the gradual substitution of Trial by Grand Jury for the Wager of Battle; and the commutation of Feudal military service for a scutage or pecuniary payment. But the progress of these important measures may be more appropriately traced in a distinct inquiry into the growth of the Legal and Constitutional Institutions of our Country.

* The reader may find all its particulars related with singular complacency and dramatic skill by the Roman Catholic Historian of England, Dr. Lingard, History of England, vol. ii. p. 398—393.

† Gervas. p. 1427. Hoveden. p. 538, 539. Neuburg. lib. ii. p. 35.

‡ Dr. Lingard rebukes Lord Hailes for denying that the King of Scots' capture took place "on the very morning on which Henry arose repentant and reconciled from the shrine of St. Thomas." It would seem almost an insult to the understanding of the reader to point out the utter futility of the whole question, which turns on the fact of a mere accidental coincidence of dates: but it is amusing to observe the earnestness of the real which is employed in elaborating and maintaining a point of so deep concernment to the honour of a Romish Saint.

§ Vide p. 621 of this volume.

|| Rymer, Fœdero, vol. i. p. 39. Matt. Paris, p. 91.

¶ It was during this period of Henry's reign that Alfonso, King of Castile, and his uncle, Sancho, King of Navarre, paid a high tribute to the reputation for judicial integrity, which the firmness and equity of his domestic administration had obtained for him, by choosing him for their umpire in a destructive contest in which they had long been engaged; and the confidence expressed in his impartiality by the King of Navarre was the more striking, because his rival Alfonso had married a daughter of Henry. Both Princes having agreed to request his judgment between them, swore by their Ambassadors to accept and observe its provisions; and Henry (c. n. 1177) having summoned a solemn Court of his Barons and Prelates, and taken their opinion on the case, pronounced sentence, that the two Kings should mutually restore the lands belonging to each other which they had seized, and that the King of Castile should satisfy his uncle's claims by a pecuniary payment. It ap-

History.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

accession of Richard I.
(Corr. de Jou.)

A. D.

1189.

His Coronation.

Manners of the Jews in England.

On his decease, the Crown of England, with the possession of all his extensive Continental Fiefs, was peaceably assumed by Richard as his eldest surviving son. From the unfeeling and furious disposition which that Prince had already exhibited in his rebellion against his father, his new subjects might draw the most ominous expectations of a tyrannical reign; and they had assuredly full reason to dread the accession of a youthful Monarch of so fiery a temperament, while all his impulses were still unbridled, and his passions unchastened. It was, therefore, not without general satisfaction that men observed, in his first acts after his father's decease, that his nature was not inaccessible to some compunctious emotions. As soon as he saw the lifeless remains of the parent whom he had harassed to the grave, he burst into tears, called himself a parricide, and uttered many bitter self-reproaches. Nor did he fail to give a signal indication, that this was no momentary ebullition of remorse. For, dismissing from his service all the evil advisers who had counselled and encouraged his rebellion, he replaced them by those Ministers who had remained faithful to his father. At the same time, as if to expiate his misconduct to one parent by his honour of the other, he caused his mother Eleanor to be immediately released from durance, and intrusted her with the government of England until his own arrival from Normandy.*

As soon as he had settled with his former ally and future rival, Philippe Auguste of France, the differences between their two Kingdoms which had been recently made the pretext of hostilities against his father, Richard embarked for England, and celebrated his Coronation with a magnificence which has been deemed worthy by the Chroniclers of particular description † The ceremony was, however, disturbed by a transaction so horrid, as strikingly to expose, amidst a display of Religious solemnities and Royal splendour, the revolting superstition and sanguinary barbarism of the times. Some wealthy Jews had the imprudence, despite of a Proclamation forbidding the presence of any of their race at the Coronation, to intrude themselves into the Palace with rich offerings to the new King: apparently hoping to conciliate his favour, and to obtain a renewal of the protection which, in the late Reign, it had been one of the most enlightened and equitable acts of Henry's government to extend to their nation. But they were no sooner perceived in the crowd, than they were driven back with blows and insults: the savage bigotry of the bystanders was kindled by the very sight of unbelievers so hateful; and the popular thirst for their blood being artfully assisted by a wicked rumour, which it was the interest of their numerous debtors to spread, that the King had ordered a massacre of the whole race, this imaginary command was too gladly obeyed. The houses of all the Jews in London were attacked, plundered, and fired, and the unhappy inmates, after a desperate defence, were remorselessly slaughtered or driven into the flames. The cupidity of the mob being once excited, the conflagration and pillage were extended until so many of the rich Christian citizens suffered equally with the Jews, that the King was at length compelled to interpose the Royal authority for the restoration of order: though only three of the ringleaders received condign punishment; and they on the charge, not of the murder of the Jews, but of having fired the houses of Christians. But the cruel persecution of the Jews was not confined to the Capital; and at York in particular, where some hundreds of them had sought refuge in the Castle, a still more appalling tragedy was enacted. For finding themselves unequal to the defence of the place, these devoted people slew their wives and children with their own hands, to prevent them from falling into the power of their merciless enemies, and then finished the work of immolation by stabbing each other. The few trembling survivors who had wanted courage to share the general fate, surrendered to the mercy of their persecutors, only to encounter a more cruel death. The real instigation and object of these cruelties are discoverable in the fact, that the murderers immediately repaired to the Cathedral, and burned all the bonds of Christian debtors which the Jews had there deposited.*

While these dreadful scenes disgraced his Kingdom, Richard was eagerly employed in preparations for embarking in the 11th Crusade, in which he had engaged in concert with the King of France. To regulate the administration of England during his absence, he called a great Council of the Realm; appointed William Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, and his Justiciary, Hugh Pudsey, Bishop of Durham, Co-Regents in his absence; invested his mother with an ample dower; and imprudently bestowed no less than one-third of the lands of the Kingdom on his worthless brother John. Having made these arrangements, and exhausted every tyrannical and unbecoming expedient to accumulate a vast treasure for the wants of his enterprise, he finally sailed from the English shores to join his Royal confederate in France.† But his departure will naturally divert our attention to a new theatre of action; and many of the succeeding events of his chivalrous but disorderly Reign must be related in the continued History of the Crusades.

England.

From
A. D.
1066.
to
A. D.
1189.

Preparations of Richard to join the 11th Crusade.

His departure on that enterprise.

* Matt. Paris, p. 107. Hoveden, p. 655.
† Gervas. p. 1049. Hoveden, p. 658.

* Hoveden, p. 659. Neubrig, lib. iv. p. 7—11.
† Matt. Paris, p. 109. Hoveden, p. 662.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

ANNALS OF FRANCE, GERMANY, AND ITALY, DURING THE XIIIth CENTURY.

History. I. On the death of Richard I. of England, the succession to both his English and Continental dominions was contested between Arthur, son of Geoffroi of Brittany, his third brother, and John Lackland, his fourth brother. Not a doubt could exist that the claim of the former was the more legitimate of the two. But the youth had as yet attained no more than his thirteenth year, while John, in the full vigour of manhood, derived strong support from his active and ambitious mother Eleanor, and advanced a pretended Will of the late King in his favour. By rapid movements, he overran the greater part of Normandy, possessed himself of the treasures of that Duchy deposited in the Castle of Chinon, and was invested with its Crown and Sword at Rouen, by the hands of the Archbishop. Arthur, with his widowed mother Constance, unable to make head against the usurper, sought protection from Philippe Auguste; who first placed his illustrious clients in security at Paris, and then occupied with French garrisons the strongholds of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, which still preserved fidelity to their rightful master.

The King of France immediately notified to John that he by no means considered the Treaty concluded with his deceased brother as binding towards a successor, and he accordingly proceeded to demonstrations of hostility. In an interview between the two Princes held after John's return from his Coronation in London, Philippe assumed and maintained a haughty tone of superiority; but it was soon manifest that in espousing the cause of Arthur, he consulted his own interests more than those of the injured youth. Scarcely had Guillaume des Roches, Seneschal of Anjou, one of the most active of the young Duke's Vassals,* recovered for him the Castle of Balun, before he received instructions from Philippe to raze it to the ground. It was in vain that Des Roches remonstrated against this most inequitable and unexpected order, representing that it was not for the destruction of their own Country, and for the overthrow of its surest defences, that the Bretons had taken arms: and when he too plainly perceived that it was to subjugate the inheritance of Arthur to his own sway, not to restore it to its legitimate Sovereign, that this false friend had assumed his protection, he sought a reconciliation with John; deeming that, in a choice between the two parties who equally coveted his dominions, the young Prince might hope for safety from a near kinsman, rather than from a stranger in blood. On the very day, however, on which Guillaume des Roches presented his illustrious charge to his Uncle, he received certain intimation of a treacherous design upon Arthur's life; and hastily concerting his removal, he once again intrusted the unhappy child to the hollow guardianship of Philippe.

The King of France now claimed for Arthur no more than the restoration of the single Duchy of Brittany; and upon receiving for himself the County of Evreux, he permitted the King of England to enter into possession of the Vexin and the rest of Normandy. A more advantageous clause in this Treaty stipulated that on the marriage of Louis of France, Philippe's eldest son, with Blanche of Castile, daughter of Alphonso VIII. and of Eleanor, sister of the King of England, all the possessions of John in Berri, and twenty thousand marks of silver should be paid as the dower of the Bride. The Infanta, although not yet beyond her fourteenth year, is recognised by the general voice of contemporary writers as preeminent in beauty, in accomplishments, and in intellect; a reputation which will be fully avouched in the course of our succeeding narrative.

This accommodation was perhaps hastened by the continued embroilment of Philippe with the Court of Rome, and the fierce denunciations in which Innocent III. persisted, in order to procure the reinstatement of the divorced Ingeburge in her conjugal rights. France was visited with that most terrific of all Papal weapons, an Interdict; and it was not till after every Religious office and most of the functions of Civil life had been suspended during the greater part of a year, that the Pontiff relented, and receiving assurance that Philippe would attend a Council summoned to meet at Soissons, and there plead his matrimonial Cause against Commissioners from Denmark. The Bull which convoked this Judicial Assembly named the time of its meeting with singular precision, at the expiration of six months, six weeks, six days, and six hours.* On the gathering of this Council a long course of intrigue ensued, alike disgraceful to the Cardinals and to the King; till the latter, piqued at the haughty demeanour and the long delays of the Papal Commissioners, of his own accord, before the Legate could pronounce judgment, declared that he was reconciled with Ingeburge. That ill-fated Princess, however, notwithstanding this formal acknowledgment of her claims, experienced little change in the harshness of her former treatment; and even when her rival, Marie of Meran, was

* Nevertheless Guillaume des Roches afterwards fought under John's banners against Arthur at the siege of Mirabeau, and the cause of his change of sides is unexplained by Historians. Duro, Hist. de Bretagne, liv. iii. tom. i. p. 411.

* Simondsi, Hist. des Français, vi. 195. and the authorities there cited.

History.
From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.
With Crusade.

Fresh outrage by John.

A. D.
1202.
He is summoned before the Peers of France.

Philippe declares War.

Sanguine hopes of Arthur.

removed by death, before the close of the same year, the undisputed Queen of France continued to be little other than a captive.*

When the Preaching of Foulques de Neuilly once again summoned the bravest Knights of Europe to that singular expedition which, as an episode in the relief of the Holy Sepulchre, transferred the Greek Empire to a Latin dynasty, Philippe Auguste had derived sufficient wisdom from his experience in the III^d Crusade to decline association with the numerous warriors whom France poured forth anew to the hazardous enterprise. A war, indeed, nearer home soon engrossed his attention, and on a fresh outrage committed by John of England, the great Feudatories invoked their common Sovereign to punish the delinquency of their brother Vassal. Isabelle d'Angoulême, long betrothed to Hugues le Brun, Comte de la Marche, had been torn from him by the lawless passion of John; and the ravisher having divorced a blameless consort, Alvisia of Gloucester, became the husband of the French Noble's destined Bride.† Philippe temporized in the outset, perhaps from want of sufficient preparation. He held a conference with John at Andely, and afterwards entertained him at Paris with distinguished magnificence, abandoning his own Palace to his guest's use.‡ But no sooner had he ascertained that the English Barons were disaffected from their King; that Anjou, Poitou, Maine, and Touraine still inviolably adhered to Arthur of Brittany; and that the Normans were well inclined to disembarass themselves from the yoke of the usurper, than he threw off the mask, openly admitted the appeal of Hugues le Brun, and summoned John to attend his Court, during the fifteen days which succeeded the Festival of Easter, to perform homage for the Duchy of Aquitaine, and to "render sufficient answers to any charge which the King of France might adduce against him."§ Far from rejecting this summons as offensive to his dignity, John, in obedience to the spirit of Feudalism, promised to attend the Assembly of his Peers; and consented to the forfeiture of two Castles, the keys of Normandy, in case of failure. Whether a sense of kingly pride or of personal danger afterwards deterred him from repairing to Paris, cannot now be ascertained; but upon his non-appearance by himself or by proxy, and upon the refusal of his Governors to surrender the pledged Castles, Philippe invested and forced them, reduced many other strong-holds in Normandy, and again declared himself the protector of Arthur of Brittany.

For a short period the hopes of that young Prince were keenly, and not unreasonably excited. He received Knighthood from the sword of Philippe, was betrothed to his daughter Mary,|| a child in her sixth year, and was invested with the actual possession of Brittany, the entire sovereignty of which had fallen to him by the recent decease of his mother Constance. Poitou, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine were to be his when conquered; and relinquishing the single title of King of England to his Uncle, he assumed that of Duke of Aquitaine. In return, he conceded many new privileges to the King of France in the Provinces for which he acknowledged himself his Vassal, and he wholly abandoned to him whatever portion of Normandy might hereafter be won by his arms. Two hundred Knights of Poitou, headed by the chief Barons of that Province, and a proportionate number of inferior retainers, enabled him to besiege the Castle of Mirabeau, the residence of his grandame Eleanor. Upon her capture much of his ultimate success was thought to depend; for not only was she to be ranked among the most virulent of his enemies, but her stirring spirit had so greatly contributed to the elevation, and her extensive influence still so powerfully assisted in the maintenance of John, that no price, it was supposed, would be deemed too considerable for her ransom if she could once be taken. The little town in which she had fixed her Court was an easy conquest; but the Queen with obstinate and unbroken resolution defended a tower of her Castle till John arrived to her relief. The remainder of Arthur's Tragedy is differently related, and the version most familiar to our ears, as that adopted by Shakspeare, with the exception of a strange mistake as to place, is not without both probability and competent authority in its support. In a surprise by night, as the French Chroniclers relate,* in an open battle by day, as is affirmed by the English,† the young Duke was so completely routed, that not one of his knightly followers escaped captivity or the sword; and the fortresses of Normandy and of England were crowded with illustrious prisoners, many of whom were condemned to perish by the slow agonies of famine. In the dungeons of Corfe Castle alone, two and twenty gentlemen of birth are said to have encountered this barbarous fate.‡ Arthur himself was transferr'd, in the first instance, to Falaise, and afterwards to Rouen; in both which places he was subjected to most rigorous confinement;§ and it is believed that John, unable to prevail upon the Governors|| of either of those strong-holds to leud themselves to a foul act of butchery, repaired by night in a small boat to the foot of the tower in the latter City, in which his nephew was imprisoned, poniarded him with his own hand, and threw his body into the Seine. A report was then diligently circulated that the youth had died of chagrin, or had been drowned in attempting to escape. The deed, be it what it may, perpetrated in darkness, was known only to those by whom it was actually committed, and who, of all others, therefore, were least likely to reveal its attendant circumstances.¶

France
From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.
He besieges the Castle of Mirabeau.

He is taken prisoner, and murdered.

* Philippe, vi. 432, &c. Daru has expressed this opinion. Arthur, he says, (in conformity with Guilelmus Armoricus above,) was taken in his bed by Guillaume des Roches, to whom John had given a promise that he would treat all his prisoners honourably, and dismiss them without ransom: a promise which, it need not be added, he did not scruple to violate. Hist. de Bretagne, lib. iii. tom. i. p. 411.

† Matt. Paris 207. Ed. Wats.

‡ Sismondi, vi. 214. note 2. and the authorities there cited. Annal. de Marg. 13. cited by Lingard.

§ Triplices annulos circa pedes habens. Radulph. Coggeshalie Abbas, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xviii. 96.

|| One of these Governors was Hubert de Burgh, the King's Chamberlain, in the representation of whose conduct Shakspeare has not far deviated from the history as reported by Radulph of Coggeshall. (et sup.) We know not from what cause the great Poet was deceived into laying the scene of Arthur's sad fate at Northampton.

¶ The evidence of John's guilt in the death of Arthur is strongly stated, and acutely, although briefly, examined, to the conviction of the Tyrant, by Daru, Hist. de Bretagne, lib. iii. tom. i. p. 414. note. Matthew Paris has sufficiently expressed the belief which existed in England in his time, about half a century after the transaction. Arthurus subito cunctis modo ferè omnibus ignoto: utinam non ut

* Rigord, ap. Hist. des Gaules, xvii. 53.

† Rog. Hoveden, ad ann.

‡ Matt. Westminster, lib. ii. f. 58.

§ Super his quæ Rex Francorum adveniens cum proponeret sufficenter respondimus. Rigord, 54.

|| Gul. Armoric, Philippe, vi. 260. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xvii.

History. Suspicious of the real fate of the murdered Prince were naturally awakened by his disappearance, and all Europe resounded with cries of pity and of indignation. John meanwhile, whether deriving assurance from the death of his competitor, seeking refuge from the pangs of conscience, or abandoning himself to the reckless impulses of a temper wholly without either forethought or retrospect, devoted all his hours to pleasure and festivity. On his return from England, where for the fourth time he had renewed the ceremonial of his Coronation, he divided his time between Caen and Rouen; and there, intoxicated with the blandishments of his new Bride, and engaged in an unbroken round of sports, of dances, and of banquetings, he forgot or disregarded the tempest which was everywhere gathering round. If a counsellor, more honest, more bold, or more alarmed than his fellows, ventured at any time to remind him of the conquests which hourly fell into the possession of Philippe, a ready answer was on the lips of the infatuated Prince, "Let him take them as he pleases! a single day shall give me back all that he is now seizing." It is scarcely a matter of surprise that this stupid and brutalized apathy was attributed by the ignorance of the times to the hidden virtue of some spell by which the Tyrant's intellects had been dulled and paralyzed.†

The activity of Philippe seemed redoubled in proportion to the King of England's indolent carelessness. After some preliminary minor successes in Poitou, he resolved to profit by symptoms of revolt from John among his Norman Barons, and to direct his chief efforts towards their Province. Upon the possession of the Fortresses which commanded the Seine at Andely, the safety of Normandy had for the most part been considered to depend; and notwithstanding the valour of Roger de Lacy, Constable of Chester, to whom John had committed their defence, they yielded one by one to the conqueror. These sieges, and the numerous combats which occurred during their progress, form a brilliant portion of the Historic Poem, the Philippides; in which William of Breteuil has immortalized the deeds of the King of France his master; and closing our eyes to the machinery and mythology with which that Work abounds, we may learn from it that five months were consumed before the last Castle was stormed; that of one thousand "useless mouths,"‡ children, women, the sick, and the aged, whom the necessity and the obduracy of the beleaguered Commandant excluded from the town of Andely, and whom his enemy forbade from passing the French lines, four hundred perished on the ground between the garrison and the besiegers, after a long exposure to extremity of suffering from famine and houselessness, before Philippe, more merciful than their fellow-citizens, relented, and admitted them to his Camp. The extremities to which want of supplies meantime had reduced the besieged were scarcely less horrible than those which are recorded as having occurred at Jerusalem during her final calamity.

Nor was it in the field only that Philippe was triumphant; by moral courage he gained a yet more difficult victory over Opinion, and, in one instance, defied and defeated the interference of one of the most daring, most energetic, and most successful Pontiffs who have filled the Chair of St. Peter. Innocent III., indignant that England and France should be diverted by mutual hostility from applying their whole strength to the great object of recovering Palestine, despatched two Legates to the Camp of Philippe before he marched upon Andely. By these Envoys, he haughtily enjoined the rival Kings to submit their differences to the adjustment of the Holy See; menacing France with an Interdict, and Philippe personally with yet more severe spiritual vengeance, unless within two months he concluded a definitive Peace, or at the least a Truce for five years, with his English enemy. Philippe contented himself by representing this proud demand to his Barons; and he obtained from them a Declaration which at once surprised and humbled the Pope. Of the Letters Patent which emanated from his great Vassals returned to their Sovereign, that written by Odo III., Duke of Burgundy, may be accepted as a specimen. The following were its contents.

"I, Odo Duke of Burgundy, hereby make known to all persons to whom these present Letters shall come, that I have advised my Sovereign Lord Philippe, the illustrious King of the French, that he should make neither a Peace nor a Truce with the King of England, through the fear or constraint of our Lord the Pope or any of the Cardinals. And if our Lord the Pope should attempt any violence or constraint on that account, I have promised my Lord the King, as my liege Lord, and I have bound myself by all that I hold from him, that I will come to his aid on that point with the whole of my power, and that I will on no account make peace with my Lord the Pope unless with the sanction of my Lord the King; and in order that this purpose may not be annulled, I confirm these present Letters with my seal. Given at Vaudreuil, this month of July 1203."†

Innocent perceived his mistake, and corrected it with address. He wrote anew to Philippe, whom he now styled his "dear son;" he explained that he had recommended Peace, because Peace was a Christian virtue, and it was the duty of a Christian Priest to seek and to ensue it; but that he always intended to qualify his admonition by specially reserving the rights and privileges of the two Monarchs: that in summoning the King of England before his own tribunal, he by no means meditated interference with the prerogative of his temporal Sovereign; but that an investigation of the heinous moral sin with the commission of which John was charged, plainly appertained to the Pontifical jurisdiction.‡

After the reduction of the Castles of Andely, Philippe permitted his troops to enjoy a short repose. John, terrified at the advance of the French, had hastily en-fama refert invida. 208. Matthew of Westminster, who does not express any opinion, uses the same words as to disappearance, rito post evanuit. ii. p. 59. Gulielmus Armoricus ascribes three lines, which are not without pathos, to Arthur, as the last supplication to his ruthless Uncle:

"Patruus, patruus tuus, bone Patruus, patruus nepotis!

"Patruus, patruus tuus, bone Patruus, patruus nepotis!

"Patruus tu generi, fraternus parcius proci!"

Philippides, vi. 556.

* "Sinite illum facere, ego quicquid modo rapit, unda die recuperabo." Matt. Paris, 208

† Id. 209.

‡ Lib. vii.

§ Mendicorum, miserorum, et vulgus tantillo bello. Id. Ibid. 467.

* M. de Siamondi, vi. 224. says, pendant que le Siège d'Andely durait encore, but the fortresses at Andely were not invested till September, and the Duke of Burgundy's Letter, as we shall presently perceive, is dated in July.

† Note as to Gul. Armoricus, 77.

‡ Raynald, Annal. ad ann.

Philip takes the Castles at Andely.

March 6.
A. D.
1204.

From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1214.
Recklessness of John.

Disputed by Philippe.

Letter of the Duke of Burgundy.

Innocent
repplies.

Note of John.

History.

From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.
Capture of Mount St.
Michael.

barked for England; and the surrender of his chief Norman towns, Falaise, Caen, Bayeux, and others, was the immediate consequence of this timorous and ill-judged flight. Mount St. Michael, protected by the sea, which allowed no other approach except a narrow and difficult causeway of rocks to be trodden only at low water, might have offered effectual resistance but for the cowardice generated by superstition. John had recently converted the Monastery which crowned its summit into a Fortress; and the ejected Monks, indignant at their expulsion, loudly inveighed against that impiety which had substituted the weak defences of human art for the miraculous guardianship of their tutelar Archangel. The assailants being allowed to profit by the recess of the tide, gained the foot of the rock and set fire to some scattered buildings around it; and when the spreading flames had enveloped both the Convent and the Fortress, the standard of Philippe floated above the desolate heap.*

Investment of Rouen.

Two hundred and ninety-two years had passed since Rouen first claimed to rank as the Capital of a powerful and independent Duchy, when the victorious army of Philippe Auguste appeared under its ramparts. The spirit which had once animated Rollo and his immediate successors was no doubt long since extinct; but the Rouennois still considered the French as foreigners; the conquest of England by their own Sovereign had increased their feeling of national pride; and the prosperity of their Commerce, the influx of wealth occasioned by the frequent visits of Nobles both from England and Aquitaine, and the splendour derived from the occasional residence of a Court, rendered them jealously distrustful of any encroachment from their neighbours. A double wall, three broad and deep fosses,† and a well-trained Civic militia, encouraged and assisted by several Knights, promised that Rouen would be a difficult conquest; and it was no less the policy of Philippe than of the inhabitants to preserve so large and rich a City from exposure to the injuries certainly consequent upon a siege, and the destruction which might probably result from an assault. Confident of relief within the stipulated period, the Governor therefore signed a Convention, by which the King of France engaged under all circumstances to respect the lives and property of the Citizens, and the garrison undertook to surrender, provided thirty days should elapse without the arrival of aid from England. Their Deputies hastened across the Channel, and represented their necessities to John, who being engaged at Chess on their arrival, angrily reproved the unreasonable interruption. The game terminated to his disadvantage; and his ill humour being greatly increased by the loss, he roughly inquired what they meant by asking his assistance? "I have none to give you, you must do as you please!"‡ Undeceived by this reply, and perceiving that they no longer could hope for support from their present master, the Rouennois opened their gates to Philippe.§ The entire conquest of Normandy was completed before the close of Summer; and

John declines to leave it.

Its surrender.

not content with having thus more than doubled his hereditary dominions, Philippe continued to pursue his success in the districts on the Loire. Almost without a blow, the remaining possessions of the English Monarch crumbled away before the conqueror; and it seemed as if the Princess by whose marriage those rich Provinces had once become the heritage of the Plantagenets was unwilling to survive their loss; for nearly at the moment in which the dominion of England terminated in France, Eleanor of Guienne, successively the Consort of Louis le Jeune and of our own Henry II., breathed her last in the Convent of Beaulieu.

It was probably after thus assuring himself of John's territories by the right of conquest, that Philippe resolved to confirm their appropriation by the formal adjudgment of a Feudal Tribunal; and it may be believed, although contemporary Writers have not given the date with precision, that he selected this season for the renewal of the process against the King of England, for murder, rape, and adultery. John, it has been seen, in the first instance, assented to the summons of the Lord to whom he owed allegiance, but failed to redeem his pledge by appearing at the stated time. He now demanded restitution of the Provinces of which he had been despoiled, and signified his readiness to attend the Court of France whenever he should be provided with a safe-conduct. Philippe replied, that he willingly accorded one, and that his brother might come in peace and security. "But may he go again in like manner?" was the anxious inquiry of the Ambassadors in return. And they heard Philippe's reply with dismay. "Yes, if the judgment of his Peers shall so permit him." "My Lord and King," was the humble remonstrance of Eustache, Bishop of Ely, "the Duke of Normandy cannot appear at your Court unless the King of England appears there also; for they are one and the same person. But the Barons of England, even if their King himself should wish it, will never allow him to run so great a hazard; for you well know that he would expose himself to imprisonment, or perhaps even to death." "And what matters that to me?" was Philippe's conclusion; "The Duke of Normandy, who is my Vassal, has seized the Crown of England by violence; but I have yet to learn, that if a subject acquires honour, his Sovereign on that account is deprived of his right over him; God forbid!" The language of the King of France was by no means conciliatory enough to encourage John to trust himself to his legal decision; and he was content to await his sentence without receiving it in person. When delivered, it justified his utmost apprehensions. The Acts of the Baronial Assembly are not preserved to us; but we are briefly informed that John was declared contumacious in consequence of his non-1199. to

France.

From
A. D.
A. D.
1314.
Death of Queen Eleanor.

John cited a second time before the Peers of France.
A. D.
1205.

He is deprived of his territories.

* "In ut in porum suorum judicium hoc permittat," Matt. Paris, p. 284. Who these Peers were is a veraxa questio among Historians. Voltaire, Sur les Mémoires, ch. 50, has plainly shown who they were not. The reader who seeks further information on this point may consult Brial's learned Disquisition de Origine Pareriarum France et de Institutione Duodecim Parium, prefixed to the XVIIth volume of the Recueil des Hist. des Gaules. Matthew Paris, whose account of the mission of the Bishop of Ely we have followed above, gives John credit for deeper classical knowledge than he is likely to have possessed. He describes as follows the King's reasons for avoiding the French Court. Res enim noluit se committere 'adus casibus et judiciis Francorum qui cum non diligerent, maxime cum timeret ut ei de turpissima morte Arturi obijceretur, juxta illud Horatii quia me vestigia terrent Omnia te advensum spectantia, nulla retrorsum.

* Philippe, viii. 100.

† Ibid. viii. 159.

‡ That John was playing Chess on the receipt of this mission depends only upon the authority of Velly, ii. 196. His marginal reference is to Matthew Paris, who does not mention the Chess, but gives the substance of the King's answer. Quibus Rex Johannes respondit, et per nuncios significavit omnibus, ut nullum ab eo expectarent auxilium, sed facerent singuli quod sibi melius videbatur. 212.

§ Rigord, 67.

History.

From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.
John invades Poi-tou unsuccessfully.

appearance, and disinherited, by the judgment of his Peers, of all his territories in France.*

On the demise of Arthur, his Ducal Crown legally devolved to his sister Eleanor, whom John retained in prison. The Bretons, therefore, conferred the inheritance on Alice, his half-sister, a daughter of Constance by her third husband, Gui de Thouars, a Baron of Poitou; and her claim was recognised by Philippe Auguste. Gui de Thouars, to whom her guardianship was intrusted, would have violated his daughter's rights by usurping the Duchy for himself; but this injustice was prevented by the seasonable appearance of Philippe in arms.† Scarcely, however, had this peril been averted before John landed in Poitou with an English force: his first movements in Philippe's absence were successful; but no sooner was he apprized of the approach of the French King than he retired to the coast; demanded a conference at which he had not courage to attend; and embarked, after concluding a dishonourable Truce for two years, which he was compelled to purchase by the base abandonment of all those continental Vassals who had remained firm in their allegiance to him.

A. D.
1207.
Alliance of John with the Emperor Otho.

The restless and fickle spirit of the English Prince amused itself in the following year by concerting an alliance with his nephew;‡ Otho, the expelled and phantom Emperor of Germany. John was to provide his ally with an annual subsidy of five thousand marcs of silver; and Otho, in return, was to reconquer for the King of England his lost Provinces in France, and to add to them all the other territories of Philippe Auguste, with the exception of the three Cities of Paris, Etampes, and Orleans. On the ratification of this empty Treaty Otho was splendidly entertained in London;§ and the singular change of fortune resulting from the assassination of his successful rival, Philip of Swabia, by which he was soon afterwards restored to his throne, for the first time awakened alarm in the bosom of the King of France as to the consequences of his enmity. Innocent III., in spite of an appeal from Philippe, sanctioned the election of Otho; but he so far assisted France, as to engage that the new Emperor of Germany should maintain Peace on terms dictated by Philippe, provided they were consistent with honour. It was by no means indeed the present wish of Innocent that any other object should interfere with a great Persecution which he had long meditated; and for the full perpetration of the bloody vengeance with which the Heretic Albigenses were now menaced, it was necessary that France, the chief agent in the projected Crusade, should be disembarrassed from all apprehension of foreign War.

A. D.
1208.

Mediation of Innocent
III.

* On the legality of Philippe's proceedings on this occasion, see Mably, Observations sur l'Hist. de France, lib. iii. c. vi.

† Alice was married in 1208 to Pierre le Dreu, a great grandson of Louis le Gros. Philippe Auguste stipulated that the new Duke should perform homage to his Crown; and this transfer of Brittany to a younger branch of the Capetians may be considered the first step to its entire union with France. Gui de Thouars died in the year of his daughter's marriage. Pierre le Dreu abdicated in favour of his son John in 1237, accompanied St. Louis in his Crusade, was wounded and taken prisoner by the King's side at the Battle of Massigny, and died while returning to Europe in 1250. Some notice of this Duke's Poetry, written in the French, not in the Provencal idiom, may be found in the Bibliothèque Française of Goujot, vii. 132, and in Massieu, Hist. de la Poésie Française, 152.

‡ Matilda, consort of Henry the Lion, and mother of Otho, was sister to John.

§ Matt. Westminster, lib. ii. f. 64.

The peculiar doctrines of that Sect, which, under the general name of Albigenses,* had established itself in the Southern districts of France, especially in Provence, may be more conveniently discussed in one of our Chapters expressly dedicated to Ecclesiastical History. It may be sufficient to state in this place, that their free examination and unsparing censure of the corrupt Doctrine and Discipline of the Papacy; their open contempt of the ignorance, the negligence, and the vices of their Clergy; and their denouncement of Rome as a spiritual harlot and as the Apocryphical Babylon; had powerfully awakened the vigilance of Innocent III. not long after his accession. Unlike most of his predecessors, Innocent mounted the Pontifical throne in the full vigour of life; and his bold, active, and comprehensive genius no sooner perceived the great danger with which the Papal authority might be beset if the spirit of Reform manifested in Provence remained unchecked, than he determined upon the application of a remedy which should cauterize the spreading malady to the very roots. His first attention was directed to the Province of Narbonne, into which, so early as the year 1093, with which his Pontificate opened, he despatched a Mission, consisting only of two Cistercian Monks,† but invested with plenary authority from the Holy See, for the discovery and the pursuit of Heresy. From an origin thus slender and simple was destined to arise the insatiate and many-headed Portent of the future Inquisition; the reception of these and subsequent Missionaries was such as tended to increase the alarm, and to stimulate the resentment of the Vatican; and one of the chief and most important Feudatories who provoked its enmity was Raymond VI. Count of Toulouse. That Prince, a grandson of Louis le Gros through his daughter Constance, was married to a daughter of Pedro II., King of Aragon; and the close alliance consequent upon these nuptials rendered the joint influence of the two Courts paramount over Southern France. The toleration which Raymond permitted in his dominions, and his deafness to the remonstrances of the Legate, occasioned his excommunication; and the terms in which Innocent, under his own hand, confirmed that Sentence, plainly evinced the profound impression which he entertained of the offender's guilt. The Pope speaks of Raymond's "detestable abominations;" of "his heart being harder than a stone, and impenetrable to the words of Salvation;" of "his pride, his folly, and his audacity;" and 1199. to

Fam Ira
A. D.
A. D.
1314.
The Albigenses.

Origin of the Legat bus.

Raymond Count of Toulouse Albigens.

A. D.
1207.

* The Albigenses derived their name from the town of Albi in Languedoc, either because it was peculiarly infected with their doctrine, or because they were assiduously in a Council held within its walls. Other genuine names, under which they are occasionally mentioned, are Gabari, Paterini, Cathari, Bonhommes, Henrici, and Pauvres de Lyon. By their enemies they were confounded with almost all Heretics which had at any time rent the unity of the Church; and they may be found stigmatized as Manichæans, Paulicians, Petrobrassians, Henricians, Apostolicals, Politicans, and Publicans. On the Tomb of Alice, Countess of Bigorre, was engraven an Epitaph, in which she is described as the daughter of Guy de Montfort, who died valiantly fighting against the Albigenses; and prefixed to their name was carved, at full length, an epithet, the most revolting to mankind. P. Daniel, Hist. de France, vi. 109. Velly, ii. 205. But the Papists were not even to their distinctions of Heresy; and they frequently comprehended all the adversaries of the usurpation of Rome, whatever might be their variety of doctrine, under the sweeping titles Albigenses and Waldenses. The Vith Chapter of Smead's Literature de Mû contains an admirable abstract of the War against the Albigenses.

† Ramier, Raoul, or Ralph, and Pierre de Castelnau.
‡ The mission of the Spanish Dominic to Provence did not occur till 1208, and he is properly the first Inquisitor.

History.
From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

A. D.
1208.
Assassination of the Legate.

A Crusade unclaimed against the Albigenses.

Submission of Raymond.

In ne-ber, Raymond Roger, arms.

concludes by asking this "most pestilent of mankind," whether, if he disregards the eternal flames, which must ultimately devour him, he is equally fearless of the temporal punishment which he has merited by his crimes?*

The assassination of the Legate Castelnau within a few months after this ebullition of Papal wrath, raised a strong and not an unnatural suspicion against Raymond as author of the crime; in which, nevertheless, although it had been committed by a Gentleman of his Court, he appears in truth to have been nowise implicated. Innocent, however, gladly seized this pretext to expedite his design against the Heretics by an attack upon their chief patron and fosterer. He interdicted Raymond, released his subjects from their allegiance, and proclaimed him to be under the influence of the Devil; and he then summoned the King of France and all other faithful sons of the Church, to march in person to a Holy War for the extermination of Heretics worse than the Saracens, and for the expulsion of Raymond from all his dominions. Indulgences, far more extensive than any yet offered to those Knights who undertook the deliverance of Palestine, were propounded to all who should assist in this new Crusade; and the rewards for embracing it seemed augmented in proportion as the attendant danger, difficulty, and expense were lessened. The Bernardines, headed by Arnaud Amalric, Abbot of Cîteaux, preached a plenary remission of every sin committed from the hour of birth to that of death, for all who should perish in this godly enterprise; and they confirmed this alluring promise by the names of the Pope and of the Apostles Peter and Paul. Although Philippe himself forebore from arming, many of his most powerful Barons took the Cross;† and the three chiefly distinguished among them were Odo, Duke of Burgundy, Hervé, Count of Nevers, and Simon de Montfort, Count of Leicester. The number of fanatics enrolled under the Crusading banner has been variously estimated from fifty thousand to five hundred thousand.

Raymond of Toulouse, alarmed at the gathering of this mighty thundercloud, anxiously sought for reconciliation with the offended Pontiff, and threw himself at the feet of the Abbot of Cîteaux and of the new Legate with whom Arnaud was associated in virtual authority. The cold and unsatisfactory reply afforded by those haughty Ecclesiastics increased the terror and the submission of the humiliated Prince; but it produced a widely different effect upon the more fiery and impetuous spirit of his youthful nephew, Raymond Roger, Viscount of Beziers. He perceived at once that to negotiate was to surrender all power, and boldly and generously adopting the alternative of resistance, he strengthened his garrisons and prepared for a vigorous defence. The only fruit which the Count of Toulouse derived from his weakness was an assurance that he should be absolved, and yet further be received into favour, provided he would consent to make common cause against his heretical subjects, and to surrender seven of his chief Fortresses as a security for his good faith. How far Innocent on his side thought fidelity a necessary ingredient in Diplomacy, may be learned from a despatch which he addressed, about the same time, to the Bishops of Riez and Conserans and to the Abbot of Cîteaux, couched in the following terms:—"We admonish you, after the example of the Apostle Paul, to employ artifice with this Count, which in such a case ought to be called wisdom. Those who have separated from unity must be separately attacked; the Count of Toulouse must be let alone for a time; you must employ with him a wise dissimulation, to the end that the other Heretics may be more easily defeated, and that he himself may be finally crushed when we find him left single."* Well may an eloquent modern Historian observe upon this passage, that on all similar occasions in which Rome sought to veil treachery and ambition by the authority of Scripture, she proved that she had studied the Bible only to make sacrilegious applications from its pages.†

In the following Spring the insane and desolating band of Crusaders commenced its march, its main Body pouring down the valley of the Rhone by Lyon, Valence, Montelimart, and Avignon. The Count of Toulouse, paralyzed with terror, acceded to all the ignominious conditions demanded from him; and after doing penance before the High Altar of the Cathedral of his Capital, with naked shoulders on which he received discipline, and with a halter round his neck, he was permitted, as a token of especial grace, to act as guide to the division which was to attack his nephew. Raymond Roger meantime found ready support from his Vassals, who perceived that the disorderly and undisciplined invaders were resolved on general pillage, utterly careless whether it were torn from a Heretic or from a faithful adherent of Rome. Abandoning the lesser posts which he was hopeless of defending, Raymond Roger divided his forces between Beziers and Carcassone, in the latter of which towns he personally commanded. No sooner had the Crusaders sat down under Beziers, than the garrison, thinking to atone for want of numbers by an unexpected attack, directed a sortie against the enemy, then occupied in tracing their lines. The result, after recovery from the first surprise, was destructive to the assailants; they were repulsed, and the pursuers entering the gates pêle mêle with the fugitives, found themselves in possession of the City before they had even contemplated the fittest means for its attack. "How are we to distinguish the Heretics from the Catholics?" was the inquiry addressed by the Crusading Chiefs to the Abbot of Cîteaux. "Kill them all," was the ever memorable answer of the relentless Fanatic, "God will know his own!"‡

This bloody response was obeyed to the very letter.

* Epist. Inn. III. xi. 232.

† Sismond, Hist. des Français, vi. 278.

‡ "Cordat, morit Dominus qui nunc ejat." Raynaldi, Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 1208. p. 186. Hist. de Langue, (par Val et Vaissette), xxi. 57. p. 169.

This trepene massacre is veiled in courtly terms by William of Breton, and attributed to the indiscretion of the excited soldiery.

*Ingressi urbis utriusque trucidant
Milia his triplicata decem, quas abaque virorum
Majorum asensum, vulgi furor immoderatus,
Et Tololdorum dedit indiscreti morti,
Intruncas mirum cum non credente fidelem,
Nec curans esset quis vili, quis nec dignus.*

Phalyprie, viii. 537.

The Ribaldi mentioned in the above lines were a band which Du Cange describes as celtes, the enfans perdus, or Forlorn hope of the army, always employed on the most desperate services, and therefore for the most part of depraved habits. The word afterwards passed into a term of reproach; as which it has been adopted by our own and other Languages

France.
From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

March of the Crusaders.
A. D.
1209.

Siege of Beziers.

Massacre of all its inhabitants.

* Epistola Innocent III. x. 69.

† This badge was worn on the shoulder by the Crusaders to Palestine, on the bosom by those engaged against the Albigenses.

History. In the Cathedral of St. Nicaise the Ecclesiastics were engaged in the performance of divine service, when their prayers were interrupted by a countless multitude of both sexes seeking refuge from their pursuers. The nave and aisles were speedily choked with corpses, nor was the sword sheathed till it had drained the life-blood of all the unresisting victims. Seven thousand bodies clogged the pavement of the smaller Church of The Magdalene; and when at length every inhabitant of Beziers had ceased to breathe, and every house had been plundered of its valuables, this City of the Dead was fired at once in all its quarters, and reduced to a shapeless heap of ashes. The Abbot of Cîteaux in his Letter to Innocent restricts the number of those who perished in this hideous butchery to fifteen thousand; by other, and it is to be feared more credible authorities, that number has been quadrupled.*

Siege of Carcassone.

The Crusaders pressed on through a Country utterly deserted at their approach, and invested Carcassone on the 1st of August. The transactions during the siege of that City are related with much contradiction by different authors; one fact alone is certain, that its defence was most vigorous, and that the Abbot of Cîteaux began to perceive appearances of discouragement and weariness among his followers. Nevertheless, the only terms which, under the mediation of the King of Aragon, he could be persuaded to offer were that Raymond himself with twelve comrades might quit the City, provided he left the remainder of its garrison and inhabitants to the discretion of the victors. "I would sooner be flayed alive," was the gallant reply, (no empty form of words, as it would be in our own days, for the inhuman punishment of Bertrand de Gourdon was still fresh in remembrance.) "he shall not have in his power the very meanness of my followers, for it is on my account that each of them has exposed himself to danger." But the difficulties of the besieged were hourly increasing, the heats of Summer affected their cisterns, and Raymond heard the fearful announcement that water would soon begin to fail. Confident in the justice of his cause, and relying upon the success of a personal appeal to spirits which he estimated by the standard of his own, and believed to be noble, generous, and faithful, although arrayed in hostility against him, he demanded and received a safe-conduct for himself and a retinue of three hundred Knights, to hold a parley with the Crusaders in their own Camp. The promise of entire security confirmed by the most solemn oaths was shamelessly and unblushingly violated; and scarcely had Raymond and his followers quitted the Legate's tent, in which he had eloquently pleaded his cause before the assembled Generals, when they were treacherously seized and thrown into confinement.

Treacherous capture of Raymond Roger.

Occupation of Carcassone.

It seems doubtful whether the inhabitants of Carcassone found means to evacuate their City after this betrayal of their Prince, or whether they received permission to abandon it by a rigorous capitulation; but in a fortnight after the commencement of its siege, its deserted walls became the prize of the Legate. From the three hundred Knights in Raymond's suite, and from other prisoners less dishonourably captured, he selected a sufficient number to form a blood-offering commensurate, as he thought, with the value of his triumph; fifty of these miserable victims were hanged, four hundred were burned alive.† It remained only to provide the conquered territories with a new Prince, as a successor to the deposed and imprisoned Raymond Roger. The prize of iniquity was honourably declined, not without some expressions of indignation at the great wrong about to be committed, by the Duke of Burgundy, and by the Counts of Nevers and of St. Paul. But a less scrupulous spirit was found in Simon de Montfort, Count of Leicester. That Baron, of ancient lineage, sprung, as is believed from a Bastard of King Robert, and inheriting the Pief of Leicester from his mother, an Englishwoman,‡ had greatly distinguished himself in Palestine during the 1Vth Crusade, from which he had but lately returned. Fearless, enterprising, and ambitious, stern, cruel, perfidious, austere, and inexorable, this gloomy zealot exhibited qualities well calculated for an instrument of Persecution; and under his sway Innocent might be sanguine in the belief that Heresy would be utterly extirpated. His first acts after investiture with his sovereignty must have strengthened these hopes. He imposed on his subjects a heavy annual tax payable to Rome, and he manifested no less carelessness of human life in doubtful cases of Heresy, than had been displayed by the Abbot of Cîteaux at the storming of Beziers. Two Heretics of different persuasions were brought before him, and each alike was condemned to the stake. One of them, overcome by the terror of death, recanted; and petitions for mercy were earnestly advanced in his favour. "If he be sincere in his abjuration," was the logical judgment passed by De Montfort upon this appeal, "his punishment will doubtless expiate his former sin. If he be insincere, he will justly suffer for his present imposture."§ Thus far we may reasonably believe the narrative; the sequel, doubtless, is a Legend supplied by Monkish ingenuity, as a stimulus to Conversion. The two Heretics were committed to the burning pile. The one who was inflexible was reduced to ashes in a moment; but we are assured that Heaven, the protector of innocence, would not permit the destruction of the other whose heart had been touched by a right spirit. His bonds fell asunder, like those of the three youths in the furnace of the Babylonian Tyrant, and like them he came forth unharmed from the midst of the devouring element, without a hair of his head being singed, or even the smell of fire having passed on him.¶

So long as the dethroned Prince yet lived, De Montfort's

* Epist. Innocent III. xii. 108. Sismond's refers to Bernard Iter des Limoges, a contemporary, for thirty-eight thousand as the number massacred, and to Alberic, a Monk of Trois-Fontaines, for sixty thousand. He remarks, also, that it is admitted on all hands that not a soul survived within Beziers, that its ordinary population may be computed at fifteen thousand, and that as the Crusaders advanced, it had been the general refuge of fugitives from all the surrounding Country. In the printed text of Gul. Arn. the number stands septendecim milia et amplius, but the margin states from a MS. secentingia. (93.)

† The archer who mortally wounded Richard Cœur de Lion, and who, in spite of that gallant Monarch's pardon, was afterwards flayed alive by Marchsades.

• The mode of the occupation of Carcassone is disputed, but in the cruelties consequent upon it, there is, unhappily, for the most part, a very general agreement. See Sismond's, Hist. des Français, vi. 294. and the authorities there cited.

† Amicia de Beaumont, sister and heiress of Robert, Count of Leicester; her second husband was William de Barres, one of the most distinguished Knights in the Court of Philippe Auguste.

‡ Quid plura? aliquem Coma quod condurroritur hic salutaris, quod in nunc convictrator ignis eust ei pro expiatione peccatorum, a vero fecti loqueretur recipiet pro perfidia solacium. Petri Vallium Cernasi Monachi, Hist. Alb. c. 22. ap. Duchesne, v. 372. § Id. Ib.

History.

From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

He poison Raymond Roger.
Nov. 10.

Philippe Auguste
meditates an invasion of England.

April 8.
A. D.
1213.

in mean ance with Miramolin.

tenure was insecure. Pity for a brave, suffering, and injured Knight had succeeded hostility in the bosoms of most of those by whose swords he had been overthrown; by his neighbours he was greatly beloved, by his subjects he was universally regretted, and the iron yoke under which they had passed hourly increased their desire to return to his more lenient rule. The King of Aragon moreover might at some time arise as the protector of his Vassal and kinsman. The secrets of the dungeon of an imprisoned Sovereign are revealed to few witnesses, and it was reported in De Montfort's Court that a dysentery had terminated the days of Raymond Roger.^{*} The public voice assigned his death to another and a less natural cause, and even Innocent III. admitted that he had perished violently.

For a while we must turn away from this most painful story to follow the steps of Philippe Auguste, who, happily for his own fame, did not personally share in the Crusade. In consequence of the mediation of Rome, the three years which succeeded the accession of Otho IV. to the throne of Germany were passed without any open hostility between that Country and France; but secret enmity against Philippe Auguste continued to be harboured in the breasts both of the German Emperor and of his Uncle of England; and there could be little doubt that whenever they felt sufficient strength they would profit by the first opportunity to gratify their resentment. When John encountered the full wrath of the Vatican, by disputing the appointment of Stephen Langton, whom Innocent had named as Metropolitan, Philippe was not backward in seconding the anger of the Pontiff. It appeared easy to sanctify ambition by the pretext of a higher motive, and to secure the conquest of England while he affected to support the cause of offended Religion, by directing his arms against an interdicted Kingdom and an excommunicated Prince. When the proposition was first opened in an Assembly of the chief Barons at Soissons, it was received with eagerness, and preparations for the enterprise were commenced with unprecedented vigour. One of the most formidable armies ever gathered in France was concentrated on the shores of the Channel; the mouth of the Seine was choked with transports; the almost incredible number of one thousand seven hundred vessels are said to have been equipped for the expedition; and the money actually expended on the armament amounted to sixty thousand pounds of silver.

The fears of John meantime were reasonably awakened. Despised by his Nobility, proscribed by his Clergy, hated by his People, already cowering under the spiritual weapons of Rome, and now menaced by the sword of France, he looked around him, but in vain, for succour; and he is said in his extremity to have proffered homage to Mohammed al Nassir, the Moorish Emir al Moumenim, or Miramolin, as he is more commonly called, and to have promised that he would avow himself a follower of the Prophet, and pay an annual tribute, if the African Emperor would accord his alliance.[†] The proposal was haughtily rejected, perhaps from a doubt of its sincerity, and the King in his despair resolved upon submission to Rome. The Legate Pandolfo had deprived him of his last hope, by exhibiting indisputable proofs that the Barons, who had obeyed his summons and were now gathered under his standard at Dover, had leagued almost to a man with Philippe, and only awaited his landing to pass over to his ranks. The consequence of this fearful intimation was the well-known surrender of the Crown of England to the Pope as its Feudal Sovereign, under condition that the humbled Vassal should receive the guarantee of full protection from his Lord.

Satisfied with this large addition to both his power and his dignity, Innocent on the instant professed that he was reconciled with England. The Interdict was removed, and Pandolfo was instructed to signify to the King of France not only that John was under the immediate guardianship of the Holy See, but that any one who took up arms against the Vassal of the Pontiff would encounter the penalty of excommunication. The first emotions of the King of France when he found himself thus deceived by Rome, were those of unbounded indignation; and it is not improbable that in spite of the menaces of Innocent, he might have pursued his enterprise, if the Legate had not skillfully diverted his thoughts into another channel, and pointed to an object against which his mighty armament might be directed, with scarcely less hope of gain than even if it were still permitted to make an attempt on England.

The Province of Flanders, by its unrivalled commercial industry, and its consequent superior wealth, had already become the admiration and the envy of every neighbouring State. From its manufactures the whole North of Europe was supplied with clothing; and the extent of its marine and the skill of its navigators rendered its magazines the great emporium, as its ships were, named Paul, whom he approved in every thing, but in his desertion of the Faith in which he had been born; and that he thought in like manner of John, qui relictis piissimis et mundissimis Lege Christiana, ceteris et instabilibus gliscit transcurrere. He then inquired much concerning the climate, soil, productions, wealth, and power of England, and also of John's personal qualities; and the audience concluded in the following very striking manner. Colligens ergo omnia iniquitatem et responsum nunciorum, post parvum silentium, factis subauditione in signum magnæ indignationis, eprent ille. Admiratus Regem Johannem, dicens, "Nullius est Rex ille, et Regulus jam desponsus et senescens, nec cura de eo, indignus est mihi confiderari. Non redraus iterum ad meam præsentiam, nec vident oculi vestri amplius faciem vestram. Fama ad potius usum Domini vestri, jam Apostata desipiens, factorem exhalat in conspectu meo teterrimum." The remainder of the narrative is truly Oriental. As the Euxys withdrew, the Miramolin especially regarded one of them, Robert of London, a Priest, whose person was indeed somewhat distinguishable, parvus erat et niger, unum brachium longius habens reliquo, et digitis inordinatis, scilicet duos nudi coherentes, et faciem Judaicam. Convinced that such a Portent of a man would not have been selected as Ambassador unless his deformity had been counterbalanced by extraordinary wisdom, the Miramolin detained him, and learned from a confidential conversation many facts which convinced him of John's folly and iniquity.

Strange to say, notwithstanding the particularity with which Matt. Paris relates this transaction, (the details of which he received from the mouth of Robert of London himself,) it has been rejected or passed by in silence by almost all modern Historians. But there is nothing in the facts alien from the unprincipled character of John. Dr. Lingard, indeed, admits its probability; but it is manifest that he speaks only at secondhand, and that he has never read Matt. Paris; for he states that the Miramolin dismissed the Ambassadors with "general, unmeaning expressions of amity." (Hist. of Eng. ii. 230.) To our ears the expressions are very particular, very pregnant with meaning, and any thing but amicable. "Quit my presence, and never see my face again; your master is a senseless apostate, whose infamy stinks in my nostrils!" Very amicable indeed!

4 U

France.

From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314. and submits to Rome.

Innocent
III. forbids the invasion of England.

Commercial prosperity of Flanders.

* Non post multum dysenteridi expiravit, unde multi multa mendacia divulgant quod fuisse verò interfectus. Gul. de Podio, Lauerentii, c. 14. ap. Duchesne, v. p. 674. Epist. Innocent III. xv. 212. referred to in the Hist. de Langueo, xxi. 75. p. 183.

† Henaull, Abr. Chr. de l'Hist. de France, i. 236.

1 Matt. Paris, 243. The account is very precise and detailed. The Miramolin, Admiratus Miramolinus, Rex magnus Africa, Marocchie et Hispanie quem vulgus Miramolinum vocant, replied to these offers that he had read the Works of a wise Greek and a Chris-

History.

From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

Causes of quarrel with Count Fer-rand.

were the chief carriers of almost the entire World. The pillage of such a Country as this was an alluring bait to the cupidity of the French Nobles; and their pride would be scarcely less gratified than their avarice, by the punishment of a rabble of merchants, who affected a growing independence upon Fendal usages and government, and who, elated by a rapid accumulation of wealth, dared insolently to mate themselves with the high-born Members of an ancient and haughty Aristocracy. A cause for quarrel was readily at hand. The inheritance of the County of Flanders had passed by marriage to Ferrand or Ferdinand of Portugal, when, in 1211, he received the hand of Jeanne, daughter of that Baldwin IX. whom a singular caprice of Fortune in the IVth Crusade had elevated to the short-lived and perilous dignity of Emperor of Constantinople. These nuptials were contracted without the consent of the Flemish States, and during the misunderstanding which ensued, Louis, the son of Philippe Auguste, forcibly possessed himself of the towns of St. Omer and Aire, to which he asserted a claim in right of his mother. Ferrand, justly irritated at this usurpation, refused attendance with the other Vassals of France in their Assembly at Soissons, unless his Cities were restored; and on a subsequent visit to the French Court, he protested against the intended War with England as unjust, and declined participation in it out of respect to a former alliance with John. Little more than the artful suggestion of Pandolfo was wanting to determine Philippe upon advancing this act of disobedience as a plea for the invasion of the Count's rich and flourishing territory. He ordered Ferrand to quit his Court at the instant, and swore fervently by all the Saints, that thenceforward either France should become Flanders, or Flanders France.*

Invasion of Flanders.

The fleet destined against England received immediate orders to proceed to the reduction of Gravelines and Dam,† while Philippe, at the head of his troops, captured and pillaged Cassel, Ypres, and Bruges. Afterwards, during the investment of Gand, the King received intelligence that the victorious division of his army which garrisoned Dam was already in turn exposed to siege by Count Ferrand; that half of his fleet had been captured by the English, and that the remaining half was strictly blockaded in the port of the beleaguered town. By a forced march, he succeeded in relieving the garrison and compelling Ferrand to withdraw; but the extrication of the fleet was hopeless; and in order to prevent it from becoming a prey to the English, he was reduced to the desperate necessity of burning it with his own hands;‡ a loss and a disgrace which was ill compensated by the savage committal of Dam to a similar destruction. The remainder of the campaign was signalized by cruel and wanton revenge. Gand purchased immunity at an exorbitant ransom; Oudenarde, Courtrai, Douai, and Lille, opened their gates at the first summons; and upon intelligence that Count Ferrand was hastening to the reconquest of the last-named City, its walls and citadel were razed to the ground, the town itself was fired, and the miserable inhabitants who attempted escape from the conflagration were either put

Philippe is compelled to burn his fleet.

to the sword on the spot, or sold as slaves. Leaving a fearful memorial of his severity in the unhappy Country which he had invaded, Philippe then returned upon the Seine, and disbanded his army.

During this sanguinary expedition, France herself was afflicted with a domestic calamity unique in the History of the World; and generated no doubt by that wild and restless fanaticism which had been long busied in preaching Crusades against the Infidels in Spain and Palestine, or the Heretical Albigenes. False miracles and prophecies forced from their purpose had been lavishly pressed into the service of the Missionaries who exhorted Europe to these enterprises; and, in France especially, the excitement offered to the imagination of a People readily kindled, was most unbounded and extravagant. The result was of a nature in every way so remarkable, that in narrating it we shall not venture to deviate from the very words of the Chronicler by whom it is most fully recorded. "In the following Summer," as Matthew Paris informs us, "an error unheard of in any former Age arose in France. A certain boy, who was indeed a boy in years, but most accomplished in wickedness, at the instigation of the Enemy of the human race, wandered through the towns and fortified places in France, as if commissioned by God, every where chanting in the French Tongue, 'Lord Jesus Christ! restore in thy Holy Cross' with many other invocations added to those words. Having been seen and heard by many other boys of his own age, he was followed by them in countless numbers utterly demerited by diabolical influence, deserting their fathers and mothers, their friends and nurses, and swelling the chant which was given on by their Precursor. Marvellous is it to relate that neither the restraint nor the persuasion of their parents could check their course; but they went on following their leaders towards the Mediterranean, advancing as a procession or an army, continually singing, and in numbers so great that no town could hold them. Their Chief rode in a car tapestried with cloaks and sentinelled by an armed Body-guard; and so dense was the throng that many were trodden under foot by mutual pressure; and happy did he esteem himself who could save but a shred of his tattered clothes. But in the end, through the machinations of that old deceiver Satan, they all perished either by land or by sea."*

The resentment awakened in the Flemish by their recent sufferings, and by the disaffection from their new master, which John well knew existed in his own lost Provinces in France, soon enabled him to construct a formidable league against Philippe Auguste. When the King of England landed at La Rochelle, the whole Nobility of Poitou flocked to his standard; and at the same moment the Barons of the Low Countries appeared in arms, deriving confidence from the presence of the Emperor Otto. Against the latter, Philippe determined to make head in person, while he intrusted the conduct of the campaign on the Loire to his son Prince Louis. John was in the first instance successful,

* Matt. Paris, p. 238.

† A town which William of Brittany describes in a single emphatic line, Quo valde speciosus erat Dam nomine vicus.

He afterwards proceeds, however, at greater length, and in less bold Latin, to notice its extraordinary commercial prosperity. Philippus, ix. 387. &c.

Guil. Armorici, 89.

* Matt. Paris, 242. The anonymous continuator of Roger Hoveden's Annals, notices this transaction very briefly, adding that the number of boys was said at Paris to amount to fifteen thousand, of whom not one exceeded twelve years of age. Ap. Hist. des Gaules, xlii. 167. The Writer of the life of Innocent III. (Re MS. Bernard Guidonis. ep. Muratori, Script. Ital. iii. 482.) says there were more than ninety thousand naughty boys, who came back empty. Scdm autem auct. (1210) proxi pueri ultra sex milia nunquam recipi Crucis-gigantem, et Moysiolum atque Brandarium decessit opusculis venientes inanes redeunt.

France.
From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

History.
From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.
John's first successes, and ultimate retreat.

Campaign in Flanders.

Battle of Bouvines.

for no adversary opposed him in the field. No sooner, however, did Louis advance, than the King of England, with his customary fickleness and timidity, avoided battle, and retired towards the coast. The French Prince also, deceived by the report of his spies, who greatly exaggerated the numbers of his opponent, hesitated as he approached the English camp; and during a few hours the two armies, which had never yet been in sight of each other's ranks, were in full retreat on opposite quarters. Louis was the first who received correct intelligence, and hastening to retrieve his mistake, he resumed his advance, pressed with a harassing pursuit upon the fugitives, recovered all the towns which John had captured, and terminated the campaign before the arrival of Midsummer, with the full fruits of victory gathered without the hazard of a single battle.

The operations in Flanders were concluded before those in Flanders commenced; and in Otho, Philippe was destined to find a much more formidable opponent than his son had encountered in John. The Emperor indeed now retained little of the Imperial possessions beyond his title; for the House of Hohenstauffen was again dominant in the person of Frederick II., who two years before had received the Crown of Germany at Aix la Chapelle. Nevertheless, the acknowledged bravery of Otho, the high military talent which he had often exhibited, and the prestige even of his nominal sceptre, raised him to the chief command. Notwithstanding his contingent to the Flemish confederacy did not exceed a small corps of Brunswickers, the army was styled Imperial; and the standard of Otho, a golden Eagle hovering over a Dragon,* was mounted on a Carroccio, and sentinelled by a battalion which formed the vanguard.

Philippe Auguste entered Flanders towards the close of July, and, to use the forcible expression of his contemporary Historian, (from whose most lively description of the great subsequent events we are about to borrow most copiously,) during the course of a whole month "he laid it waste right royally, carrying fire and sword to the right hand and to the left."† Satiated with this unopposed pillage, he was preparing to return to France; when on the 27th of August, while on his march towards Lille, he was attacked by Otho near a bridge at Bouvines,‡ which traverses a small stream flowing into the Lys. The Flemish had expected to surprise their enemy; and Philippe, fatigued by the weight of his armour and the heat of marching, was reposing under the shade of a beech tree, when it was announced to him that his rear was attacked, and was in imminent peril. Rising in haste, he entered a little chapel hard by, offered a soldier's prayer, buckled on his armour, and sprang upon his horse with a countenance "as glad-some as if he were about to attend a marriage festival." At the trumpet-notes and the cries of "to arms to arms," the French vanguard, which had already passed the bridge, returned to the main body; but the Oriflamme was so far in advance that it was deemed imprudent to wait for it; and Philippe, hastening to the front of his troops, threw his marching columns into line with precision so admirable, and judgment of ground so accurate, that he at once obtained the advantage of wind, dust, and Sun, which last shone with unusual splendour full in his adversaries' faces.* The numbers on each side were nearly equal.† The chivalry of France gathered round their King, who, after a few words of encouragement, raised his hands to heaven and gave the blessing which his soldiers clamorously demanded. Behind him stood his Chaplain, William of Brittany, (nearly in whose words we are relating these most dramatic particulars,) accompanied by another Priest, and both of them sang Psalms during the whole combat, notwithstanding their voices were often impeded by sobs and tears.‡ The Count of Flanders, after more than three hours' engagement and the receipt of numerous wounds, was unhorsed and made prisoner; but meantime the King of France, left nearly alone by the ardour of his Knights, who had pressed on to the charge, was placed in extreme danger by the German infantry. Overpowering the small guard which still encircled Philippe, the roulers pulled him from his horse with the short hooks attached to their halberds,§ and but for the excellence of his armour, and the fidelity and personal devotion of his few nearest followers, he must inevitably have been killed. His standard bearer waved his banner to the rescue; Pierre Tristan (the name deserves remembrance) leaped from his saddle, and covered his master's body with his own,|| till the King regained his feet and sprang once more on horseback. Otho, on the other hand, was exposed to not less peril. Charging blindly into the centre of the French ranks,¶ he found himself between two Knights,

* The order of battle is attributed by William of Brittany, both in his Chronicle and also in his Philippica, (xi. 658) to the great military skill of Guerin, a Knight Hospitaller and Bishop-elect of Senlis. The instructions which he issued when marshalling his bravest men in one long single line, are eminently characteristic. "Non decet ut unus miles acutum, ubi de alio multo faciat: ut sit stictus ut omnes quasi una fronte paratos pugnant." De Gest. Sic. 96.

† M. de Sismondi, after remarking upon the difficulty of calculation, conjectures, upon probable grounds, that neither army exceeded more than fifteen thousand, or at the utmost twenty thousand men, of which about eight hundred were Knights, twelve hundred mounted esquires, two or three thousand regularly trained infantry, and the remainder Civic militia. vi. 357. Velly, ii. 227. Assigns nearly two hundred thousand men to Otho, and somewhat more than fifty thousand to Philippe Auguste.

‡ The Psalms which they sang were the 143d, the 67th, and the 20th, prout poterant, propter irruptiones lacrymarum et singultus immixtos.

§ Uncinis et lanceis crucifibus. Gul. Arm. or as they are more fully described in his Poem,

*Mox hostes hastis manus configit in illos,
Quorum cusps erat longa, et suboles inter acuta;
Et nonnulla velut verubus dentata recurva,
Cuspibus in medio vinctis emittis acuta.*

Philippica, xi. 261.

His Chronicle mentions also a particular kind of weapon with which the Flemings were armed on that day, and which, so far as we understand its construction, must have been eminently formidable. Habebat enim quodam genere armorum utentibus admirabili et hostem inaudito; habebant enim cultellos longos, graciles, truncumque (trialumina) quoslibet occurrente secantes, a cuspe usque ad manubrium, quibus utebantur pro gladiis. Lord Edward Fitzgerald was said to have been armed at the time of his capture with a three-bladed dagger resembling that described above.

¶ Il del son misto principalmente il suo Signore de la Maison d'Estamp, et se fut cet évenement qui vult à l'illustrer race de ce Brave l'honneur de porter les armes de France. L'Art. de l'Écrit. des Ducs, i. 581.

¶ Otho and the Count of Flanders had sworn to each other that, neglecting every other object in the field, they would charge onward till they came to the person of the King of France, whom they

* This was the bearing of the House of Saxony. Arripens signum quod apud Saxones habebatur sacrum, fovea signis draconis et dracem equale volantes insignem effigie, quo uterentur fortissimè aliqui principes, et ceteros eorum effugiam, nota corpora animi condonem decorosa. Witekind, Herc. Sax. i. The allegories of Heraldry are not always very transparent.

† Omnia a dextera et sinist. succedens devastando et regulariter depredando. Gul. Armoricus, 94.

‡ A little village on the river Marque, between Lille and Tournay.

History.
From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

one of whom seized the bridle of his horse, while the other aimed a blow at his breast with a dagger. The steel was turned aside by the impenetrability of his cuirass, and when raised a second time to repeat the stroke, it plunged into the eye of the Emperor's horse rearing with affright. The animal, mortally wounded, and ungovernable from pain, sprang round and galloped furiously with its master from the field, till it fell dead from exhaustion. Philippe, who watched the whole occurrence and saw his enemy thus run away with, turned to the Knights close at hand, and pointing to Otho's course, remarked, "You will see his face no more to-day!"⁸ By that time all was lost, and Otho, perceiving his inability to retrieve the fortune of the battle, mounted a second horse and resumed his flight. One more ineffectual charge, however, was attempted, chiefly by the Brunswickers; in spite of the most desperate valour, they were borne down by numbers, and for the most part were made prisoners; and about seven hundred Flemish infantry who still maintained their line were to a man put to the sword. The Carroccio and the Imperial standard were among the Conqueror's booty; the car itself was destroyed, the dragon broken in pieces, and the eagle mutilated of its wings; but Philippe, unwilling to hazard the loss of any of the important prisoners whom he had already captured, and deterred by want of acquaintance with the Country, as night approached, forbade pursuit; and hastily recalled the squadrons which had advanced scarcely a mile from the field.

Of the numbers slain in this great battle it is not possible that we should speak with more precision than of those which were engaged; but the list of captives evinces with sufficient certainty the importance of the victory. Five Counts, Ferdinand of Flanders, Renaud of Boulogne, Otho of Teklemburg, Conrad of Dortmund, and William of Salisbury,[†] (who commanded an English detachment,) twenty-five Bannerets,[‡] and an almost countless band of Gentlemen, were either released after the payment of ransom, or distributed in various prisons. Among the latter and less fortunate, was the Count of Flanders; who, after having been unfeelingly exposed to the gaze of the populace, in a sort of open litter which accompanied the triumphal return of Philippe to his Capital,§ languished during many years of

Triumphal entrance of Philippe
into Paris.

would at once put to the sword. Ea videlicet intentione, quia in Rex (quod Deus avertat!) occisus fuisset de rebus exercitu facillime posse triumphare sperabant. Gul. Arn. 98.

* "Hodie non videlicet amplius faciem sparis." Id. Ibid.

† William Longword, Earl of Salisbury, son of Henry II. by Rosamond Clifford.

"Regis et Anglorum frater, Saleberia cuius Se gaudet ditare regi." Philippe, x. 431.

The English archers distinguished themselves greatly in this battle. Oudgerst, Chronique de Flandre, ch. 103. fol. 173.

‡ Banneret was the highest title in Chivalry, and could be obtained only by those who were sufficiently noble in lineage to blazon four quarters, and sufficiently rich to levy and maintain at their own expense fifty men at arms. A Gentleman who aspired to the honour presented to the King, either at a Tournament or on the field of battle, his pennon furled. The King unfurled it, cut it into a square banner, and returned it saying, Vere cy votre bannière, Dieu vous en laisse votre preu faire! One distinction of Bannerets was permission to have a cry of armes raised by their followers. Joinville par Du Cange, Dux ix.

§ The description which William of Britany gives of the popular joy occasioned by the victory of Bouvines is most vivid. Quis autem verba exprobrat, quis corde cogitare, quis calamo, charit aut tabula exarare possit gratulabundus plauus, hymnus triumphales, innumera tripulorum genera populorum, mellificos clericorum can-

captivity in a Tower of the Louvre, in consequence of want of affection on the part of his Consort Jeanne, who refused to advance the sum demanded for his freedom. Ferrand, it appears, had been misled by an arduous response which, William of Britany assures us, the Countess of Flanders (Ferrand's maternal Aunt and daughter of the King of Portugal) had obtained by forbidden arts from some evil Angels. They announced to her, with that ambiguity of which History records so many instances, "They shall fight, and in the battle the King shall be thrown forcibly to the ground, and shall be trodden under foot by horses, and shall lack burial. After the victory Ferrand shall be received in Paris with exceeding great pomp." The juggling fiend, it will be seen, equivocated and lied like truth.*

During these events in its Eastern Provinces, the South of France had been not less disturbed by a continuation of internal struggles. Simon de Montfort was not likely to rest content with the narrow domain of Beziers and Carcassonne while the more splendid prize of Toulouse invited his grasp; and accordingly, having temporized till he felt sufficiently confirmed in his new possessions, he in the end threw off the masque, obtained an Interdict against Raymond, and used it as a pretext for open hostility. That weak Prince, instead of defending himself, fled to Rome and sought protection from the Pope; the Pope referred him to a Council about to assemble at St. Gilles; and the Council, without listening to his defence, renewed his excommunication. Montfort, who had at first suffered some reverses, was now strengthened by a new band of Crusaders; and deeply resenting the inclination which had been manifested to throw off his dominion, every where marked his course by the most frightful barbarities, as he spread his arms over Nar-

From Ann.
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

Continuation of the Pernicious war in Narbonne.

A. D.
1214.

bus, dulcissimi in Ecclesiis classicorum pulsationes, orantes Ecclesiarum interitus et extrahentes viros, domos, vias per universa oppella et civitates cortinas et pennis arserit incensas, floribus, herbis, et virebus arborum ramis ubique stratas: omnes autem equosque greges, sexus et ætatis homines ad tanti triumphus spectacula concurrerunt: rusticos et seniores, intermixtos operibus, falcibus, rastris et tribus in collo suspensus (erat enim mensuris tempus) ad vias ceterosque ruerant, cernere cupientes Ferrandum in vincula, quæ modo fundebant in armis. Nec vererebatur diutius et cæter, vixit et pueri, sæcili occasione ab acquisitione nominis, quæ vixit quæ tam ræpæ quam homini acquiescere erat, et cæne mirabili deo quæ ejus colora qui hoc nomen ræpæ imposuit eum in lectis rebus. Unde et ei improperabant, quod modo ipse erat lectatus quid recalcitrare non poterat, qui prout impinguitus dilatatus recedebat, et calcareum in Dominum suum elevavit. To explain the latter part of this account it should be stated, that Alsatian horses were called Ferranda. Velly, (i. 233.) who gives a reference, in which he is not borne out, to Rigord, adds, that the carriage which conveyed the Count of Flanders was drawn by four of these horses, and that the rabble taunted him by singing

Quatre Ferranda bien ferrés Traînent Ferrand bien enfermé.

Mazery explains the sense in which the word is applied to horses. C'est à dire, selon le langage d'alors, de pond boy abeur et couleur de fer. ii. 627.

The prose narrative of William of Britany is far more poetical in every thing which concerns the victory of Bouvines than is the corresponding passage in his Philippus.

* Sicut etiam Janus topocritate cognovimus, ipsa vetula Comitis Flandrie Hispania generis, matertera ipsius Ferrandi, filia Regis Portugallensis, prædiligens et aristotelliga concitus horum belli acciderant, ab Angelis qui hujusmodi artibus præstant, secundum morem Hispanorum, tale morocret habere responsum, "Pugnabitis, et in ipsa pugna Rex prostratus in terram, et equorum pedibus calcabitur, et carceris expulsi." Ferrandus post victoriam mazari pompæ a Parisiensi recipitur." Hec omnia recte intelligi possunt interpretari in verum.

History. From A. D. 1199, to A. D. 1314. Capture of Minerve. bonne. Not a Town, not a Castle surrendered, but its garrison was either gibbeted on the walls which they had defended, or was turned loose after inhuman mutilations to scatter terror among the neighbours. On the capture of the Fort of Minerve, not far from Narbonne, after seven weeks' gallant resistance, it was stipulated that the lives even of the Heretics should be spared, provided they would submit to conversion. These terms appeared too lenient to some fierce zealots in the Camp. "We have taken up the Cross," exclaimed Robert de Mauvoisin, "not to pardon Heretics but to destroy them!" He was consoled by the Abbot of Cîteaux, who assured him that there was little chance of obtaining converts; and the event fully justified the prognostic. When the Crusaders entered the Fortress, the Abbigenens calmly awaited their fate in two separate bands, one of men, the other of women, in different apartments. An enormous pile was heaped in the court-yard, and the issues of life and death were placed before the choice of the prisoners. There was little need of violence to drag them to execution. One hundred and forty martyrs declined the purchase of mercy at the price of apostasy, and no sooner were the flames kindled than they plunged into them of their own accord.*

Martyrdoms. Capture of Termis A. D. 1211. and of Lavaur. The strong Castle of Termis on the frontiers of Roussillon was evacuated after a four months' siege; but the retreat of the garrison was intercepted, part of the fugitives was put to the sword on the spot, part, more wretched, was brought back to the Camp and reserved for the stake. When the walls of another Castle, Lavaur, had been partially levelled by a formidable machine, known by the sportive name of "The Cat,"—a lofty wooden tower, movable on wheels, and rendered fire-proof by a covering of raw hides, which first plied from one of its faces a powerful battering-ram, and then pulled down the loosened fragments of the ramparts by huge iron hooks, or claws resembling those of the animal which gave it name,—the assailants were marshalled with the Ecclesiastics, clad in pontifical robes, at their head. The whole line raised the Hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus," and rushed to the breach. Resistance was no longer possible, and the zeal of De Montfort was exercised, not in stimulating his followers to success, but in restraining them from carnage. For the first time, this man of blood commanded the sword to spare, but it was only in order that he might have a larger tale of victims to swell the pomp of a great after-sacrifice. Four and twenty Knights of noble extraction were dragged to the gallows, which, being hastily constructed, gave way under the burden of the first who was suspended. To save time, De Montfort ordered that the throats of the remainder should be cut, which command was executed with eagerness. The wife of one of the most illustrious of those brave soldiers, Aimery Seigneur of Montreal, was thrown into a well, the mouth of which was immediately closed with stones; and the residue of the Heretics, four hundred in number, were burned alive "with manifestations of great joy;"†

* Petri Vallium Cernail Monach., Hist. Alb. c. 37, p. 583. This writer was an eye-witness of the facts which he relates. Hist. de Languedoc, xxi. 87, p. 194.

† Inventi sunt Heretici perfecti circiter cccc quos Princeps Catholicus et Peregrini Crucis-signati, cum mollior converti ad fidem Catholicam, flammis exarati materidibus ignis concremationis perpetuo assignarent. B. Guizot, Vie Innocent III. ap. Muratori Script. II. 111. 482.

‡ Quos nostri virripientes Peregrini cum ingenti gaudio combusserunt. Petrus Vall. Cern., Hist. Alb. c. 52, p. 598, c. 73, p. 649.

a phrase which, on similar occasions, is ever in the mouth of the Monkish eyewitness and Chronicler of these enormities.

Toulouse, at this fearful season, as the destroyers were hourly approaching nearer to its walls, although firm in allegiance to its legitimate Count, was convulsed by opposite Religious factions. The Romanists predominated, and were arrayed by the Bishop, Fouquet, in a band called La Compagnie Blanche, bound by oath to pursue, even unto death, their fellow-citizens, of different Faith, who were known as La Compagnie Noire. Daily encounters and much effusion of blood were the result of this unnatural conflict; and when Raymond, who at length appeared in arms, as the common danger increased, succeeded in reconciling the two parties, both of them were instantly excommunicated by the Legate. De Montfort's first investment of Toulouse was unsuccessful; he was compelled to raise the siege, and the operations of the conflicting armies, during more than a year following, were attended with various fortune. In the course of that period the Legate, Arnaud, Abbot of Cîteaux, the main author and stimulator of the Crusade, having first invested himself with both the Spiritual dignity of the Archbishopric of Narbonne, and the Temporal rights and title of its Dukedom, withdrew in order to avoid the jealousy which he had excited in De Montfort by those usurpations, and directed his attention to Spain; a field at that moment, scarcely less fertile in events which might gladden the spirit of a zealot, than even that which, for a time, he felt constrained to abandon.

A detail of the events which distracted that troubled Country will find place elsewhere; it may be enough to state, in this place, that the difficulties which Pedro of Aragon felt in rendering his due share of assistance to repel the invasion of the Almohades, (under the Miramolin, to whom John of England had tendered vassalage)—in consequence of the diminution which his power had undergone in Southern France, of the oppression of his allies and feudatories by De Montfort, and of the spoliation of the Count of Toulouse and his son, each of whom was personally connected with him by marriage,*—at length determined him to adopt measures of active resistance in their behalf. For a while, he appears to have obtained favourable admission for the strong representations which he made to Rome; and Innocent III. addressed Letters both to De Montfort and to his own Legates, reproaching them in unmeasured terms for their blood-guiltiness, their avarice, and their ambition, and commanding them to desist from their War of extermination.† In his diplomacy with France, Pedro was equally successful, and Philippe Auguste detained his son, Prince Louis, who was on the eve of joining the Crusaders. But De Montfort was fully conscious of his own power; and being strongly supported by all the Ecclesiastics in Narbonne, he prevailed on them, both individually and in their joint capacity as Members of a Council, to address the Pontiff, to exhibit to him the general demand of Europe that Heresy should be eradicated, and specifically, in the first instance, to denounce the City of Toulouse, as a Spiritual Gomorrah; which together with all the unrighteous who had taken France. From A. D. 1199, to A. D. 1314. State of Toulouse.

A. D. 1212.

Withdrawal of Arnaud, Abbot of Cîteaux.

Pedro, King of Aragon.

induces Innocent III. to remonstrate.

* It is commonly believed that each of the Raymonds, Father and Son, married a sister of Pedro of Aragon. See a long and curious note (35.) in Vie and Vaissette, Hist. de Languedoc, iii. 591.

† Epist. Innocent III. xv. 212, 213, 214. cited by Vie and Vaissette, Hist. de Languedoc, xxi. 36, p. 234. ‡ Hist. de Languedoc, xxii. 43, p. 441.

History.

From
A. D.
1199. to
A. D.
1314.

Innocent afterwards renews his excommunication.
The King of Aragon takes the field.

refuge within its walls, it was the chief duty of a Christian utterly to destroy. It was not difficult to revive in Innocent's bosom the smothered sparks of zeal. Once again they kindled into flame; and in order to expiate the sin of which he had been guilty by a brief inclination to mercy, he revoked all the concessions which he had made to the King of Aragon, and issued fresh anathemas against the heretical Barons of Narbonne.

Pedro, a brave Knight and a wise Statesman, perceived that all further hope from negotiation was at an end, and that his own safety, as well as that of the few Vassals who remained to him, must be purchased by the sword. Hastily putting himself at the head of a thousand horse, he crossed the Pyrenees, and joined the forces already gathered under the Counts of Toulouse, of Foix, and of Comminge, which amounted to about an equal number of cavalry with his own. This, in fact, constituted the whole force which the confederates employed in action, and which has been exaggerated by the Church Historians to sixty thousand men, and yet further by William of Brittany, indulging in the license of Poetry, to two hundred thousand.* Against these pretended myriads, De Montfort could array scarcely two thousand troops in all,† of whom however twelve hundred were horsemen, the choicest Knights of France, and greatly superior in weight, strength, and discipline to the light cavalry of Spain and the Pyrenees. Each party, it is true, had summoned from the neighbouring towns as many of the Civic militia as it could command, and it is not improbable that in that force the allies outnumbered the Crusaders in the ratio asserted; but the wretched infantry of those times, without defensive armour, and with no other weapon except a rude sword, untrained, unmarshalled, and unofficered, followed the march of an army but to toil before a battle, and to be slaughtered without resistance in a defeat.

Interception of his Love-letter.

De Montfort was lying in the small town of Muret, about three leagues from Toulouse, when an intercepted despatch from the King of Aragon was brought to him by a scout. Pedro, to his other accomplishments added that of song; he was a Troubadour of some distinction; and his lays of love were widely, and not unsuccessfully scattered. The Letter which De Montfort opened contained not deep matters of State or Policy, but an assurance to a Toulousian fair one, that it was for her love the King was about to encounter the chivalry of France, that her bright eyes would inspire him in battle, and that it was to them that he should look for recompense afterwards. These common-places of gallantry found no response in the bosom of the stern enthusiast, into whose hands they had undesignedly fallen. He regarded them with a bitter smile of contempt and triumph, exclaiming, "The day is our own; God is for us, while he on his side has nothing but the bright eyes of his Mistress!"‡

Battle of Muret, Sept.
12.

On the morning of the 12th of September, De Mont-

* Conveniant omnes numero his militia centum.

Philippus, viii. 579.

† Cujus erant equites cum quadraginta ducentis

Septuaginti (Septingenti) in equites famuli, pedestres trecenti.

Id. Ibid. 587.

In his prose Chronicle William makes a slight variation: Non habebat nisi ducentos et sexaginta milites, et circiter quingentos satellites equites, et peregrinos pedites fere septingentos iuvenas. 92. The last word serves as a key to the whole history of this battle.

‡ Guilelmus de Poitou, c. 21, p. 678, where he says the Letter was addressed to quendam nobilem uxorem cujusdam nobilis Thodonae Diocesis.

fort heard Mass, marshalled his cavalry in three troops in honour of the Holy Trinity,* threw open the gates of Muret, and advanced upon the enemy. From an incident related by Matthew Paris, it would appear as if the confederates were surprised; for the spies of De Montfort informed him that the King of Aragon, so great was his security! was preparing to sit down to dinner. "Is he?" remarked the Count, as he sprang upon his horse, "then assuredly I will be his Sewer for the first dish!" and the King accordingly had tasted but three morsels before he was attacked and killed.† That he fought with De Montfort hand to hand, that the Count, endeavouring to take him alive, grappled with him, and threw him on the ground, where he was despatched by the dagger of an Enquire, are probably fictions invented by William of Brittany to adorn his Poem;‡ and a more probable account informs us that two French Knights had bound themselves by a vow, before the engagement, jointly to attack the King, nor to quit him till he was slain. According to a custom familiar to the times, and known to the English reader much later, on Bosworth field, Pedro had exchanged armour with one of his favourite attendants; and the Frenchmen charging the supposed object of their search, nearly unhorsed him at the first onset. "That is not the King," remarked one of them; "the King is a stouter Knight." "Right," cried Pedro, close at hand, "but here is the King;" and the bold avowal cost him his life; he was surrounded on the moment by the retainers of his two bonded foemen, and pierced to the heart by numberless lances. As had been foreseen, his death was the signal of general route. De Montfort chased the three Counts from the field, and mercifully pursuing the infantry, left wholly defenceless by this abandonment, put them to the sword, or drove them into the Garonne almost to a man.§

Further resistance on the part of the leaders of the Albigenses was hopeless, and in a few months after this great overthrow, Count Raymond and his allies of Foix and Comminge were reconciled to the Church; the first named abicated his shadowy sovereignty in favour of his son, and retiring to private life in Toulouse awaited the determination of the Pontiff as to the employment of the remainder of his days. A few petty towns, however, still obstinately persisted in Heresy, and their siege, their sack, and the martyrdom of their inhabitants when taken, afforded occupation for the Crusaders, who continued to pour in from France. In the Spring of 1215, Louis of France, attracted by the fashion of this pilgrimage, devoted himself to a forty days' campaign against the Heretics, at the head of a far larger army than he could have levied for any merely temporal service; and his arrival was watched by De Montfort with a jealous eye. The young Prince,

* In nomine Sanctæ Trinitatis tribus dispositis acibus. Math Paris, 246.

† "Certe servum ei de primo ferculo." Id. Ibid.

‡ Philippus, viii. 735—803.

§ William of Brittany says that seventeen thousand Toulousians were killed, and that De Montfort, devoted eos gratis propeperit, lost only eight of his Peregrini; 92; the same numbers are repeated in his Philippus, viii. 856. Matthew Paris states, Ceteris interfecimus numerosis nulliusmodi acibus potuit; de multis autem Cruci-pugnans non solum cum arcerentibus paucis occubuit. The details of this battle which we have offered are chiefly taken from the extended account of it in the Hist. de Langue doc, xxii. p. 250, &c. and Raynaldi Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 1213. § 56. vol. i. p. 336.

History. however, was actuated by superstition, not by ambition; and having made the circuit of the chief towns, he relieved his entertainer from all anxiety by again retiring to France. Not long afterwards, the grand object of De Montfort's ambition was completely realized, when the IVth Council of Lateran undertook the final distribution of the conquered Provinces. The Crusade against the Albigenes was declared to be at an end; and in spite of the reclamation of the two Raymonds, and of the Counts of Foix and of Comminge, who pleaded their own Cause in person, an (Ecumenical Decree adjourned the decision of the Council relative to the territories of the two last-named petitioners; permitted Raymond VII. to keep possession of that small portion of his hereditary dominions which was comprised in the County of Venaisin and the Marquisate of Provence; and conferred upon Simon de Montfort the golden prize of Toulouse and Montauban, and of the entire remainder of that extensive territory which had been won by the Crusaders.

Such was the striking result of the victory at Muret: that won at Bouvines, although productive of consequences far more permanent, seemed to effect little more at the moment than the negotiation of a Truce for five years with England. But the tyranny and faithlessness of John, before many months had passed, awakened fresh discontent among his Barons, who turned to France for relief, and proffered their Crown to the acceptance of Louis. The transactions of that Prince during his consequent invasion of England, belong more appropriately to the Annals of that Country than to those of France; and, accordingly, under the former we shall notice more at length the vehement opposition raised by Innocent III. to the enterprise; the death of that active and ambitious Pontiff, followed soon afterwards by that of King John; the abandonment of Louis by his English supporters; their adherence to Henry III.; the destruction of the invading fleet off the Straits of Dover; the renunciation of the claim advanced by the French Prince; and his final retirement from the British shores.

We return, therefore, to the South, in which the Peace resulting from the entire reduction of the Provençals was soon disturbed by the mutual jealousies of those who had divided the spoil. The hands yet red and dripping with the gore of unnumbered Albigenes were now raised in furious conflict against each other, and the temporal rights of the Duchy of Narbonne became an object of fierce dispute between Simon de Montfort and the Abbot of Cîteaux. The former occupied the contested towns by force of arms, the latter directed Spiritual weapons against his ancient colleague, and visited with excommunication that champion who so recently had been the terror of the excommunicated. Encouraged by these intestine quarrels among their oppressors, Raymond VII. and his father attempted the recovery of their lost dominions; and the general attachment to their name and persons greatly contributed to some early successes; but De Montfort having intercepted all communication between the two armies with which the Father and Son were approaching him on different frontiers, and being also prompted by the ferocious counsels, and aided by the treacherous artifices of Fouquet, Bishop of Toulouse, took a bloody revenge upon the rebellious inhabitants of that City. On a show of resistance which they feebly attempted, their town was abandoned to the license of De Montfort's soldiery. "Led by the Bishop," says a native Chronicler, "they pillaged and plundered great part of the City; and violated so many women and maidens, that a piteous sight was it to behold all the evil which the Bishop wrought upon Toulouse in so short a time." After the chief citizens had been thrown into dungeons or dragged to the scaffold, the miserable remnant saved their walls from the flames and their necks from the axe by payment of thirty thousand marks of silver.

Unbroken by these severities, the Toulousians, before the following year had closed, threw open their gates to Raymond VI., whose gentleness, although ill adapted to the troublous times upon which he was cast, had greatly endeared him to his former subjects. The contrast of his mild rule with the bloody tyranny which had been erected upon its overthrow, heightened their desire for his restoration; and, when they looked round upon their desolated fields; when they counted the numbers which each hearth had lost by the sword, either of war or of the executioner; when they felt their present terror, humiliation, and poverty, and remembered their former happiness, independence, and wealth, it can little be wondered that, even after all their sufferings, they were willing to suffer yet more for a chance of regaining liberty. De Montfort, when informed of this revolution, hastened by forced marches upon his insurgent Capital; but his troops, chiefly levied from the immediate neighbourhood, fell away as he approached its walls, and he was repulsed with severe loss when he attempted an assault. Even afterwards, when he had determined regularly to invest the City, he was surprised in his lines by the Comte de Foix, and pursued to the fords of the Garonne, where he narrowly escaped drowning at that very Muret, near which four years before he had gained so distinguished a victory. The insurrection extended itself through all the adjoining districts; and when De Montfort felt able to renew the siege of Toulouse, his works proceeded tardily, and with little effect. The Winter passed, and the following Summer was far advanced, while the City still held out. One morning, towards the close of June, as De Montfort was celebrating Mass, he was informed that the besieged had made a sortie. He refused to quit the Church before he had witnessed the elevation of the Host; and then, having first uttered the words of Simeon, "Lord now let thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation," he buckled on his armour, repulsed the sally, and fell, while pressing close to the ditch in the pursuit, his skull being shattered by an enormous stone discharged from a mangonel.† His death was the signal for a fresh sortie, in which the besieged were

France.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Severities at Toulouse.
Fresh revolt of Toulouse.
A. D.
1217.

A. D.
1219.

Death of Simon de Montfort.

* Historia de los sucesos de Tolosa, cited by Sismondi, Hist. des Français, vi. 483.

† Pet. Vall. Cern., Hist. Albigensium, c. 66. p. 665. De Montfort is said to have been pierced at the same time by no less than five arrows, which inflicted wounds, as the Cistercian Monk profanely adds, ad emulandum Salvatorem. To heighten the effect of his death, the stone by which he was killed is said by some modern authors to have been discharged by the hand of a woman; (Benoit, Hist. des Alb. lib. v. p. 61.) or, as others state, by that of a dwarf. But Vie and Vassette quietly dismiss these appendages, by remarking, Nous ne trouvons rien de ces circonstances dans les annes. Hist. de Languedoc, xiii. 28. p. 394. We have forbore from any comment on Simon de Montfort's character, which may be best omitted from his actions. Velly probably was not aware how correctly he was drawing it when he unwittingly vented the following most bitter and most true sarcasm: Homme incomparable, s'il avoit été moins ambiteux, moins cruel, moins perfide, moins vaine, et moins vindicatif, ii. 248.

Renewal of War with Raymond.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.to
A. D.
1314.
Succession
of his son Amaury.Crusade of Prince
Louis.A. D.
1219.Treacherous massacre at Marmande.Ineffectual siege of Toulouse.
Aug. 1.

utterly routed; and Amaury de Montfort, son of the deceased Count, having rallied the fugitives, received their oath of allegiance as his father's successor, renewed the siege ineffectually for another month, and then retired on Carcassonne.

The Vth Crusade to Palestine, which had been preached by the Council of Lateran not long before the death of Simon de Montfort, occupied most of those soldiers of the Cross who otherwise would have hastened to revenge it; and the military devotion of the French flowing in its ancient channels towards the East, for a while was diverted from Languedoc and Provence. But the Vatican was reluctant that the great work of Innocent III. should crumble away; and his successor Honorius III. openly assumed the protection of Amaury de Montfort, and destined to his support a moiety of the sum which had been levied in France for the service of the Crusade in the Holy Land. Prince Louis joyfully undertook the command of the expedition, the expenses of which were to be thus defrayed; and two and thirty Counts, more than twenty Bishops, and six hundred Knights enrolled themselves under his banner, and led ten thousand archers once again to scatter the flames of War over the fair districts of the South. The campaign began with the siege of Marmande, a small town on the Garonne, by the joint forces of Louis and Amaury. The former granted a capitulation with security of life and property to the inhabitants; but no sooner did the chief leaders of the vanquished enemy present themselves in the besiegers' lines, confiding in the terms which had been conceded, than the Bishop of Saintes fervently exhorted the Prince to commit them to the flames as Heretics and Traitors, and to extend the like summary punishment to all their comrades in the surrendered town. Louis and his brave Knights indignantly protested against so flagrant a breach of faith; but, during this discussion, Amaury, no less sanguinary and unscrupulous than his Father, had entered the gates of Marmande, and commencing the work of destruction did not cease till he had put every inhabitant to the sword. Five thousand souls of both sexes and all ages suffered under this most atrocious violation of the laws of War and of Honour.*

Louis, it is said, was extremely shocked and somewhat disconcerted† at this treacherous cruelty, but nevertheless he advanced with Amaury to besiege Toulouse. Bertrand, the Cardinal Legate, who accompanied them, had sworn with a horrible particularity, that within that devoted City neither man nor woman, nor child of either sex should be left alive; that all should be unsparingly massacred; and that not one stone should be left upon another in any of its buildings. The Toulousians had been informed of this vow of extermination; and they knew the temper of him by whom it had been pledged,—that if he possessed the power he would fulfil it to the very letter. Resistance to extremity was therefore their sole chance of escape. Count Raymond summoned his friends to his aid, and supported by a thousand Knights who threw themselves into the City before it was invested, made good his defence for six weeks, and compelled the enemy to raise the siege, and to withdraw precipitately, after burning their artillery; Louis retired to France, Amaury to some one of the few towns which still recognised his authority.

Roused by this glorious example, Montauban, Beziers, and Castelnaudary, during the next year, disclaimed the yoke of De Montfort and raised the banners of their former Lords. The last-named town maintained itself during an eight months' siege, and when Amaury, disappointed in every attempt at its reduction, was forced to break up, Carcassonne, upon which he retreated, was almost the only one of his Father's numerous conquests which remained in his possession. It was in vain that the Legate Bertrand obtained authority from Rome to institute a new Order of Knighthood for the express purpose of combating Heresy; the Chevaliers of "the Holy Faith of Jesus Christ"‡ were little able to stem the reflux of that tide which was sweeping before it the fortunes of De Montfort. It was in vain that the Pope granted to Philippe Auguste a new subsidy from his Clergy; the boon was accepted, but its produce was employed not in the South, but in Poitou and Aquitaine. The fanaticism which but a few years since had roused myriads to engage against the Albigenes appeared extinct; and not a single Crusader responded to the Bulls of Honorius. With every native's dagger bared in against his bosom, without the hope of foreign assistance, fatigued, harassed, terror-stricken, and despairing, Amaury de Montfort at length offered to cede all that his Father had conquered, all that himself had lost, to Philippe Auguste. But that Prince, who even in his earlier years had shown little zeal for the Crusades against the Albigenes, was now weakened with age and sickness, and perhaps more than ever compassionate the wrongs of the legitimate Count of Toulouse. Pleading therefore the hazard of an approaching War with England, he declined the proposal of De Montfort, although it was earnestly recommended by the Pope, and backed by the promise of a general remission of his sins.

The long and brilliant career of Philippe Auguste was now indeed approaching a close. The King lingered through twelve months under a fever which first attacked him during the Summer of 1222; and to the latest moment he was usefully occupied in cares befitting a great Monarch. Before his demise, he completed an important task which had employed his entire reign at intervals—the fortification of all the towns appertaining to the Crown. This grand national work, which at once strengthened the Country against foreign invasion, and added vigour to the internal administration of Police, was performed with the strictest regard to equity and an undeviating respect for private rights; and not a hovel which it became necessary to demolish, nor a foot of land which was required to prevent interruption in the walls, was appropriated to the purpose without payment of its full value to the owner.† So well arranged, however, were the finances, that these extensive purchases were effected without injury to the Exchequer; and the increase of the Monarch's Revenues was throughout proportioned to that of the population, the industry, the commerce, and the agriculture of * Interfecerunt omnes municipes cum mulieribus et parvulis, omnes indigenas usque ad quinque milia. Gul. Arn. 113.

† Action barbare qui choque extrêmement le Prince François. Velly, ii. 249, who has borrowed the sentence from the Hist. de Languedoc, xxiii. 42. p. 312. after substituting the milder choque for irrita. Après avoir témoigné quelque mécontentement. Sismondi, vi. 507.

* The very few particulars which are known concerning this Order may be found in Helyot, Hist. des Ordres Rel. et Ml. tom. viii. part. vi. c. 40. p. 286. and in the Hist. de Languedoc, xxiii. 52. p. 316.

† Gul. Arn. 85.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Succession of his son Amaury.

Crusade of Prince Louis.

A. D.
1219.

Treacherous massacre at Marmande.

Ineffectual siege of Toulouse.
Aug. 1.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Embellishment of Paris.

Jurisprudence.

Literature.

his Kingdom, all of which were greatly enlarged under his beneficial rule. The benevolent project of a Hôtel des Invalides, an honourable retreat for veteran soldiers, although not realized till the accession of Louis XIV., was conceived by Philippe Auguste.* Paris was indebted to him also for more numerous embellishments, and more rapid advances to that cleanliness, elegance, and magnificence, which are demanded by the Capital of a powerful Nation, than it had attained in the entire course of the four preceding Centuries; and it was the keen and vigilant eye of the King himself which detected its wants and watched over the progress of its decoration and improvement. To consolidate a Feudal union among the great Vassals of the Crown, subordinate to his own paramount Sovereignty, was another of his leading objects; and, for that purpose, he enhanced the authority of the Court of Peers, which we have seen pronouncing sentence against a King of England; and he obtained the sanction of National Assemblies for laws enacted to regulate not a single Province only, but universal France. Not less attached to Letters than distinguished for valor in the field of battle, Philippe Auguste extended a liberal patronage to Science and the Arts; and the Academy of Paris (it did not become a University till the reign of his grandson) received from him its first Code of Statutes. The School of Abelard, indeed, had already become the great theatre of study for all Europe, and pupils thronged to its lectures, not only from the remoter districts of France itself, but even from Germany and Italy. The Civil and Canon Law, the Seven Liberal Arts, Medicine, and Theology, were taught by its Professors;† and the exaggeration of the contemporary Writer who relates these particulars, may be pardoned when we read in him that even Athens in her days of highest glory was not less frequented by Sages, than was Paris in his own time.‡ Nor were they the severer studies alone which Philippe cherished and cultivated; his peculiar taste led him to encourage the brilliant Romances of Chivalry. His jousts and banquets, his Court spectacles and ceremonials were framed on the glittering models which he found established in those Tales; and to his reign we are indebted for the choicest legends of Knighthood which have descended to us; for names familiar to every reader who has permitted indulgence to the pleasures of Imagination. Before the close of the XIIth Century, and in the first twenty years of the sway of Philippe Auguste, had appeared the Romance of Tristan de Leonois, of the Saint Greal, and of Lancelot du Lac, the precursors of innumerable descendants connected with the Round Table of Arthur and the Paladins of Charlemagne.§

Thus having much more than doubled the extent of his hereditary dominions, and added strength and lustre to the authority of the Crown while promoting the happiness of his People, Philippe Auguste expired on the 14th July, 1223, in the fifty-eighth year of his age and the forty-third of his reign, leaving behind him a reputation which has scarcely been exceeded by any other occupant of the same throne.

The brief and unimportant reign of his son and successor Louis VIII. will not long detain us. His accession was hailed with rapture by his subjects, for in his person, by the maternal line, they again saw themselves ruled by a genuine Carolingian.* His first entrance to his Capital was marked by unwonted demonstrations of public joy, and the streets of Paris reechoed with long-continued festivities. In the Sacré at Rheims, however, it had been observed that one great Vassal had neglected attendance either personally or by proxy. Normandy, indeed, was now united to the Crown of France, but the King of England, who, as Duke of Aquitaine, owed homage for that Fief, refrained from tendering his allegiance. It was not long before the intention of Henry III. to seek reestablishment in the Continental territories which his Father had lost, was openly avowed; and when the Truce between the two Powers was on the very eve of expiring, a formal demand was made for the restitution of the conquered Provinces. But the weak Prince took little care to follow up this demand with the vigour which was necessary for its enforcement; and when Louis entered Poitou, the English Commanders were left not only without supplies and reinforcements, but were subjected to a cruel mockery and deception. Huge chests were embarked from the Tower of London, ostensibly filled with money, and it was not till they were opened at La Rochelle that their real freight was discovered to be stones and bran.† The fall of that City rendered the conquest of all Aquitaine North of the Garonne an easy task; and the King of England, after enduring the shame of these fresh losses, was indebted for a renewed Truce of four years, partly to the purchased interference of Rome, and yet more, perhaps, to thirty-thousand marks of silver paid directly into the coffers of France.

Not long after the close of this successful campaign, the arbitration of Louis was required in one of the most remarkable claims which has been agitated in modern Europe. Baldwin, Count of Flanders, had been elevated by the united suffrages of the French and Venetians to the throne of the Eastern Empire so far back as the year 1204, and after eleven months' sway had been taken prisoner by the Bulgarians. His subsequent fate was involved in mystery; his brother Henry paused more than a year before he assumed the Imperial Crown, in hope of Baldwin's release from captivity; and although the Barbarian conqueror Joannice maintained a profound silence relative to the treatment of his prisoner, he was at length generally supposed to have perished by a death of horrible torture. His daughter Jeanne, who had been recognised as their Countess by the Flemings, was a licentious; and imperious

France.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
A. D.
1223.
Death of Philippe Auguste.
Accession of Louis
VIII.

A. D.
1224.

Conquests in Poitou and Aquitaine.

Story of Baldwin of Flanders.

* Epist. Innocent III. xi. 25.

† In eadem nobilissimâ civitate, non modo de Trivio et Quadrivio, verum et de questionibus Juris Canonici et Civiles, et de eâ facultate quæ de sanandis corporibus et sanitatibus scriptis est, plena et perfecta inveniretur doctrina, ferventiori tamen desiderio Sacram Fugium et questionibus Theologicis docebant. Gul. Arn. 52. Of the Seven Liberal Arts, Grammar, Rhetoric, and Dialectics formed the Trivium; Arithmetic, Geometry, Music and Astronomy the Quadrivium. The Statutes of the Academy of Paris date from 1215. Gaillard, Hist. de Charlemagne, iii. 285.

‡ In debus ista studium literarum florebat Parisius, nec legimus tantum aliquando fuisse scholarium frequentiam Athenis vel Ægypti, vel in quibet parte mundi, quanta locum prædictum studendi gratis inebat. Gul. Arn. ut sup.

§ Samonds, Littérature du Médi. ch. vii. vol. XI.

* The first Wife of Philippe Auguste, the mother of Louis VIII., was Isabelle, daughter of Baldwin, Count of Hainault, who was lineally descended from Ermenegarde, daughter of Charles of Lorraine, the last of the Carolingians.

† Gesta Lud. viii. ap. Hist. des Gaules, xvii. 305. Chron. Turonens, Id. xvii. 305.

‡ The release of Ferras, which took place in 1226, is attributed by the Chronicler of Tours to the facility with which the Countess History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
A. D.
1225.

woman, who still allowed her husband Ferrand to linger in the confinement to which he had been subjected from the day of his defeat at Bouvines. Little inclined even to divide her authority with another, she was overwhelmed with astonishment and indignation when a claimant appeared, who demanded that it should be altogether resigned. Twenty years had elapsed since the catastrophe of Baldwin, which was now well nigh forgotten, when a man presented himself in Flanders, bearing a strong resemblance to the lost Prince in features and in person, with such difference only as would arise from increased age and from suffering. He related a not improbable tale of his abode among and his escape from the Bulgarians, and he asserted his right to his hereditary dominions. The Flemings, among whom Jeanne was greatly and deservedly unpopular, listened to the pretension with avidity, took up arms in its support, and forced their Princess to seek refuge in the Court of Louis, the gaoler of her husband. The King of France promised to reinstate the fugitive Countess, and commenced by summoning the Pretender to appear before Commissioners, who might ascertain his identity. The claimant obeyed, under the protection of a safe-conduct, which was honourably respected, even after the Judges had pronounced that he was an impostor. On many points, as the Flemish Chronicler Oudegherst relates, his replies were accurate; but there were three on which he failed; * he was unable to state the place at which he had done homage to Philippe Auguste, that at which he had received Knighthood, and the day on which he had been married to his consort Mary of Champagne. Louis declaring himself satisfied respecting the imposture, commanded the Pretender, who was avowed to be a Hermit of Champagne, to quit his dominions; his adherents fell away insensibly, and on his attempting escape from Burgundy in disguise, he was seized by an emissary of the Countess, delivered into her hands, and eventually hanged with marks of especial ignominy. The popular voice continued to be raised in his behalf even after his death, and Jeanne was openly taxed with the commission of parricide. Whether guilty or otherwise, she exhibited much wisdom in her generation, and unable to avert the horrible charge by reasoning she had recourse to prodigies. Envoys were despatched to Adrianople, who affirmed on their return that they had ascertained the particulars of Baldwin's death; that they had seen the very spot on which his remains, when thrown to the dogs, were left undevoured, and afterwards were distinguished by a marvellous brightness; and that a sick person had been miraculously healed by approaching the grave.†

Jeanne, regardless of Bigamy, had listened to the proposals for her hand made by the Duke of Brittany. Louis VIII., aware of the impolicy of permitting the union of Flanders with that powerful Fief, and unwilling also to sanction nuptials so scandalous, spoiled the contract by turning the first husband loose. op. Hist. des Gaules, tom. xviii. p. 316. Velly says that the hatred between Ferrand and his Countess arose from the Chess-board, over which they quarrelled incessantly, because the latter was the better player of the two. (ii. 303.)

* Chroniques et Annal. de Flandre, ch. 107. fol. 178. where the history is related at length, and unfavourably to the Pretender. The author of the Gesta Ludovici VIII. states that the pretended Baldwin refused to answer any questions proposed by the Commissioners. op. Hist. des Gaules, xvi. 309. The Chroniques de S. Denis are much to the same purpose. B. 420. A short account of this claimant is given by Matt. Paris, p. 320.

† Lesquelles choses furent rapportées par divers personnages de bonne cécience et dignes de foy. Oudegherst, f. 180.

No further testimony could be required, and the angry clamours of the Flemings at once subsided.

In Languedoc, the fortunes of De Montfort continued on the decline, although death had relieved him from two of his chief opponents. Raymond VI. terminated his chequered life in 1222; but the hatred of the Priests pursued him beyond the grave. The rites of sepulture were obstinately denied to his remains; and three centuries after his decease, the wooden coffin in which they were deposited was still to be seen, unburied, in the Cemetery of the Knights Hospitaliers of St. John at Toulouse. Velly, who wrote in 1770, states that the skull was shown in his days, and that it bore a fleur-de-lis distinctly impressed upon it by nature.* The Count de Foix died in the year following, but his son Roger Count de Bernard inherited his father's principles and valour, as well as his dominions, and in conjunction with Raymond VII. determined upon completing the expulsion of De Montfort. Their success was not long delayed; notwithstanding the receipt of a subsidy and the promises of further assistance from Louis VIII., Amaury was unable to meet his enemies in the field; and he at length agreed wholly to evacuate the territories which during forty years had submitted to the rule of his family, and took his departure for the North of France.

Louis, more enterprising or less polite than his Father, willingly accepted the renewed offer of the cession of Languedoc which, notwithstanding his recent Treaty, Amaury did not scruple to tender on his arrival in Paris; and the price was to be the high dignity of Constable of France.† But Honorius III. long hesitated to afford his sanction to a new Crusade for the spoliation of Raymond. The Emperor Frederic II. was ardently bent upon an expedition to Palestine, and apprehensive that if Indulgences were granted to those who embraced a nearer and a much easier Holy War, his favourite object would be disconcerted, he was loud in his remonstrances with the Vatican. When the difficulties, however, which impeded this Eastern enterprise had relaxed his zeal for its completion, his opposition to the issue of a new Bull against the Albigeuses was at the same time diminished. The Council of Bourges rejected the submission offered by the Count of Toulouse, refused the absolution which he earnestly besought, commissioned Louis to pluck up the unrighteousness of Heresy from the land,‡ and granted him during five years, provided the war should continue so long, a tenth of all the Ecclesiastical revenues in his dominions, to defray its expenses.§

Fifty thousand men at arms, and a proportional number of retainers on foot are said to have accompanied the march of Louis. Terror preceded them as they gathered at Bourges, traversed the Nivernois, and approached Lyon. Every town through which they were likely to advance, proffered its keys and its allegiance; and the Deputies from Avignon were among the foremost to tender a free passage over their bridge on the Rhone, and the command of supplies for the army. The author-

* Hist. de France, ii. 277.

† Gul. de Podio, c. 35. p. 687.

‡ Id. proutlatum hereticum excommunicat terra. Littere of the Cardinal Legate of St. Angelo. Preuves de l'Hist. de Languedoc, 181. vol. iii. 323.

§ Cum exercitu quasi invincibili iter arripuit. . . . armati autem in exercitu milibus et equis bellatorum ad quinquaginta milia, præter pedites qui quasi sub numero non cedebant. Matt. Paris, 333.

History.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

rites of that City, which nominally belonging to the Empire as part of the Kingdom of Arles, virtually maintained independence, were well inclined to Raymond; but doubtful of his ability to resist, and unwilling to expose themselves to the brunt of the Crusade, they thought to conciliate Louis by these offers, while at the same time they resolved not to admit his ill-restrained and licentious soldiery within their walls. As measures of precaution, therefore, they replenished their magazines, provided artillery, and put their garrison in a condition of defence. Nor was this wise foresight unnecessary. The Legate and the Ecclesiastics rejoiced in a pretext under which they might punish an offending City, excommunicated twelve years before for its attachment to the House of St. Gilles, and still impenitent; the Crusaders were tempted by its wealth and promise of booty; and the pride of the King was galled at a refusal to admit his personal entrance. He demanded, therefore, that his whole army might pass in military array through the streets, and upon refusal, he immediately commenced the siege of Avignon.

Siege of Avignon.

A strong natural position, a double wall, a numerous population, and well-constructed defences rendered this enterprise not a little difficult to the assailants. Great skill and valour were shown by the besieged; and the loss of the French from the sword, from want of sufficient supplies, from the climate, and from sickness, fearfully thinned their ranks. No fodder was to be obtained for the cattle, but such as was brought from a distance, for the Count of Toulouse had ploughed up every acre of adjoining pasture; the unburied carcasses of men and beasts bred a species of large and noisome black flies, which are described by the Chronicler to have buzzed round the tents and tables of the Crusaders, as pestilently as those foul Birds with which Fable once tenanted the Strophades, assaulted the Trojan hero.* Dispirited by these sufferings, most of the great Lords, after their forty days of Feudal service had expired, prepared to leave the Camp. Among them was Thibaud, (the IVth, or the Posthumous as he is named,) Count of Champagne, a Noble of whose conduct various explanations are given. By some authorities he is supposed to have been unwilling to compass the entire overthrow of Raymond; by others his abandonment of the Crusade is ascribed to a motive more closely personal. Thibaud, in the flower of youth, devoted to gallantry, and one of the choicest Poets of his time, had written in praise of the charms of Queen Blanche, notwithstanding she had now passed her fortieth year, and after the fashion of the times had avowed himself her Knight. Impatient to revisit his Mistress, he demanded leave to retire, and on the refusal of the King, parted from him in anger, and is suspected of having taken a deep and atrocious revenge.

Avignon at length capitulated on the 12th of September, and Louis commenced his return to the North, after a short residence in the captured city. Disease followed in his train, and numerous personages of distinction were swept away by a contagion which spread itself during the march. On arrival at the Abbey of Montpensier, Louis himself was attacked with symptoms which resisted all medical aid. He prepared for death calmly and devoutly;† received oaths of allegiance from his chief Barons to his eldest son, a child at that time but twelve years of age; and expired on the 8th of November, a victim, as report very generally affirmed, to the vengeance of Thibaud.‡ Louis was described by Philippe Auguste as weak and delicate; yet, both as heir apparent and as King, he exhibited considerable activity. Matthew Paris speaks of him as far different from his very wise predecessor†§ and by others he has been mentioned negatively as the Son of a great King and the Father of a great Saint. The title Le Lion pacifique which has been attributed to him is very little borne out by his actions, for whatever distinction he attained was won by arms; and it appears reasonably explained as no more than a forced and silly resolution of one of Merlin's prophecies, In Ventris monte morietur Leo pacificus.|| Louis died in the town of Montpensier, and nothing was easier than the slight

France.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Surrender of Avignon.

Death of Louis VIII.

Distress of the Crusade.

Thibaud of Champagne refuses.

* A remarkable anecdote of his last illness is related by Gul. de Podio. *Erat autem quid relevari posset, ut dicebatur, non feminæ agilitudo, quod nesci audire a viro fide digno referri, sentiens vir nobilis Arcaimbaldus de Barbonio, qui in ejus erat societate, posse juvari. Regem nuptibus fascinus, quæstibus virginum, speciosis ac generosis, atque cibis tantum quali Regi se offerret et liquoribus, quod non libidinibus delectaret, sed auditis infirmis auditio advenisset, dormiente Rege a cubicularia ejus de de fecit in thalamum introduci; quem Rex exiguus cum vidisset aspirantem, quævisit quid esset et qualiter introisset? quod nesci edocui erat aut quid advenisset, reservari, cui gratias Rex ait "Non ita eris puerile, non enim peccarem mortaliter ullo modo?" et convocato dicto viro Arcaimbaldus mandavit cum honorifice morari. 36. p. 688. The chastity of Louis is a theme of praise with most of his Chroniclers; in the Gesta we read of him that he was vir utique Catholicus et mira sanctitatis omnibus dictis vita usque, nam nunquam carnem suam maculavit, præterquam cum unice uxore ad sibi legitimum matrimonium copulavit. 310.*

† Matthew Paris can scarcely be admitted as an authority for the poisoning of Louis, for he was ignorant of the surrender of Avignon, and supposes that the siege was still in progress at the moment of the King's death. His words are, *Tunc Comes, ut fama refert, procuravit Regi venenum propinare ob mortem Regine ejus quem carnaliter illicitè admovevit; unde libidinis impulsu stimulatus, mors alterius necesse non valeret. Comitis igitur ultantem recedente infamabatur Rex usque ad desperationem, et percutante usque ad vitalia veneno, prædixit ad extrema: licet alii assentiri ipsum non veneno sed morbo dytetrico expirasse. 334. The author of the Gesta Ludovici, viii. does not notice the report of poison; and Brial, in a note upon the passage from Matthew Paris above cited, contends that the account is altogether fabulous, because the King did not die till the 8th of November, and Thibaud quitted the army, without leave, about the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin, August 15, as we learn from the Gesta Ludovici, viii. 309. But surely, if Thibaud were bent upon the crime, he might find agents enough for his purpose without being himself present. Lobineau positively asserts the poisoning, without determining its author. Hist. de Bretagne, vii. 48. p. 219. He admits that the passion of Thibaud for Blanche often hurried him into extravagances injurious to his interests; but, nevertheless, he is unwilling to credit any assertion on the testimony of Matthew Paris, whom he attacks very mercilessly, and very unjustly.*

‡ Guilelmus de Podio, c. 34. p. 687.

§ 269.

|| Gesta Lud. viii. 310.

History. change by which the Chronicler has corrupted this name for the benefit of the Soothsayer. Montpancier is but a different spelling of Mont pancier,* and Montpancier is plainly an inversion of la pance du Mont, or Montia venter. Every King is by courtesy a Lion, and it would be a grievous want of accommodation to be over-scrupulous about his pacific qualities, when nothing else is wanted to make the prediction square with Truth.†

Regency of It appears doubtful whether Louis VIII. on his death-bed appointed Queen Blanche Regent during the ensuing minority:‡ But although a foreigner, and therefore an object of jealousy, she was a woman of intrepid courage and commanding intellect; and in spite of the claim of Philippe Hurepel, Count of Boulogne, Brother of the late King, and the opposition of many powerful Barons, she obtained and upheld the representation of sovereignty during the long period of ten years. We need not enter into details of the numerous contests in which, during the earlier part of that time, she was engaged with several of the great Feudatories, each of whom appeared desirous to form a petty independent Kingdom. The chief of these disaffected Nobles was Pierre de Dreux, Count of Brittany, one of those spirits which seem gifted with some principle of general resistance; who, as it suited his convenience, renounced from time to time the allegiance which he owed both to France and to England, and who, from his uncompromising disobedience to the Church, obtained the significant name of Maulclerc§ The King of England, Henry III., testified willingness to support him and even armed for his assistance. But Henry was a weak Prince; and on one occasion the Favouritell by whom he was ruled accepted a bribe to retard an expedition which was already equipped; on another the indolence and voluptuousness of the Monarch himself prevented a landing which he had effected in Brittany from producing any important result. The King of England had shown a blind devotion to the Church, and the claims advanced by him upon the Provinces in France, which had been wrested from his Crown in former reigns, were on that account sanctioned by two successive Popes, Honorius III. and Gregory IX. To this list of Blanche's enemies must be added Thibaud of Champagne,¶ who twice embraced the party of the Contest with the Barons, and Henry III. of England.

A. D.

1229.

A. D.

1230.

Thibaud of Champagne.

Barons, and twice failed them at a critical moment; unable, as the scandal of the times would persuade us, to resist the reproaches or the caresses of his Mistress. Indignant at his vacillation, the disappointed condeco-derates turned their arms against Champagne, and not only ravaged the Count's dominions, but raised up a claimant for their inheritance. Henry II. Count of Champagne, uncle of Thibaud, during the IIIrd Crusade had married Isabella, Queen of Jerusalem and Cyprus, widow of Conrad, Marquis of Montferrat; and Alice, Queen of Cyprus, the issue of that marriage, asserted a right to the Fief of Champagne, in preference to her cousin Thibaud, the son of Henry's younger brother. Thibaud replied, that Alice was illegitimate, since a former husband of Isabella was living at the time of her union with his uncle. The decision of this claim was referred to the ordinary Feudal and Ecclesiastical tribunals; but mean time Thibaud, attacked on all sides, and worsted in more than one collision with the troops of his enemies, took refuge in Paris, and found himself compelled to give way to the storm. Philippe Hurepel was eager in demanding revenge for the death of the late King his Brother which he continued to impute to Thibaud; and the latter consented as a penance, (by which he in no small measure admitted the validity of the accusation) to serve with one hundred Knights in the Holy Land, at some time which being left indefinite rendered evasion easy. In the year following, a Treaty concluded at Treves, St. Aubin du Cormier put an end to the Wars of the Regency. The Barons were fatigued by their ineffectual resistance; and their ally Henry III., who naturally loved repose, consented to a Truce for three years, of which Philippe Hurepel was named conservator.

It may be convenient in this place to outrun strict chronological arrangement by relating at once the remaining particulars of Thibaud's History. A few years after the above events, the Crown of Navarre devolved to him on the death of his maternal uncle, Sancho VII.; and but a month before his accession to that Kingdom, the opportune decease of his chief enemy, Philippe Hurepel, (so opportune, indeed, that dark suspicion arose as to its cause,) disembarassed him from the pretensions of Alice, thus deprived of her chief supporter. The Queen of Cyprus surrendered her claims in return for a pension of two thousand livres; and the cession of Chartres, Blois, Sancerre, and Châteaudun to the Crown of France, provided Thibaud with the sum necessary to defray this compensation. Thus firmly established in all his dominions, the King of Navarre and Count of Champagne, the Faiseur des Chanoins, a title which he considered more glorious than either of the former, took the Cross in fulfilment of his promise to the Barons of France, and died peaceably on his return from Palestine in 1253.

The Fiefs obtained from Thibaud were not the only acquisitions made for the Crown of France during the wise and vigorous Regency of Blanche. On the death of Louis VIII., Raymond of Toulouse acquiring fresh courage took the field with an activity and success which it is to be regretted that he sullied by grievous cruelties. But the War in Languedoc from its commencement had been distinguished by a savage disregard for humanity; and Raymond, when he brutally

* Lobineau, by a strange mistake, writes Montpelier.

† En effet, à l'aide de ces interprétations, la prophétie parait parfaitement claire, is the acute conclusion of M. de Sismondi, Hist. des Français, vi. 538.

‡ Blanche was not appointed Regent by the Will of Louis VIII., which is given in his Gesta, 310; but there is still extant a Declaration by the Archbishop of Sens, and the Bishops of Beauvais and Chartres, that the dying King had so named her in their presence. Sismondi expresses a suspicion as to the authenticity of this Declaration, vii. 52. note.

§ Unless we render the word, in opposition to Beuclerc, as le mauvais avent. Sismondi, vii. 25.

¶ Hubert de Burgh, Chief Justice of England. Henry was so indignant at finding that his fleet was insufficient to transport the troops already assembled at Portsmouth, that he drew his sword and would have killed the treacherous Minister, had he not been soothed by Pierre Mauclerc who was present. Matt. Paris, 363. Lobineau, Hist. de Bretagne, vii. 75. p. 225. makes Rainulf, Count of Chester, mediator on this occasion, and places the arrival of Mauclerc in England after Hubert's disgrace. Matthew Paris is likely to be the more correct of the two.

¶ The Cardinal Legate of St. Angelo was said to share the smiles of Blanche in common with Thibaud; and Matthew Paris advances the charge against her reputation in terms of grossness not to be transcribed. (308.) After all, the conduct of Thibaud is much more that of an expectant, than of a satiated lover; and we are inclined to think that the Queen has been traduced, and that she did no more than exercise that legitimate influence of beauty which the peris envying her well warranted her to employ.

History.

From
A. D.
1199,
to
A. D.
1314.
A. D.
1228.
Invasion of Toulouse.

mutilated two thousand prisoners,* no doubt palliated the crime in his own eyes, by an easy sophism, and advanced the necessity for reprisals. A fearful vengeance awaited him when the Crusaders spread themselves afresh round Toulouse; and the work of destruction was planned and arranged by Fouquet, Bishop of that City, whom we have seen, more than once before, dishonoured by conducting the persecution of that flock which he had been commissioned to fold in peace. "Every morning," says a contemporary Chronicler, "the besiegers attended Mass at daybreak, and each man assisted at it with passing devotion. After that, they took a sober repast, and then having posted sentinels on all sides to keep the garrison in awe, they detached three companies, each destined for a different purpose, and equipped with the necessary instruments for its performance. One with pickaxes demolished and overthrew houses and huddings; another with mattocks stripped and rooted up vineyards; and a third with sickles reaped and trampled under foot the grain. Night alone put a stop to this devastation, which was renewed on the following morn in similar order, and perhaps with greater barbarity. Nearly three months passed during which this distressing spectacle was daily renewed under the eyes of the Toulousians."†

Submission
of Raymond.
April 12.
A. D.
1229.

Toulouse was thus left the centre of a Desert; and Raymond, abandoned on all hands, and without hope of recruiting his exhausted resources, was compelled to submit to whatever terms the Cardinal Legate and the Court of France could be prevailed upon to grant. The conditions of the Treaty which he accepted sufficiently betokened the extremities to which he was reduced. He engaged to expel from his territories not only all the roustiers, that is the mercenaries who had fought under his banner, and other disturbers of the public peace, but to exterminate to the full extent of his power all Heretics and their fosterers, without sparing his friends, his Vassals, or even his kinsmen. Among these was specified by name the Count de Foix, his most faithful ally, whom he undertook to pursue by force of arms unless he promptly submitted. He promised to pay twenty thousand marks of silver in the course of the next four years; and out of that sum, apportioned to various Military and Ecclesiastical purposes, four thousand marks were to be dedicated for the support at Toulouse, during ten years, of four Doctors in Divinity, two of Canon Law, six Masters of Arts, and two Regents in Grammar; an establishment which may be considered as the germ of its celebrated University. Furthermore, he bound himself to take the Cross, and to depart forthwith to the Holy Land, where he was to abide during five years' space. In consideration of these marks of obedience he was permitted to hold for the term of his life, as a Fief, a portion of his existing territories; the remainder (with the exception of his possessions in Arles, which fell to Rome) was absolutely united to the Crown of France. Even the Provinces, which he was allowed to retain, were to form a dowry for his daughter Jeanne, whom "the Queen Regent was willing to accept" as a consort for one of her sons. If that marriage were unproductive of issue, the Fiefs, after Raymond's death, were to be annexed to France; and the claim of any issue of the Princess by a second marriage, if such should ever take place, or of any issue which Raymond himself might have hereafter, was strictly barred.* The fortifications of Toulouse and of thirty other large towns were to be razed, and eight cautionary fortresses, among which was Narbonne, were to be garrisoned by the French during ten years.

For Raymond, thus prostrated and impoverished, there was little further degradation in the public penance which he was enjoined to perform in the presence of the King, the Court of France, and the Legate, in Notre Dame at Paris, as an act of reconciliation to the Church. Yet the Chronicler, who has remarked that each single article of the above Treaty included a concession, which of itself might have sufficed as a ransom for the Count of Toulouse if he had been taken prisoner in battle, appears deeply moved by his final humiliation. "It was in truth," he exclaims, "a spectacle worthy of compassion to see so great a man, after so long and gallant a struggle, led to the foot of the altar like a malefactor, in his shirt and barefooted."† After six weeks' imprisonment in the Louvre, till his daughter had been placed in the hands of the Queen Regent and the other most important articles of his Treaty had been fulfilled, he received permission to return into Languedoc, and obtained a dispensation from the Pope relieving him from his service in Palestine. The exchange of Sovereigns which Languedoc thus underwent, might have been far from diminishing its general welfare, were it not that it contributed to the establishment within the walls of Toulouse of the most formidable tyranny which ever oppressed the spirit of mankind. It was immediately on the overthrow of Raymond, that the Holy Office first assumed a distinct form and permanent authority; and with a remarkable contrast of light and darkness, the University and the Inquisition of Toulouse were twin births of the same cradle.

On the expiration of the Truce of St. Aubin, Henry III. disembarked some troops in Bretany, surprised a detachment of the Royal Guard, and even plundered the King's equipage; but Mauclerc, whom Blanche might have found a dangerous enemy if he had again taken arms, having satisfied himself that the King of England was too weak and feeble to afford hope of permanent aid, discreetly renounced his alliance, and concluded amicable engagements with France. The marriage of her son was now the chief object of anxiety with Blanche, and she selected for his consort one of the most accomplished women of her days, Margaret, eldest daughter of Raymond Berenger IV., Count of Provence.‡ Of the restraint which Blanche's maternal authority imposed upon the new-married pair, some amusing and remarkable instances have been preserved to us; and the patience of Louis, great as it is well known to have been, must have been severely tried by the rigid inspection maintained over his domestic arrangements.§ This teasing interference scarcely appears to have terminated even when he attained the ripe age of one and twenty, and was nominally emancipated from his mother's Regency.

It is to the epoch of the majority of Louis IX. that one of the most romantic incidents of his life is assigned by some of the older Chroniclers. The Sultan of the Ar-

France.

From
A. D.
1199,
to
A. D.
1314.
Raymond does penance.

Establishment of the Inquisition at Toulouse.

A. D.
1234.

Marriage and majority of Louis.

A. D.
1236.

The Old Man of the Mountain

* The Treaty is given by Velly, ii. 322, from the Traité des Chrétiens de la Terre Sainte, t. 3, p. 2 and 60.

† Gul. de Podio, c. 39, p. 691.

‡ Eleanor, her younger sister, was married to Henry III. of England two years afterwards.

§ Joinville, p. 127. Ed. 1761.

* Matt. Paris, 349.

† Gul. de Podio, 38, p. 690.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314. counter-orders the assassination of Louis IX.

sacides, more familiarly known as the Old Man of the Mountain, is said, from some motive not explained, to have despatched two of his fanatical Assassins, with instructions to take the French King's life; and afterwards repenting of his design, from a no less unexplained cause, to have sent out other envoys to overtake the former if possible, and, at all events, to forewarn Louis of his danger. The King of France was sorely alarmed, and immediately marshalled a Body-guard of vigilant warders armed with brzen maces. The first messengers were discovered by their brethren before they had proceeded further than Marseilles; and all four were afterwards received by Louis at his Court with great distinction, and dismissed with liberal gifts. This story, long admitted as authentic, does not wear much appearance of probability; but it was treated with gentleness when examined by the Parisian Académie des Belles Lettres; and the Editor of the Mémoires of that learned Body, as if reluctant to surrender any legend of his canonized King, gives the Divines who, according to custom, were appointed to pronounce an annual eulogy on St. Louis, full permission to employ the anecdote, without imputation upon their veracity.

Purchase of the Crown of Thorns.
Aug. 18.
A. D.
1239.

A deliverance so notable could not but excite deep gratitude to Providence; and it must have been with no slight pious joy that Louis soon afterwards was enabled to obtain possession of a Relic, the most distinguished in the Christian World. The Crown of Thorns had been pledged to a Venetian Merchant, in order to satisfy the pressing necessities of the Latin Emperor of Constantinople; and for a sum amounting to about £7000 of our present money, Louis was allowed to become owner of that inestimable treasure. The negotiation was conducted with due avoidance of Simony; Louis made a voluntary offering of the gold, and received a gratuitous donation of the Crown. True it is that the Monks of St. Denis already boasted the possession of one true similar Crown, the authenticity of which had been avouched by many and even recent Miracles; but that of Constantinople was readily admitted to be the more authentic of the two; and the King himself, with bare head and feet, carried it in solemn procession from the Bois de Vincennes to the Chapel of his Palace; and not long afterwards enshrined it, with many other costly Relics, in a gorgeous sanctuary, La Sainte Chapelle, built expressly for their reception.

Erection of La Sainte Chapelle.
A. D.
1241.

Hugues de la Marche refuses homage.

Some troubles in Languedoc were suppressed by the activity of Louis almost as soon as they arose; but the investiture of his brother Alfonso (married in pursuance of the Treaty with Raymond VII. to that Prince's daughter Jeanne) with the Fief of Poitou, provoked open rebellion. Hugues, Count de la Marche, who had taken to wife Isabelle, Queen Dowager of England, (the lady who many years before had been wrested from him by the late King John,) asserted the claim of his step-son, Richard, Earl of Cornwall,* upon the conquered Province, and refused his homage to Alfonso. The King was abandoned at Poitiers by most of the Barons whom he had summoned to witness the ceremony, and lying without troops in the immediate neighbourhood of a considerable armed force which his disobedient Vassal had assembled, he heartily wished himself back again at Paris; a wish which, as Joinville adds, he could not realize till after fifteen days' anxious suspense, and some compromise with the Count de la Marche, of the precise nature of which the Chronicler is unable to inform us.†

Hugues was well aware of the uncertain tenure of a reconciliation thus effected by necessity, and he lost no time, therefore, in strengthening himself by alliances. Raymond of Toulouse, smarting under the deprivation of the chief portion of his dominions, and jealous of the aggrandizement of his daughter in her husband's new Fief of Poitou at his own expense, was easily allured to join in a projected League against France; and he received the hand of a daughter of Hugues and Isabelle (thus a half sister of Henry III.) in the hope of issue, by which he might disinherit Alfonso and Jeanne. The Kings of England, of Aragon, of Castile, and of Navarre, and Trencavel, Viscount of Bézans and Carcassone, (son of that gallant Raymond Roger, who had perished thirty years before in the dungeons of Simon de Montfort,) entered into a confederacy with the Count de la Marche; and it was agreed that he should withhold an open declaration of resistance till Alfonso held his first Court at Poitiers. On that occasion, Hugues publicly renounced allegiance to the French Prince, whom he stigmatized as a usurper; and accompanied his defiance by an act of fierce insult, setting fire to the house in which he had been lodged, and then galloping furiously from the City.‡

War was now inevitable. Henry III., in spite of the disinclination loudly expressed by his Parliament, embarked with his brother, the Earl of Cornwall; and before the close of March landed with his Queen, three hundred Knights, and a considerable treasure,§ at the mouth of the Gironde. During the following month, Louis actively employed himself in reducing the chief towns of Poitou. Before one of them, Fontenay, Alfonso was severely wounded; and on its surrender the King consented to raze it to the ground as some expiation for his brother's sufferings. The Courtiers would have pushed his vengeance to far more odious severity; and they urged him to put to an ignominious death a natural son of the Count de la Marche, who commanded the garrison, and more than one hundred captive Knights and soldiers, who served under him. The King's reply was noble, and in full accordance with many other testimonies of his generous spirit which History has recorded. "The one," he said, "has not

* The original reporter of this adventure is Gul. de Nangis, ap. Duchesne, v. 332. The examination of the story by M. l'Évêque de la Ravallière may be found in the Mém. de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, xvi.

† It was to the spinea corona entire, not to a "prickle" of it, as we have inadvertently said in p. 625 of this volume, that the recovery of Louis VIII., when an infant, was attributed in 1191. Rigordus, ap. Hist. des Gauls, xviii. 34. Yet later, in 1196 and in 1206, it was employed by the Monks of St. Denis to reduce inundations of the Seine. Id. 45. 61. Febliien, Hist. de Paris, 294, 295, has given an account of the Translation of the genuine Crown to Paris; and he mentions, that after its arrival it was exhibited to the populace by the Clergy on a lofty scaffold erected near the Church of St. Antoine des Champs. The spot on which this solemnity occurred is still called La Guellette, from the old verb guelter, (Ital. guastare.) to regard attentively. See also Guilelmus de Nangis, 333.

* Second son of King John.

† Saint Louis aurait bien voulu être arrière à Paris, mais comme il n'eut partie tant qu'il fut accordé au Comte de la Marche.

* Matt. Paris, 579.

† Id. 580.

‡ Id. 582, 583.

From Ann
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

League against France.

Order granted by Henry III.

Henry III. lands in France.
A. D.
1212.

Generous conduct of Louis de France.

History.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Battle of Tallébourg,
July 21.

committed any crime in obeying his Father, nor the others in fulfilling the orders of their General.”*

The King of England concentrated his forces at Taillebourg in order to dispute the passage of the Charente, but he was greatly outnumbered by the French; since, with the exception of the Count de la Marche, not one of his allies had put their promised contingent in motion. Alarmed at this inferiority, he despatched the Earl of Cornwall to attempt negotiation; and that Prince, who had just returned from the Holy Land, divesting himself of his armour, and bearing a Pilgrim's staff, approached the French camp. Richard had served with great distinction in Palestine, where he had deservedly won the gratitude of many French Knights, who were indebted to him for freedom. His reception, therefore, by his ancient comrades in arms was most kind and affectionate; and in the King's tent he was hailed, not as a messenger from the enemy, but as a Kinsman and as a Soldier of the Cross.† Yet, during this parley, so far as we are able to collect from the indistinct narrative of the Chroniclers, the French, partly in boats and partly traversing a narrow bridge which ought to have been better defended, lodged a detachment on the opposite bank of the river; and the English, struck with panic, fled precipitately to Saintes. So hot was the pursuit that many French entered the gates together with the fugitives, and were made prisoners in spite of their success.‡ Two days afterwards, a severe battle was fought under the walls of Saintes, which terminated somewhat to the advantage of the French. Discouraged by these reverses, little confident in either the ability or the constancy of Henry, and manifestly deceived by his other allies, the Count de la Marche opened secret negotiations with Louis; and the King of England after a few days' abode in Saintes, which he had resolved to maintain against a siege, learned at the same moment that its terrified inhabitants were preparing to open their gates to the enemy, and that Hugues, by whose invitation he had commenced the War, was treating for a separate Peace. His alarm on the receipt of this intelligence assuredly was not without cause, and its effects are most graphically described by Matthew Paris. Messenger after messenger poured in, breathless and panting, to announce some new addition of peril; and it plainly appeared that nothing but instant and most rapid flight could save the whole army from destruction. Dinner was about to be served when the King's terror was raised to its height by fresh and more authentic confirmation of the treachery of his allies; and hastily rising from table, hungry and empty as he was, he spared neither his horse's flanks nor his own spurs, little regarding who of his people had the power of following. For two days and nearly two nights before he reached Blaye on the Garonne, he neither ate nor slept; and the sufferings of his army in its tumultuary

Battle of Saintes,
July 23.
Hugues treats for a separate Peace.
Alarm and flight of Henry III.

Blaye,

* Matt. Paris, 588. Alfonso's wound is mentioned by Gul. de Nangis, 337. Fontenay, after its destruction, received the name of L'Abattu.

† Receptus est cum summo honore a Francis, et vocabatur eum multi Redemptorem suum, quia per compositionem Pacis eos in Terris Suis liberaverat. Matt. Paris, 590. The King of England and France and the Earl of Cornwall had married three sisters, daughters of the Count of Provence.

‡ This is the account given by Joinville. (Johnes's Translation, 115.) The relation by Matt. Paris is somewhat different. Both Writers, however, agree as to the unkingly haste with which Henry retired: Festinus non peperci calcaribus, are the words of the latter, 590.

retreat before it rejoined him were most acute. No provision had been made for this unexpected movement, and the only scanty sustenance which his famishing soldiers could procure during their march, was derived from the wild berries which they plucked by the roadside. The loss of men and horses was consequently great, so great says the Chronicler as to move abundant tears from all who beheld it.*

Louis, content with the entire discomfiture of his enemy, exercised great moderation and forbore pursuit. Yet the King of England renewed his ignominious flight, not thinking himself secure till he had gained the coast at Bourdeaux.† On entering Saintes, Louis received the submission of the Count de la Marche, who did homage to Alfonso as Count of Poitiers. The Count, says Joinville, “knowing that he could not amend himself for the evil that he had done, surrendered himself, his wife and children, prisoners to the King, who, on consenting to a Peace, gained many considerable territories from the Count.‡ I have heard that with the lands the King acquired, the Count de la Marche gave him an acquittance for ten thousand livres Paris which he was wont to receive from him annually.”§ Louis, however, was far from pushing him to extremity, and a noble anecdote of his generosity to another adherent of the English Crown deserves record as most honourable both to himself and to its object. Amid the general defection from Henry which followed his retreat, a single Vassal, Hertolde Sieur de Mirambeau, strictly mindful of his allegiance, offered to maintain his Castle, on the frontiers of La Saintonge and Bourdelois, against the approaches of the French: provided by so doing he could assist the English and they could promise him ultimate relief. To make known this intention he traversed the Country to Bourdeaux; and in a personal interview with Henry learned from him his utter inability to afford assistance, and received permission to adopt whatever course might best ensure his safety. Hertolde, on this declaration, promptly repaired to Louis and tendered submission. The King replied that he was well informed of all that had passed with Henry, that Vassals thus faithful deserved recompense, and that Hertolde's Castle and Fiefs should still remain his own without further guarantee than his oath of allegiance.||

France.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

and Bourdeaux.
Submission
of the Count de la Marche.

Fidelity of Hertolde de Mirambeau, generously rewarded by Louis IX.

* The first messenger of evil tidings is described as festinus et anxius; then, jam prandia paraverant omnes Anglorum adii, praeambuli, procuratores et mariscalci; et incunctim cum Rex praeveniens fuit, festinanter audito secundo nuncio, &c. The loss of dinner evidently haunts the good Monk's imagination as the heaviest calamity of all which Henry and his soldiers endured, and is the subject of repeated allusions: non porrens equinus interitus vel acutus calcaribus, iter versus Blavium festinanter fugitivus continuavit, non multum curans quis eorum suorum sequeretur, jejuna praestitis et inanis. The Nobles followed as they could, semocincti cibariis relictis, subditi imprans, arreptis equis velociteribat. Last of all came the main Body impransus alio, and pro debilitate defecebat. Et nisi primum et primum sylvestrium obiter refocillarentur rasilis interim edulis, animae in ipais defeceissent. The distance from Saintes to Blaye does not exceed forty miles, and since Henry rode at full speed, he probably missed his way or found it necessary to make a circuit; for without some such supposition his allowance of time is most extravagant; non enim considerat vel dormierat jam per dies duas et etiam duas fecit noctes. Matt. Paris, 592, 593.

† In this second race, Henry lost Capellen suum, id est omnia Sacerdotia praeciosissima, et multa alia quae longum est enumerare, praeter reliqua. Id. ibid.

‡ What these territories were Du Cange has shown in a note upon this passage, by printing the Treaty itself from the Tricor des Cories.

§ P. 116.

|| Matthew Paris diminishes the effect of this fine anecdote by History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Contagion
in the French
army.
Truce with England,
April 7,
A. D.
1243.

Peace with Raymond of Toulouse.

Dangerous illness of Louis IX.
A. D.
1244.

If Louis designed to complete his success by chasing the English from Bourdeaux, a task which probably would have been attended with little difficulty, his hope was frustrated by the appearance of a contagious malady among his troops. The unhealthy climate of Poitou, the heats of a Summer passed amid marshes, and the very inadequate supplies which had been provided for the maintenance of the army, (an almost invincible failure in the Wars of that period,) had generated fever and dysentery which made frightful ravages. The King himself suffered under the disease, and unable to pursue active operations, he signed a Truce with England, to continue for five years.* But Raymond of Toulouse was still in arms in the South, the Albigenes had again shown themselves, and the peasants had risen to obtain deliverance from the bloody and intolerable yoke of the Inquisition. Several of the officers and agents of that fierce and relentless Tribunal had been put to death, and if the Spanish Kings had fulfilled their portion of the Treaty, it is probable that Languedoc might again have recovered independence. But their inactivity, and the reverses of Henry III., compelled Raymond to follow the example of the other Barons with whom he had been leagued; and Louis, with unexampled lenity, consented to receive him into grace, on terms similar to those which had been concluded in the Treaty of Paris thirteen years before.

Thus terminated the long struggle which the great Vassals of the Crown of France had maintained with their Sovereigns during nearly one hundred and forty years, from the reign of Louis le Gros; and the independence of the Feudal Aristocracy, which was broken by Philippe Auguste, may be considered as altogether crushed by Louis IX. It was on another and a far distant theatre that the virtues of this great, wise, and good Monarch were now about to be displayed. The seeds of disease which he brought with him from Poitou, did not fully develop themselves for more than a year afterwards, and by lurking in a frame by no means vigorous, they probably acquired much additional strength. Towards the close of 1244, he was so enfeebled by an attack of dysentery at Pontoise,† that all hope of recovery was abandoned. France at that announcement presented one face of tears and desolation. The streets of the Capital and of the chief towns were thronged with votive processions, the Churches with suppliants. The prayers ordered by the Clergy were anticipated by the eagerness of the people, and every individual in the Kingdom awaited the issue of life and death with not less anxiety than he would have manifested for the safety of a Parent. "So bad was the King's state," says Joinville, "that I have heard the tears with which he has so plentifully bedewed it. According to his account, Hertolde waited upon the King of England, post lamenta, lacrymas adhibens, et ab alto corde tracta supplicia; on his arrival he addressed Henry, genus perfunctum lacrymarum, cunctis aquarum deducebant oculis ejus, singulisque sermones suos inter-rumpentibus; and he afterwards proceeded to Louis, flens et ejulans, crinibus hirsutis et oculis præ fletu rubicundis, 593, 594. All this weeping is much out of character with the firmness, frankness, and fidelity of the chief actor. But every one who has read Villehardouin must recollect the frequency with which the Chroniclers of those days dissolved their Heroes in tears.

* Henry III. abandoned the Isle of Rhé and some fortresses which he had taken in the late campaign, and agreed to pay £5000 sterling annually to France. Matt. Paris, 600, and the Treaty in Rymer, in which latter document the tribute is not mentioned.

† Gul. de Nangis and Les Chron. de St. Denis. Joinville says the illness occurred at Paris.

that one of the Ladies who nursed him, thinking all was over, wanted to cover his face with a cloth, but that another Lady, on the opposite side of the bed, (so God willed it,) would not suffer his face to be covered, declaring continually that he was alive. During the conversation of these Ladies, our Lord worked upon him and restored to him his speech. The good King desired them to bring him a crucifix, which was done; and when the good Lady his mother heard that he had recovered his speech, she was in the utmost possible joy; but when she came and saw that he had not put on the Cross, she was panic-struck, and seemed as if she would rather have seen him dead.*

It cannot occasion surprise either that Louis made this vow, or that the Queen-Mother regarded it with alarm. From his youth upward the King had manifested a most profound feeling of devotion; and the desolation which the Kharizimians, expelled from their native seats by the advance of the Mogul Tartars, were now spreading over the Holy Land; their indiscriminate massacre of the followers both of Christ and of Mohammed; and the profane fury with which they visited every spot held sacred by the former, were calculated to excite a more than usually ardent wish in every mind engrossed by the Religious sentiment of the times, even when not operated upon by the near prospect of the grave, to dedicate itself to the rescue of Palestine. On the other hand, the Crusades had insatiably swallowed up the best blood and the richest treasures of Europe. Few were the feet which trod homeward again from Palestine; and Blanche had seen that those who went out full, returned altogether empty. Exclusively also of the perils which maternal affection described in a far removed and most hazardous seat of War, no small danger was to be apprehended from a renewal of domestic troubles in France, during the long absence of that hand by whose courage and ability they had so lately been repressed. All these arguments were urged, but in vain; and Louis pointedly declared that food should not pass his lips till he had registered his vow publicly and with the customary ceremonies. From that moment, we are assured, that he was slowly but uninterruptedly convalescent.

Before his departure for the East, a fortunate conjunction of circumstances enabled Louis to add materially to the strength of his own House, and to prevent the consolidation of a Power which might have proved greatly injurious to France. Of the four daughters of the Count of Provence three were already richly married, and a Queen of France, a Queen of England, and a Countess of Cornwall, acknowledged Raymond Berenger IV. as their Father. In order to prevent the absorption of his independent dominions by a greater sovereignty, or their exposure to Civil war by partition, the Count of Provence determined to make his youngest

* P. 116. Matt. Paris affirms that it was Blanche herself who affixed the Cross on her son while he was apparently in extremity, 631. A little onwards he relates that which he terms civitas ac pia Regia Francorum deceptio, through which Louis obtained a number of recruits for the Crusade, by privily sowing Crosses upon the lanes which he distributed at Christmas. The officers of his household, thus unwittingly distinguished, were invited to attend the King at Mass before daybreak; and when the sun rose and streamed into the Chapel, every man, ignorant that he himself wore a similar badge, remarked the Cross upon the shoulder of his neighbour. Upon which occasion, fit jocunda admiratio, quod pui nephotici sic decepti eos dominum Rex; whom, on account of this seriocomico, practical joke, they called, cum jocundi lacrymarum officio, pergravidorum venatorum et hominum novum piscatorem, 690.

History daughter, Beatrice, his sole heiress; and by espousing her to Raymond of Toulouse, to unite the whole Provençal nation under a single head, and thus to found a Kingdom in the South of France, nearly equal in extent to that possessed by the House of Capet, and far exceeding it in Wealth and Civilization.

That Raymond was already married to a daughter of the Count de la Marche was considered but a slight obstacle to this new arrangement. Those nuptials had been contracted without a Dispensation, which the far-extended consanguinity recognised by the Romish Church made necessary, and it was believed that the Pope would not hesitate to pronounce its dissolution. Before the requisite steps, however, could be taken, the Count of Provence died, and the publication of the Will by which his territories were devised altogether to Beatrice, raised other suitors, besides Raymond, for her hand. The King of Aragon proposed his son, Don Pedro, and Charles of Anjou, brother of Louis IX., advanced his own pretensions. The States of Provence expressed themselves in favour of the latter; Louis IX. marched troops into the South, under the plea of securing the rightful portion of his Queen's inheritance; Raymond was ejected to present himself at Aix, unaccompanied by any armed force; the Pope deluded him by perpetually-evaded promises of forwarding the necessary Bulls, which, at the expiration of three months, he altogether refused; and Charles of Anjou, having joined the French army of occupation, to which no other force was opposed, was received with open arms by the Provençals, and became the Bridegroom of their richly-portioned Princess.

The devotion of Louis IX., although not untinged with the fanaticism of his times, was pure, sincere, and elevated; and his assumption of the Cross did not arise from either of the motives which most usually swelled the ranks of the Crusaders—heat of constitutional temperament discharging itself through the channels of superstition, or remorse of conscience seeking expiation for past crime in a warfare believed to be peculiarly acceptable to Heaven. Religion with this great Prince was neither the acute disease of a too fiery and fevered spirit, nor the empiric and desperate remedy of one troubled and ill at ease: it was a calm, fixed, and steady principle. The many noble instances of humility, of patience, and of self-control, recorded by every pea which has touched upon his History, sufficiently evince the genuineness of his Christianity; as disfigured as it might be (for how in those times should it be otherwise?) by occasional follies and weaknesses.* In points of Faith he might submit too blindly to the guidance of Priests; in personal habits he might be too severe and ascetic; but his resolution to devote himself to the Crusade was not a sudden burst of enthusiasm roused to explosion by the preaching of a zealot; but the slowly-determined and mature resolve of long meditation upon that line of action which he thought most agreeable to the will of God and most conducive to his own eternal welfare. A design so formed was not easily to be shaken, and his preparations, although necessarily occupying much time, were never intermitted. To ensure the repose of France during his absence, he anxiously desired to convert the Truce with England into a definitive Peace; and it is believed that he offered terms so advantageous, that no one but so weak and short-sighted a Politician as Henry III. would have demurred to accept them. That Prince, although his treasury was exhausted and his subjects were disaffected, thought it not enough to recover amicable possession of a large portion of the former dominions of his Crown, if any part were denied to him; he met the proposals coldly, and would give no further pledge, excepting that during the continuance of the Crusade he would not renew hostilities.

Another important object with Louis was to prevent the great Vassals of his Crown, now happily subdued, from profiting by a brief removal of the curb of his authority; and here he was far more successful than with the King of England. The Counts of Burgundy, of Brittany, of Angoulême, and of St. Paul, assisted at a Parliament, and pledged themselves to follow in his retinue to the Holy Land. Others more dangerous, because discontented, trod in their steps; Raymond of Toulouse was bribed to join in the enterprise by investiture with Narbonne, and a gift of thirty thousand livres to defray his equipages; many of the Chiefs of Languedoc who had espoused the cause of the Albigenses, now assumed the Cross; and Trencavel of Beziers, who was among them, renounced in favour of Louis all pretension to his hereditary Fiefs.

France was without a Port in the Mediterranean which could form a point of communication with Palestine; and notwithstanding its shifting sands and intractable coast, Louis undertook to found a town for that purpose at Aigues-Mortes at the mouth of the Rhone; and after lavishing much toil and treasure on a pestilential shore, he succeeded for a short time in triumphing over Nature. Then, being informed that Haco King of Norway had signified his intention of visiting Palestine, he despatched Matthew Paris, the Historian, as Envoy to that Prince's Court; inviting him to join his own expedition, offering to place a large detachment of troops under his immediate orders, and to give him, as a skilful navigator, the entire command of the French fleet. Haco replied with discretion, that he feared the vicinity of the French and the insubordination of his own subjects could scarcely be brought into contact without dangerous collision; he therefore declined the close confederacy which Louis had proposed, but gratefully accepted permission to touch at his Ports, and to procure supplies.*

His house being set in order, his Will revised and attested, and reparation of all wrongs which he was conscious of having committed against his neighbour being tendered—preliminaries necessary to be executed by every Knight engaged in a Crusade†—Louis summoned his Barons to Paris, received their oaths of allegiance to his children, and appointed the Queen-Mother, Blanche, Regent during his absence. His consort Margaret, and his brothers Robert of Artois and Charles

* Matt. Paris, 741. where he describes Haco as vir discretus, modestus ac bene litteratus.

† Joinville, who in the commencement of his voyage suffered greatly from sea-sickness, and who seems to have viewed all the marvels of Ocean with the eyes of a confined landman, gives a sound reason for thus previously making a clean breast, in a reflection which occurs to him when going to bed for the first time on shipboard. "I must say here that he is a great fool, who shall put himself in such dangers having wronged any one or having any mortal sin on his conscience, for when he goes to sleep in the evening, he knows not if in the morning he may not find himself under the sea." 119.

France.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314. who only consents to protract the Truce.
A. D.
1246.

Many of the French Barons take the Cross.
A. D.
1247.

Foundation of Aigues-Mortes.

Embassy of Matt. Paris to Norway.

A. D.
1248. attempts conclude Peace with Henry I.

* Many silly monastic austerities, which Louis IX. practised, are recorded in a Life of St. Louis by the Confessor of his Queen, Margaret, printed at the end of Joinville, in the Edition of 1761.

History. of Anjou, were companions of his voyage; Alfonso of Poitiers was to follow in the ensuing Spring. The Pilgrim's scrip and staff and the Oriflamme were delivered to the King with great solemnity at St. Denis; he recommended himself to the prayers of his Clergy, and then, at the head of only his immediate cortège, he proceeded to the Gathering at Aigues-Mortes. On passing through Lyon he held a conference with the Pope, who, driven from his own Capital by occurrences which will find a place elsewhere, had taken refuge in that City. Almost the latest act of the King while in France was one evincing unexampled forbearance. Near Avignon, the recollection of former persecution was still vivid, and a band of peasants bearing rooted hostility to the French name, cut off some stragglers from the Royal company, put them to the sword, and plundered their baggage. Louis was strongly urged to lay siege to the City, and at one blow to inflict punishment for both the present outrage and his Father's untimely death. "I am not quitting France," was his dignified answer, "to avenge the wrongs of my father, my mother, or myself, but rather those of my Lord and Saviour Christ."⁹ After two months' abode at Aigues-Mortes, he at length embarked on the 25th of August; his fleet consisting, as we are told, of thirty-eight galleys and a few smaller transports and palanders.[†] Cyprus was the rendezvous at which his larger force was to be assembled.

Outrage at Avignon.

Embarkation of Louis IX.

Raymond of Toulouse renounces Persecution in Languedoc, and dies, Sept. 27, A. D. 1249.

Probable motives occasioning the Crusade of St. Louis.

Our narrative of this disastrous expedition will be given in another Chapter appropriated to the Crusades, and we here confine ourselves to the little that is known of the internal History of France during the absence of her great King. One of the few important events, in the year following his departure, was the death of Raymond of Toulouse, in whom misfortune and advancing years produced a singular revolution. That early champion of the Albigenses, as he approached middle life, was changed into a confirmed Persecutor of Heresy. While preparing to fulfil his promise to Louis and to follow him to Palestine, he solicited the Pope to enjoin greater activity among the Inquisitors, in order that they might remove the stain of Heresy which had rendered Languedoc infamous; and to arouse them from that torpor which by too much indulgence had neglected the punishment of numerous relapsed offenders. Eighty victims were committed to the flames at Agens, by Raymond's own orders, and under his own eyes, as the first fruits of renewed Persecution; and as if this holocaust had been prepared as his vaticum, he died very shortly after it had been offered. The male line of Fredolin, to whom the Fief of Toulouse had been granted by Charles the Bald, expired in his person; and Blanche hastened to take possession of the Province in the names of Raymond's daughter Jeanne and her husband Alfonso of Poitiers, the latter of whom had already joined his brother, the King, in Palestine.

On the real motives which prompted a great movement among the Agricultural classes, the scantiness of the information which has descended to us forbids a positive decision. Matthew Paris, the fullest and in every respect the fairest Historian of these times, unhesitatingly ascribes it, in the first instance, to the wiles of the Devil; a general expression, which means nothing more than that he conceived it to be very wicked and very mischievous. A little onward, indeed, he declares that the chief actor was in the pay of the Sultan, and that the object was so far to drain France of her efficient population, as to expose her in nakedness to a Saracen invasion. There are some points in his narrative, however, which lead us to attribute the transaction to a wild and insane fanaticism similar to that which occasioned the Crusade of Boys a few years before. Other incidents again speak loudly of an awakened insight into the grievous abuses of Rome; and almost persuade us that the rising which we are about to relate, was generated by the nascent effervescence of that spirit which, in less than three Centuries afterwards, was to produce the Reformation. Under these doubts we shall confine ourselves as closely as we can to the words of the original authority.

A certain Hungarian, whose name is not recorded, but who is described as having been a renegade from his earliest youth, as having studied forbidden Arts in the brimstone-smelling schools of the Arabs at Toledo,[‡] and as serving in the household of the Sultan of Babylon, in his sixtieth year began to preach in France. He was master of the French, Latin, and German languages, he possessed a copious and fervent eloquence, and he pretended an especial mission from the Virgin Mary to call the Shepherds and herdsmen of France to a Crusade, in which they were destined by Providence to effect the deliverance of Palestine. As a voucher for his communication with Heaven, one of his hands, which he said grasped the written instructions of the Virgin, was kept perpetually closed. Without either Papal or Episcopal license, he scattered these doctrines widely by itinerant Discourses; and the class of rustics to whom he addressed himself, caught by the novelty of his teaching, the fervour of his manner, and the magnificence of his avowed object, flocked round him to the amount of more than one hundred thousand, assumed the badge of the Cross, and marshalled themselves in military array, under a standard blazoned with a lamb bearing a pennon; the lamb betokening humility and innocence, the pennon victory.

Blanche at first, deceived by the professions of the leader of this great, but as yet harmless company, believed that it might assist in the Holy War; and perhaps might release Louis from his captivity, the recent announcement of which had excited unbounded consternation. Far, therefore, from checking the movement in its outset, she regarded it with favour and encouragement. Meantime, a large addition of numbers, the dregs and scum of the population of France, thieves, outlaws, runaways, and the excommunicated, all who are included under the expressive term Ribaldi, had associated themselves with the Pastoureaux. Five hundred ensigns, each similar to the original standard, floated before the motley-armed ranks, in which glittered swords, axes, javelins, spears, and dirks. The doctrine of their leader and of his lay-preachers soon assumed a most heterodox course. They approved uncanonical marriages; they denounced all the Monastic Orders; the Preachers and the Minorites, they said were vagabonds and hypocrites; the Cistercians pillaged their flocks and swallowed up

⁹ Matt. Paris, 749.

[†] La Chaine, Hist. de Saint Louis, vi. c. 27. p. 356.

[‡] Diribit imperio videtur Inimicos hominum generis, habere fiduciam ut infucret Jordanis in eo rixu, quin jam de eo Soldani Babyloniam propinquarent, cum vidisset quod Fides Christiana etiam in partibus dulcis Gallia labaret ut laberetur, novum genus fallacis assueti ostendebat. p. 322.

[§] Qui praestigiis fallacis versuties a sulfureo puteo Tulei et pluvio exhauserat. Id. Rid.

History.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

lands; the Benedictines and the Cistercians were swollen with pride and gluttony; the Canons were half secular and gorged with carnality; the Bishops and their Officials were hunters after gain and covetous of loose delights. Their statements concerning Rome itself were too profane, says Matthew Paris, to be recited; nevertheless, if we are not greatly mistaken, the Historian feels a sly and pardonable malice in extending his record of these accusations so far as was consistent with his own personal safety; and probably he did not believe in his heart that they wandered very far from Truth. Matthew Paris was a Monk, but he was by far the most honest of his species.

Their preaching in Orleans.

Against the inclination of the Bishop and of all his Clergy, but with the good-will of the inhabitants, these Enthusiasts entered Orleans; and an infinite multitude thronged to hear the preaching of their leader. The Bishop forbade any Ecclesiastic from exposing himself to the hazard of these "mouse-traps of the Devil." The Clergy for the most part willingly obeyed this ordinance; and not without some terror and trembling, bolted and barred themselves in their chambers. Nevertheless, some younger students of Theology, less cautious and more curious, stationed themselves close to the scaffold upon which the Preacher mounted in the open air; and when, without giving out any text, he entered upon a furious and incoherent declamation against Church abuses, one of these youths, unable to restrain himself, called him "Liar and Heretic!" Ere the words were ended, the blow of a hatchet split the speaker's skull in twain; and the rabble breaking up tumultuously made a general attack upon the houses of the Clergy, burst in the doors and windows, burned many choice and rare books, plundered all the Priests, wounded several, and threw others into the Loire. About five and twenty were killed, and the number hurt was far more considerable. The Municipal Authorities and the chief Citizens had remained inactive spectators of these outrages, conniving at, if not encouraging the riot; and the Bishop, in consequence, as soon as the Pastoureaux had quitted the City, placed it under an Interdict. The Queen, when appealed to, acknowledged that she had been mistaken, and took prompt measures to repress further violence. The Pastoureaux, alarmed at this vigour, broke up and dispersed, and their leader endeavoured to prop his drooping cause by announcing that he would publicly exhibit some stupendous miracles. The stupid and giddy rabble assembled again at this promise to hear words which had never yet been heard and to see marvels which had never yet been seen; and one of them, indignant at the disappointment which it need not be added he encountered, brained the Impostor with an axe. His corpse was left unburied, and his chief assistants were hustled down "even as mad dogs," and put to death wherever they could be found. One in endeavouring to escape by sea to "Heathenland," was detected by the ship's crew, bound hand and foot, and thrown overboard. In his baggage was found a considerable sum of money, many papers scrawled with "prodigious" Chaldee and Arabic characters, and certain poisonous drugs made up into

Tumult in that City.

The chief Impostor is killed.

Death of two of his principal followers.

powders. There were some Letters also addressed to the Sultan reporting favourably of the progress of the enterprise. Another made his way into England, where he first gathered a congregation of about five hundred peasants in the neighbourhood of Sorham. His auditors, however, soon thought he was mad, and having chased him from his pulpit, and pursued him to a wood, in which he had taken refuge, they tore the unhappy wretch in pieces, and threw his dismembered body to the crows. So finished this remarkable commotion, which Matthew Paris assures us was esteemed by many grave and discreet personages and Prelates of deep reflection, the most formidable plague which had crept into the Church of Christ since the days of Mohammed.*

The courage and the wisdom of Blanche, notwithstanding these occasional interruptions of tranquillity, continued for the most part to preserve subordination in France; and her death, the precise date of which is not ascertained,† was a heavy calamity upon the Country which she ruled. As she felt herself gradually approaching her last hour, she was conveyed from Melun to Paris; and there, having received the veil in a Cistercian convent, she closed her useful and brilliant life;‡ in her sixty-fifth year, a few days after submission to that ceremony which was esteemed a safe-conduct to at least the Gates of Paradise. When intelligence of his great loss was conveyed to the King, now released from captivity and occupied in strengthening the fortifications of Sidon, he shut himself up in his chamber for two days, and refused admittance to any of his attendants. The account given by Joinville, who of all others appears to have enjoyed his chief confidence and the most familiar access to his person, is very touching from its simplicity. "On the third day he sent one of his valets to seek me, and on my presenting myself he extended his arms and said, 'Ah, Senechal, I have lost my mother!' " The good Knight's consolation in return was somewhat common-place, and partaking of the "budge doctrine of the Stoic fur." " 'Sir,' replied I, 'I am not surprised at it, for you know there must come a time for her death; but I am indeed greatly so that you, who are considered so great a Prince, should so outrageously grieve; for you know,' continued I, 'that the wise man says whatever grief the valiant man suffers in his mind, he ought not to show it in his countenance nor let it be publicly known; for he that does so, gives pleasure to his enemies and sorrow to his friends.' I thus appeased him a little, and he gave orders that most magnificent Religious services should be performed in the Country in which he then was, for the Salvation of the soul of the late Queen. He sent likewise to France a load of jewels and precious stones to the National Churches, with Letters from him to entreat they would pray to God for him and for the soul of the late Queen his mother."§

France.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Suppression of the enthusiasts

Death of Blanche.
A. D.
1252. or
A. D.
1253.

Grief of Louis IX.

* Astutus hæc omnia esse Diaboli manipulationes. Id. p. 823.
† Confluxit undique populorum numerosa multitudo, ut inaudita à sæculis tunc audirent, et viderent quæ antea non viderant. Id. p. 824.

‡ Quasi comes robati paucum detruncati. Id. Ibid.

§ Versus Paganismum unde venerat. Id. Ibid.

* There is a very brief account of the Crusade of Shepherds in Gul. de Naugis, p. 358; and in Matthew of Westminster one yet more so. Mirabilis prelia arsit in Francia de quibusdam reclusoribus, videlicet Pastoureaux, ad triginta milia multiplicatis. Omnes tamen evanescerant. 350.

† Most Writers name December 1, 1252, as the day of Blanche's decease; but Gul. de Naugis throws it a year later.

‡ Matthew Paris characterises her as dominorum secularium domina; and adds, magnanima Blanchia, exæ femina, consilio mascula, Senirami merito comparanda, vixit cunctis sæculis, regnum Francorum omni solio reliquit devotum. 859. We wish the indiscreet Panegyrist had let Senirami alone.

§ Joinville. Johnes's Translation, 222.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
He embarks
for France.
April 25,
A. D.
1254.
Dangers
of the voyage.
Generous conduct of the King.

The affairs of France now peremptorily demanded the return of Louis, and he embarked from Acre with Queen Margaret and his suite on the Festival of St. Mark, in the Spring of the following year. "The King told me," says Joinville, "he was born on St. Mark's day, and I replied that he might well say he had been born again on St. Mark's day, in thus escaping from such a pestilent land, where he had remained so long."^{*} But the perils of the expedition had not yet terminated. The Royal Galley struck upon a sand-bank off Cyprus during a fog, and was not disengaged till all on board had given themselves up for lost. On the morning after a night of no small peril, the King gave a memorable instance of calm and rational courage, and of kind consideration for the interests of others. Some divers who had passed under the vessel, in order to ascertain the extent of its damage, reported that eighteen feet of its keel had been stripped away; and the mariners were urgent with Louis to betake himself to a sounder ship; instancing the total loss of another Galley during the outward voyage in consequence of a similar accident. The single question which the King put to his Captains, and which he commanded them to answer upon their faith and loyalty, was this, whether they would abandon the ship if she were their own and full of merchandise? when they all replied in the negative. "Why then," he said, "should I quit her? If I do so, there are five or six hundred persons with me who must remain in Cyprus for fear of the danger which must happen to them if they remain on board, thus losing all chance of return to their own Country. I declare, therefore, that I will rather put myself, the Queen, and my children in this danger, under the good Providence of God, than make such numbers of people suffer as are now with me."[†]

This noble and generous self-devotion, happily, was justified by the event. The Galley soon afterwards, notwithstanding its previous injury, rode out a violent storm, in which the partitions in the Royal Cabin were swept away by the wind, and it was not till a fifth anchor had been dropped that a mooring was secured. On approaching Pantaleone, the Queen, who earnestly wished to procure a supply of its delicious fruit for her children, despatched some boats to land, and here again the King displayed both his kindness and his courage. The boats' crews were absent a much longer time than appeared necessary for the execution of their orders; and the Captain represented that they had probably been captured and detained by the Saracens who peopled the Island; that the immediate neighbourhood of Tunis and of Sicily, neither of whose Kings bore good will to the French, rendered any longer abiding in that Strait extremely hazardous to Louis; and that if he would give orders to make sail, a few hours would place him beyond the reach of danger. The King, on the contrary, immediately commanded the helm to be put about, and declared his intention of seeking after the missing sailors. They ill-deserved his thoughtfulness and condescension; they had been indulging in the luxurious gardens of the Island, and their selfish breach of discipline delayed the fleet at least eight days.^{*}

After ten weeks' voyage, the Royal party landed at Hieres, a Port belonging to the Count of Provence; the King's anxious desire to proceed to his own harbour at Aigues-Mortes having been overruled. He then advanced, by slow journeys, to Paris; and the magnificence of his reception, and the loud expressions of popular joy on his return, singularly contrasted with the profound melancholy of his own demeanour. No smile ever found its way to his lips, and he sat wrapped in moody abstraction, an unconcerned spectator of the festivities denoting public congratulation. Eyes fixed on the ground, and frequent sighs, betokened his bitter remembrance of his losses in the Holy Land, and the great misery which had resulted from them to his People. To a "holy and discreet Bishop," who endeavoured to console him, and who brought forward the received and well-handled examples of Job and St. Stephen, he answered, that if he alone suffered under the shame and the calamity, he could endure them patiently. But, alas! that his sin affected the whole Church, and all Christendom was thrown into confusion on his account. If we believe Matthew Paris, who relates these particulars, a Mass celebrated in honour of the Holy Ghost, at last prevailed upon him to admit some refreshment of spirit.[†]

To the same Historian we are indebted for a most picturesque and detailed narrative of a visit paid by Henry III. of England to his brother of France, some time after the latter had returned to his dominions; and many of the incidents by which this Royal meeting was distinguished, afford so lively an illustration of the habits of the times, that we cannot pass them wholly in silence. Henry's motives for this progress were to see France itself, his brother and sister-in-law, the Cities, Churches, and manners of the natives; and especially that noblest of Religious structures, La Sainte Chapelle, and the inestimable relics with which it had been enriched. Louis, on receiving a notification of this wish, immediately issued a safe-conduct for Henry and his train; and directed especial orders to the Governors of those towns through which his illustrious visitors would pass, to cleanse their streets, to remove from them every thing offensive to sight, and to deck the fronts of their houses and churches with flowers, green branches, and tapestry. When the two Princes first met, they rushed into each other's arms, and embraced repeatedly. The four daughters of Beatrice of Provence (the Queens of France and England, the Countesses of Anjou and of Cornwall) greeted one another with sisterly affection; and Beatrice herself, like another Niobe, regarded her progeny with just pride, for, in truth, there was no living woman in the World who might so rightfully glory in her issue.[‡]

* Joinville. Johnes's Translation, 224.

† Ibid., 226.

‡ Joinville puts some homilies into the King's mouth after this deliverance, which, if they be genuine, impress us more deeply with a belief of the sincerity of his gratitude, than of his power of expression. A miracle also is added concerning an Esquire who, having fallen into the sea, exclaimed inter cœdem, "Our Lady of Valbert!" and, on the strength of that invocation, floated safely for half a league, without attempting to swim or to exert himself, till he was picked up by one of the King's Boats; the crew of which, from the Esquire's want of motion, had at first mistaken him for a sea-chest. "In honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary," continues the narrator, "and to perpetuate this miracle, I had it painted in my Chapel at Joinville, and also on the windows of the Church at Blécourt." 230.

* Joinville. Johnes's Translation, 395.

† Matt. Paris, 495.

‡ The secundissimus et nobilissimus venter Comitissæ Provençæ Beatricis, as Matthew Paris elsewhere (956.) calls it, is a frequent theme for admiration with that Historian.

His kindness and courage.

France.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1311.

He embarks
for France.

His melancholy.

His visit to England.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

Louis dines with Henry in the Old Temple.

The students of the University of Paris, many of whom were English by birth, suspended their lectures and disputations; and in their holiday garb, crowned with chaplets, and singing to musical instruments, advanced in procession to meet the Royal train. The King of England was lodged in the Old Temple, but neither in that most spacious structure, fully competent as it was to accommodate even an army, nor in the adjoining houses in the Place de Grève, could all his attendants find room; and many of them accordingly slept in the open air. On the morrow, Louis dined with his illustrious visitor, and every apartment in the Temple was crowded with guests. No jealous warlike closed any of the gates, but every one who presented himself was admitted and bountifully entertained. Not even in the days of Arthur or of Charlemagne had so splendid a banquet been prepared; and words fail the Historian in which he may describe the abundant variety of dainties, the delicious richness of the wines, the polished attention of the serving men, the orderly arrangement of the guests, and the lavish munificence of the gifts distributed. There might you see among the French Barons one presented with a massive silver cup, another with a silken belt, a third with a golden buckle; all of them such tokens of friendship as it well became a King to give and Nobles to receive. There, indeed, were to be found unnumbered venerable personages, whose superiors, nay whose equals were not to be met with in the World.

Around the walls of the chief banquetting chamber were suspended as many shields as could be collected, and one of the most distinguished among them was that of Richard Cœur de Lion. A minstrel,* who perceived its device, laughingly inquired of Henry, how he could suppose that the French would enjoy themselves in company with that hero's buckle? If they eat, he said, while in sight of it, it must be with fear and trembling. The jest would have been rude and ill-timed, if it had been more than whispered; that it was not so, the continued harmony of the feast sufficiently proves, and it need scarcely therefore have provoked so much anger and incredulity as a modern French Historian has exhibited while relating it.†

Henry, with very delicate courtesy, placed the King of France in the chair, (as it would be termed in a modern entertainment,) supported by himself on the right, by the King of Navarre on the left hand; and when Louis would have declined that honour, and have vacated the highest seat in favour of his host, Henry excused himself by replying that he was a Vassal of the King of France, and would always continue so; and consequently that his Sovereign was entitled to pre-eminence. The private feelings and wishes of Louis relative to the claims of England upon Normandy and Aquitaine, were sufficiently implied in the answer, which the presence of his haughty Barons would not permit him to return in a tone higher than that of whispering. "Would that every one without offence could enjoy his rights!" The Royal table was spread with twenty-five covers. We are especially informed that twelve Bishops and eighteen Countesses were intermingled with the rest of the company, and that although it was a meagre day, on which fish alone ought to have regaled a Catholic palate, every luxury with which the Ars coquinaria of those times was acquainted was profusely exhibited. The King of England slept on that night in the Palace of Louis, who was peremptory in his request. "I am Lord and King in my own dominions," was his playful observation, "and therefore I insist upon being obeyed."

The chief objects in Paris which excited admiration among the English, (and a mention of them may probably acquaint us with some of our National deficiencies at the time,) were the elegance of the stuccoed houses, many of which presented three, four, or even a greater number of stories, the windows being thronged with an infinite multitude of both sexes.* Much and most confidential conversation passed between the two Monarchs in their subsequent interviews; and Louis frequently regretted that their bond of family connection could not be accompanied by stricter Political union; that the obstinacy of his great Vassals and of the Normans should prevent the completeness of their friendship; and that Rome should find gratification both for her violence and her arrogance by encouraging discord between them.† They parted with mutual expressions of esteem, the sincerity of which, on one side at least, is rendered undoubted by the love of Truth which always distinguished Louis.

The Truce between the two Kingdoms was prolonged, in consequence of this interview, for an additional three years; and Louis, on every subsequent occasion on which there was an interchange of diplomacy, manifested his good-will towards England.‡ He considered the claim of that Crown on Normandy as justly founded, and being acutely sensitive in point of conscience, had it depended upon himself only, he would gladly have made restitution. His character as a Statesman, indeed, is somewhat tarnished by the almost Monastic spirit which regulated his Political conduct after his return from Palestine, and which doubtlessly contributed greatly to his subsequent Canonization. Not content with the issue of an Ordinance commanding all the books of the Jews to be burned; another, by which every woman of doubtful virtue was to be stripped to her very undermost garment, and expelled from his dominions; he di-

France.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

Elegance of French domestic architecture.

Amicable professions of Louis.

Monastic spirit

Arrangements of the Banquet.

* Quidam jocularior. We do not feel quite certain of our translation in this place. It may be doubtful whether the word jocularior is used professionally, as we have rendered it, or whether it is simply "a merry fellow," in allusion to the joke which follows.

† Velly shows great seriousness after recounting this anecdote, and expresses a doubt as to its genuineness. C'est bien dommage que ce prétendu bon mot, rapporté avec tant d'affection par l'Historien Anglois, ne trouve aucun fondement dans l'Histoire. On n'y voit ni Philippe Auguste trembler, ni les Français fuir, ni les murs de nos villes tomber devant ce Prince qu'on suppose si redoutable. iii. 71. The alarm of the French at Richard may be spiritively exaggerated; but it can scarcely be thought that Matthew Paris, who relates the story very briefly and simply, and concludes without any comment, and de hac non amplius, invented the joke in order to flatter national pride.

* Elegantium domorum quæ de gipso, videlicet plestro, sunt in Civitate Parisiaca, et mansiones triceminas, et quatuor stationum, vel amplius. Matt. Paris, 900.

† Discordia nostra foematum præstat debacchandi Romanis et materiam superbendi. Id. 901. Notwithstanding the devout spirit by which Louis was animated, he had a keen perception of the vices and disorders of the Romanish See. At the moment in which he determined to leave Palestine, he expressed himself to Joinville as much concerned and grieved at heart "to quit such good and religious companions to return among such a set of wretches (si diligeat gens) as the Court of Rome consists of." 223. Velly has shown very remarkable candour in his observations upon this anecdote. iii. 60.

‡ In 1257 Embassadors were sent by Henry to demand restitution of his French dominions, quibus, says Matt. Paris, Rex Francorum modestè respondit, et Fratres ejus et Optimates Francorum asperè nimis, et negotiorum et negotiorum responderunt. 955.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314. and severe ordinances
of Louis IX.
Sept. 1.
A. D.
1256.

He strengthens the Inquisition,

and wishes to retire to a Monastery.

Wisdom of many of his Ordinances.

rected a most severe and mistaken proscription against the Lombard merchants, who had settled in France as Bankers; and on one and the same day all who followed that calling within the realm were arrested.* The single town of Asti had sent forth one hundred and fifty of these money-changers, relying on commercial protection; and the capital which they had lent on interest, as much to the national benefit as to their own, amounted to eight hundred thousand livres. Their trade, however, was pronounced to be Usury, and their moneys were confiscated. For themselves, they were delivered up to the Count of Savoy, at that time warring against their native City, committed by him to prison, in which they languished during many years of privation and suffering; until death released some of them from their miseries, and torture compelled others to purchase, by the surrender of their remaining property, a freedom which afterwards possessed little enjoyment.

A similar blind zeal induced the King of France to strengthen the establishment of the Dominicans in Paris, and to extend the powers of the Inquisition. In his application to Alexander III. for new and more active inspectors of Faith, he expressed his reluctance any longer to wear a Crown sullied by toleration of Heresy.† And so profoundly was he impressed with a belief that the superintendence of a Government, which he found himself unable to purify entirely from abuse, was incompatible with his Salvation, that he at one time determined to abdicate, and retire to a Cloister. This design was strengthened by the blasphemous encouragement of a Dominican, to whom he communicated it; and who remarked, that if the Virgin Mary was esteemed blessed for having carried the Son of God only nine months in her womb, much more so would Louis be when, after having assumed the Priestly habit, he might bear the same Divine personage in his hands all the days of his life. The remonstrances, however, of his Queen and of his Brothers eventually prevailed against this ascetic fancy.‡

Far greater wisdom marked some other portions of his legislation; and we may fairly attribute his mistakes to the prejudices of his time, his sounder policy to an intellect which not unfrequently burst from their control. Thus, after a long struggle, he succeeded in prohibiting within his dominions all Duels and even Judicial Combats; he obtained a partial reform in the Ecclesiastical Tribunals; he deprived the Clergy of many of those flagitious immunities which enabled them to escape punishment after the perpetration of the very foulest crimes; and he in some degree atoned for the ignorance and the cruelty of his persecution of the Bankers by restraining the oppressive rights of private Mintage, claimed during his reign by not less than four and twenty Barons; by regulating the national currency; and by forbidding the deterioration of Coin.

We have thrown together these legislative acts,* although they bear various dates, in order that we may not interrupt the continuity of our more active narrative. In 1259 a definitive Treaty with England was adjusted, in which Henry, at that time more than ever distressed by the insubordination of his Barons, obtained singularly advantageous terms from the generosity of Louis. Perigord, the Limousin, the Agenois, and parts of Quercy and Saintonge were confirmed to the English Crown in consideration of his surrendering of all claim upon Normandy, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, and Poitou, and the performance of homage for the restored Fiefs. So indignant were the inhabitants of the Provinces thus transferred, that, cherishing their resentment even after the decease of Louis, they refused to celebrate the Feast of his Canonization. In a similar spirit he concerted a Treaty with James I. of Aragon,† whose Fiefs in the South of France were perplexedly intermingled with his own; and by a slight present sacrifice he secured a reasonable prospect of unbroken Peace for the future. Henry III., before the close of the year in which his Treaty was concluded, did homage in Paris; and performed the additional melancholy duty of offering consolation to his ally and brother-in-law, on the death of his eldest son Louis, a Prince of extraordinary promise, who expired in his sixteenth year.

The refusal of the Crown of Sicily tendered to the acceptance of Louis IX. by Urban IV., is another splendid instance of the equity and the moderation which he assumed as his guides. He declined that glittering prize both for himself and for his sons, but he wisely permitted the ambition of his brother, Charles of Anjou, which had shown many symptoms of outbreak and might otherwise have proved dangerous in France, to expend itself in a contest which we shall relate elsewhere. Chosen as arbiter between Henry III. and the turbulent Barons of England, Louis maintained the full dignity of Kingly power, by annulling the Provisions of Oxford, which struck at the very foundation of Monarchy; and the Barons in return evinced how little worthy they were of being trusted with the exorbitant power the extortion of which they had sought to render permanent. Disregarding their oaths and the solemn compact by which they had agreed to receive the decision of the King of France as final, they rejected his equitable Sentence, renewed hostilities against their Sovereign, and plunged their Country once again into the horrors of Civil War.

Thus beneficially employed for France and for Europe, Louis passed thirteen years after his return from Palestine in almost unbroken tranquillity. His gentleness, his probity, and his disinterestedness, won for him a

* They were called Catacras, Caracras, or Cornas, either because they first settled at Cakors, or because one of their principal associates was a branch of the Florentine Corsini. Du Cange, ad v. Corsini.

† Raynaldus, ad ann. 1256. § 33. tom. ii.
‡ Richetti Chronica Semonensis, l. iv. c. ult. ap. D'Achery, Spicilogeum, ii. 645. Well might the compiler of that History term the Monk who thus advised Louis unus eorum qui ceteris audacior erat. The whole story is told with considerable noieité. The King, although much impressed by the Dominican's admonition, appears to have entertained considerable fears of proceeding without Queen Margaret's sanction, "sed prius valorem et iudicium Regine et ab eis impetrata huius facti licentiam." But he had calculated far too hastily upon this permission. Margaret, although mirabiliter stupfacta, wisely abstained from any reply; but, sending for the Count of Anjou and the Princes her sons, she asked the latter whether they preferred being called Sons of a King or of a Priest? All who were present, when the Queen explained the import of her question, abused Louis mercifully. Comes (Charles of Anjou) cum hac audisset, in furorera versus, cum impudentissime objurgaret et Prædicantibus muneretur. Louis, the heir apparent, followed up these reproaches with so great violence that, at length, the meek King appears to have lost all patience, and to have boxed his son's ears: Rex vero convulsus eorum convulsus filio suo alapam dedisse fertur.

* The legislation of St. Louis is examined at very great length by Velly, iii. p. 262—336.

† Philippe (III. Le Hardi) the son and successor of Louis IX. married, in 1262, Isabella, daughter of the King of Aragon.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

Peace with England,
May 29.
A. D.
1259.

With Aragon, May 1.
A. D.
1258.
Death of Prince Louis.
Dec. 25.
A. D.
1259.

Louis IX. refuses the Crown of Sicily.
A. D.
1262.

He decides in favour of Henry III. against the Barons.
A. D.
1264.

Tranquillity France.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

The Mamelukes in Palestine.

Capture of Cesarea.
A. D.
1265.

Fall of Antioch,
May 29,
A. D.
1268.

The Crusading spirit almost extinct.

Louis IX.
announces his intention of gaining the cross, March 26,
A. D.
1267.

far higher ascendancy over both his own subjects and the Monarchs his contemporaries, than he could ever have attained by preeminence in arms, however lofty, if unaccompanied by those qualities; and even his mistaken devotion so far contributed to strengthen the influence of his character, that, by an inversion of the words of an acute and elegant modern writer, it might, perhaps, be said with justice, that the good consequences of this Prince's chief weakness—his superstition—on some occasions, almost ranked it among his virtues.* Happy would it have been, however, in the end, if he could have resisted its solicitation. A new enemy had arisen in the Holy Land; and the Mamelukes, advancing from Egypt, had spread themselves over Syria with a rapidity of conquest and a desolating cruelty, which threatened extermination to the small remnant of Christian settlers. The Papal See was, at that season, far too deeply occupied by its own ambitious projects in Sicily, to allow any portion of its active care to be diverted to Palestine; and the Vatican supplied no further aid, than such as could be afforded by Bulls. Even these Bulls were empty and disregarded; and the Clergy, harassed by often-repeated and oppressive exactions for the support of the Crusades, fearlessly refused the subsidy which Urban IV. pursued the like equivocal course. At the very moment at which he received intelligence of the capture of Cesarea, he absolved from their vow all those who had taken the Cross for Palestine, on condition that they would engage in the service of Charles of Anjou. Nor was it till Antioch fell without resistance, till that former Queen of the East was rendered desert, till ten thousand of her citizens were put to the sword, and more than one hundred thousand sold into slavery, that the overwhelming magnitude of this calamity compelled attention from the reluctant Pontiff.

It cannot be supposed that we are here arguing in support of the original policy of the Crusades, however much might elsewhere be reasonably urged in its favour. Our object is no more than to suggest that, whatever motives had at first poured myriads into the East in order to win dominion, might be expected to operate with tenfold force to prevent that dominion from crumbling away after it had been partially won. A Century and a half of disaster, however, had almost extinguished the fanaticism which once summoned universal Europe to arms for that which it esteemed the Cause of God. Few were the bosoms which now partook of that unabated zeal by which Louis IX. continued to be inflamed; and when he made known his intention of embarking once more for the Holy Land, he must have been grieved and surprised at the coldness with which his announcement was received by some of the most faithful partners of his former expedition. It was during the Lent of 1267 that, without any previous declaration of his object, he convened at Paris a great Council of his Barons. Joinville, who from long confidential intercourse with the King, and intimate acquaintance with his ruling passion, suspected, as there can be little doubt, the design of this meeting,† declined attending, and pleaded a quartan ague as his excuse. But Louis, who highly esteemed and loved the Seneschal of Champagne, and knew the importance of his presence, was not thus easily to be baffled; and he returned answer, that he had enough of people who understood how to cure a quartan ague. The loyal Knight therefore obeyed; and when the King and his three sons had assumed the Cross in the presence of their Nobles, and the first strongly urged his ancient friend and companion in arms to imitate his example, the result clearly evidenced the great revolution which had occurred in men's minds. We shall give it in the Chronicler's own words.

"The King of France and the King of Navarre pressed me strongly to put on the Cross, and undertake a pilgrimage with them; but I replied, that when I was before beyond Sea, on the service of God, the officers of the King of France had so grievously oppressed my people, that they were in a state of poverty, insomuch that we should have great difficulty to recover ourselves; and that I saw clearly, were I to undertake another Crusade, it would be the total ruin of my people. I have heard many say since, that those who had advised him to his Crusade had been guilty of a great crime, and had sinned deadly. As long as he remained in his Kingdom of France every thing went on well, and all lived peaceably and in security; but the moment he left it things began to decline. They were criminal in another respect; for the good King was so weakened in his body that he could not support the weight of his armour, nor remain long on horseback. So great, indeed, was this weakness, that when I was taking leave I was obliged to carry him in my arms from the Hotel of the Count of Auxerre to the Monastery of the Cordeliers; yet, weak as he was, if he had continued in France, perhaps he might have lived longer, and have done much good."

The preparations for this enterprise were far too extensive to be made with haste, and they occupied no less than three years. The reputation of the King, more, perhaps, than any Religious ardour, induced many distinguished Soldiers to engage under his banner: a band of illustrious English followed Edward, the heir-apparent to their Crown; and of the brothers of Louis

France.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

Joinville's narrative.

misgiving that Louis projected a Crusade. Men's dreams are, for the most part, a wild combination of images which have been presented to their minds while they were awake; and a dream which the Knight of Champagne, with either great shrewdness or great simplicity, professes to consider as a prophecy, most probably was no other than the reflection of thoughts which had occupied him in the daytime, and which he either did not choose to remember or perhaps really forgot afterwards. "It happened, as God willed, that I fell asleep during matin service. In my sleep, I thought I saw the King on his knees before an altar, and that he was surrounded by many Prelates, who clothed him with a red chasuble, that was of serge of Rheims. When I awakened I told one of my Chaplains, who was a very wise man, my dream; and he answered that I should see the King next day put on the Cross. I asked him how he knew this? he replied, by what I had told him of my vision; and that the red chasuble I had seen him clothed with, signified the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was dyed with the precious blood he had shed from his side; and as the chasuble was of serge of Rheims the Crusade would be of little benefit (serge de petit profit), which is explained in the margin, de petit profit, and afterwards a strangely translated by John first "of short duration," and afterwards "a trifling business," as you will see if God grants you life. Now on the next day, the King and his three sons did put on the Cross, and the Crusade was of little benefit according to the prophecy of my Chaplain." Joinville, 153. Ed. 1761.

* "The principal weakness of this King which almost effaced all the good consequences of his virtues, was Superstition." Hallam, Middle Ages, xi. 31. etc.

† Notwithstanding Joinville's assertion that after he had arrived in Paris he was unable to "find out why the King had thus summoned him," we cannot but believe that he had a very strong inward

History.
From
A. D.
1199,
to
A. D.
1314.
The Pragmatic Sanction, March 8,
A. D.
1269.

The expedition sails,
July 1,
A. D.
1270.

himself, Alfonso accompanied, Charles engaged to join him. One event occurred in the interval which forms an epoch in French Ecclesiastical History. During a long interregnum which followed a vacancy in the Pontifical Chair by the death of Clement IV., Louis published an Ordinance, the Pragmatic Sanction, which has always been esteemed the keystone of the liberties of the Gallican Church.* His cares were then directed to measures, by which the tranquillity of France might be secured during his absence; and, as a preventive of discord among his sons, he bestowed a sufficient apaupe upon each of the three younger. Matthieu, Abbot of St. Denis, and Simon de Nesle, Count of Ponthieu in right of his wife, were named Regents, and the choice appears to have been received with general approbation. At last, after many weeks unhappily spent in the pestilential marshes of Aigues-Mortes, in which the seeds of disease were scattered among the host, and some bloody affairs occurred with the Provençals, the expedition sailed from its harbour on the 1st of July, 1270. It is said to have numbered six thousand horse and thirty thousand infantry.

Some doubt appears to exist as to the precise moment at which Louis decided upon the first point to which his arms should be directed; but, as the deliverance of the Kingdom of Jerusalem was his main object, it is but reasonable to suppose that he embarked with the design of sailing at once to the Holy Land. So little certainty, however, was felt in foreign Courts respecting the destination of his armament,—and the events of the IVth Crusade had so strikingly demonstrated with what ease the Crusaders might turn their arms to enterprises unconnected with the Cross,—that Michael Palæologus who then occupied the throne of Constantinople, desirous to avert all hazard of invasion, which the enmity of Charles of Anjou induced him to apprehend, despatched an embassy to the King of France before his embarkation. The Envoys were charged to propose a reunion of the Greek and Latin Churches; and to request the mediation of Louis in promoting so happy an concordance. No task it was thought would be more agreeable to the taste of the Prince from whom danger was to be feared, and no offer, therefore, was more likely to disarm any concealed intention of hostility. But Louis, who had never entertained a thought of attacking the Eastern Empire, directly replied that the adjustment of a Religious schism did not belong to a Secular Monarch; and referred the Ambassadors to the Cardinals by whom the vacant Papacy was administered. The Cardinals, in return, warned the King against the artifices and the insincerity of the Greeks; and Palæologus, whose sole object was to obtain assurance that the French armament was not prepared against himself, ceased to negotiate further on a matter, to the consideration of which he had been prompted not by Religion but by Policy.

The voyage from Aigues-Mortes to Sardinia had been calculated as likely to occupy four days, but twenty were actually consumed before the fleet anchored off the Port of Cagliari. Water and Provisions had then failed, the sick were numerous, and even the healthy were wearied of confinement on shipboard. Damietta, or St. Jean d'Acre, the nearest Ports in Syria open to them, were not to be gained under at least a month's additional sail; and this dreary prospect served perhaps as a strong motive for the singular destination which the armament ultimately received. The coast of Tunis might be made in three days; Tunis was in possession of Infidels; and to attack Infidels of any description whatsoever was the duty of the Soldiers of the Cross.

Little was it considered that for the rescue of Jerusalem all triumphs over the Moors in Africa would be utterly unavailing; that if the power of the Mamelukes was to be subverted, they must be either chased from Syria which they were ravaging, or else attacked in their strong-holds in Egypt; to attain which Country by a march across the Desert from Tunis was an utterly hopeless speculation. To such reasoning, powerful as it might be, the impatience and the privations of the Crusaders opposed answers which they deemed incontrovertible. A yet further motive for the attack on Tunis has been suggested by the ingenuity of Voltaire, nor, in spite of his gross ignorance of early authorities,* does it appear to us so little deserving of regard as it has been considered by Velly. Charles of Anjou was to afford

* The Pragmatic Sanction of Louis IX. does not stand single in French History; another Instrument, under the same name, was issued by Charles VII. in 1418; and some confusion, perhaps, has occasionally arisen between the two. The latter prevents far more barriers against the domination of Rome than that of St. Louis; which, in six very brief Articles, does no more than assert the maintenance of the ancient rights of the Clergy; the freedom of Ecclesiastical elections; the pestilential nature of Simony; the disposition of benefices according to the Common Law, the decision of Councils, and the Institutes of the Fathers; resistance to subsidies exacted from the Clergy by Rome, unless the necessity be "reasonable, pious, very urgent, and inevitable, and expressly and spontaneously admitted to be so, by the Clergy;" and a renewal of all liberties, franchises, immunities, prerogatives, rights, and privileges, granted to the Clergy by former Kings.

This Decree may be found in the Ordonnances des Rois de France, i. 97, in Velly, iii. 61, in Vilaret, vii. 125, and in Simonetti, Hist. des Français, viii. 101. Respecting its name, Mureti gravely tells us, that one of the words is of Latin, the other of Greek origin; and that when put together, they are applied to Ordinances affecting the great concerns of Church or State, ou du moins les affaires de quelques Communautés. Others again, he says, think that reference is made to the many Lawyers whom it is necessary to consult respecting these Instruments, because the Accents called Lawyers' l'egislation. And a third party, he continues, affirms that no more is meant, than that the King has taken a great deal of trouble about the matter, and has not issued his Decree till après avoir bien examiné l'affaire dont il s'agit. The last, which, probably, is the correct derivation, is stated with far more precision by Du Cange, ad v. Pragmatica Sanctio, where he defines it to be an Ordinance quo adhibitis diligenti Cause cognitione, ex omnium procerum consensu in modum auctoritatis ultra a Principe conceditur aut fertur; and such an Ordinance is, no doubt, a work l'œuvre of lawyers, not acceding that word in its invidious sense. After all, the Pragmatic Sanction of Louis IX. is not of undisturbed authority. Certain expressions in it have been noticed not warranted by coeval Writers. Velly supports it, and cites a formidable list of names in its favour: Fontanon, Boulay, Bouchel, Labbe, Cosart, Lauriere, Poinson, Tillet, (ii. 239. note). The learned Benedictine Authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates, consider that Velly has fully established his point (i. 335). M. de Simonetti does not express any doubt respecting its genuineness; but he shows, that which is very true, that it can be considered as a check upon the usurpation of Rome, solely on account of the vagueness of its expressions, which permitted interpretations almost ad libitum; (viii. 106.) and, lastly, Mr. Hallam inclines against it. (Middle Ages, xi. 75. note. 4to.)

* Je ne sais sur quel fondement, says Voltaire, (Sur les Mœurs, ch. 58.) when denying the hope of converting the King of Tunis, which Louis entertained, and which we are about to relate. But surely it was his business to have made inquiry as to the foundation; and, as Velly has shown, if he had done so, he would have discovered them in the writings both of a trusty Chronicler, Gul de Nangis, and of Geoffroi de Beaulieu, the King's Confessor, who accompanied him in this expedition. Both are printed in Duchesne's Script. Franc. v. 387, 462, and we have followed their relation accordingly.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Ambition of Charles of Anjou.

Lope entered used by sons of the Conversion of the King of Tunis.

Embarkment at Carthage.
July 17.

French sieged in Carthage.

a powerful reinforcement to the Crusading armament, and even among the Barons already embarked he must have had numerous partisans. Not content with the mastery of Sicily, Charles might hope for the conquest of Tunis also, from which Kingdom his Sicilian Crown claimed an arrears of tribute; and it was not difficult to find a pretext which should satisfy his more conscientious Brother that this worldly project of ambition was no other than a Religious duty. An amicable intercourse had long subsisted between the Kings of France and of Tunis, and from some expressions dropped on one occasion by Embassadors from the latter, Louis had caught a hope, how well or ill founded cannot now be affirmed, that his ally Muley-Moztanca might be prevailed upon to embrace Christianity, provided his Conversion could be avowed without tarnish to his honour, or hazard to his safety. "Would to God," exclaimed the enthusiastic Louis, "that I might be Godfather to a Mohammedan King!" and from that moment the design deeply occupied his thoughts. Once again, while he was assisting at the Baptism of a Jew at St. Denis, he addressed himself to the Tunisian Envoys, who were present at the ceremony, "Tell your master," were his ardent and impassioned words, "so earnestly do I desire his Conversion that I would cheerfully pass the rest of my days in the most obscure dungeon, provided, through God's blessing, I might obtain the consent of your King's nation to impart to him the Grace of Baptism!"

To enable Muley-Moztanca to declare his adoption of the true Faith if he were sincere, to punish him for his duplicity if he were not so, were the motives which prompted the King of France to direct his course to Africa; and we cannot but think that Voltaire's conjecture relative to the intrigues of Charles of Anjou derive strength from the operations which ensued. On nearing the village which occupies the site of Ancient Carthage, Louis despatched a few Galleys to reconnoitre the Port; and as it appears without hostile intention. The officer employed on that service exceeded his orders, seized the vessels which he found in the harbour, forcibly occupied the village, and demanded reinforcements for his support. The gauntlet was now thrown down, and War, whether at first designed by Louis, or brought upon him against his will by the secret instructions of the Count of Anjou, was in either case inevitable. We need not detail the horrors which crowded the short, ensuing campaign; one specimen may suffice, and it shall be taken from the pen of an eye-witness writing home during the ferocious conflict. "In the citadel of Carthage," says Pierre de Condé, a Canon of Meaux and Chaplain to the King, "are still left many Saracens, concealed within its numerous vaults and souterraines. Of these Infidels we every day kill as many as we can find; some are suffocated in their hiding places by fire and smoke, some remain whom we shall contrive to despatch by other kinds of death."

The first step of the King of Tunis on learning this unprovoked invasion, was to seize the numerous Christians resident in his dominions or serving in his armies, and to menace their instant death in case the French should advance upon his Capital. But Louis had resolved to await the junction of his brother, Charles of Anjou, before he moved onward; and ere many days elapsed, instead of besieging the Moors, he himself was besieged in the Camp which he had pitched amid the ruins of Carthage. The African horse, trained to advance and retreat with a rapidity not to be intercepted, rode hourly up to his lines, slaying and capturing the surprised sentinels and the unwary stragglers, without a chance of being brought to general combat. To this most harassing mode of war was soon added the scourge of disease. The Sun and the sands jointly produced ophthalmia; the waters of the canals, of the marshes, and of the salt-pools exhaled mephitic vapours; those of the tanks became stinking and corrupt, and bred noxious reptiles. Burning winds rolled from the Desert oceans of sand, in masses so palpable as to obscure the light of day, in separate grains so fine and subtle as to penetrate to the eyes and throats of the miserable sufferers. Within eight days after the occupation of Carthage, Pestilence had swept from the French ranks thousands of their choicest soldiers, among whom it may be enough to mention a few illustrious names known to every period of History; Vendôme, De la Marche, Nemours, and Montmorency. Two sons of Louis were attacked, the younger fatally; the Papal Legate was among the victims; but all former losses were forgotten or esteemed lightly, when the appalling intelligence was circulated that the King himself had sickened. A constitution naturally feeble, and impaired by long austerities, forbade any hope of his recovery; yet he lingered during two and twenty days, engaged for the most part in exercises of Religion; and before his strength utterly failed, he ordered his body to be placed on a bed of ashes, and crossing his hands on his breast, with eyes uplifted to Heaven, expired at noon on the 25th of August, in the fifty-fifth year of his age.* His demeanour in these trying moments, has extorted from a pen more inclined to ridicule than to reverence genuine devotion, this invaluable eulogy, that he died with the piety of a Saint and the courage of a Hero.†

Scarcely had Louis IX. breathed his last when the long-expected Sicilian fleet hove in sight of Carthage. Charles of Anjou, stern, selfish, cruel, and ambitious as his actions evince him to have been, was overcome even to tears when he stood by his brother's couch, and embraced the corpse with lively transports of grief and affection.‡ But the melancholy condition of the Christian army demanded his active and immediate exertions for its relief. The new King, Philippe III., was incapacitated by sickness from assuming the command, and the task at first of War and ultimately of negotiation devolved upon Charles. The former he appears to have conducted with no inconsiderable skill during more than two months of hostilities. On one occasion he cut off a large division of Moors whom he had entrapped into an ambushade; on another he avoided a similar snare

* There is not any reason for doubting the genuineness of the Instructions to his son Philippe, which have been repeatedly printed, and may be found in Joinville; but it is plain from internal evidence that they were not written by Louis on his death-bed. He may have delivered them to Philippe at that season, but it is manifest, from the following paragraph, that they were not prepared under the prospect of immediate dissolution. A son père et à sa mère pour honneur et révérence et gard leur commandement.

† Voltaire, sup.

‡ Gul. de Nang. ap. Duchesne, v. 517. The Chronicler's expressions are not a little courtly when we call to mind the real character of Charles of Anjou; with whom tears, no doubt, were of rare occurrence. Coactus est, ut dicitur, lacrymas effundere, in sua est credere pietas iam mobile corpus gigantum modum muliebrem autem et infantulum induisse.

4 Z

* D'Achery, Spicilegium, iii. 665. This Letter is dated from the Camp beneath Carthage on the Sunday after the Feast of St. James.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Secret negotiations of Charles.

The King of Tunis wishes for Peace.

Its conditions,

and conclusion.
Oct. 29.

Re-embarkation of the French.

Storm off Trapani.

spread for himself, and without losing a man returned laden with the spoils of the Saracen Camp, which had been abandoned in the false hope that its pillage must occasion disorder in the assailants.* Nevertheless, it was but upon the defensive that he ventured to act; and the French felt their weakness too acutely to attempt the siege of Tunis. In negotiation, the King of Sicily had only to pursue a course which he had long since commenced in secret; for his agents had been employed at the Moorish Court even before the expedition first touched the African shore; and it was the hope of a pacific result, and of obtaining by diplomacy an arrer of three years' tribute due to his Crown, which had induced the wily Prince to urge his unsuspecting brother to suspend final operations till his own arrival.† The Barbarian King, on the other hand, was most anxious to disembarass himself from the invaders. His Capital, if besieged, might be unable to resist the superiority of European military science; and the History of the Despot, his predecessors, had fearfully taught him that the loss of the Capital often involved with it the loss of the Crown and of the life of its possessor. It was his most earnest wish, therefore, to avoid these hazards even when the chances of success were in his favour; and it can excite little surprise that we find him consenting to terms apparently ill warranted by the relative positions of the two armies. The Christians whom he had thrown into captivity on the disembarkation of the French were to be released; they were to enjoy the free exercise of their Religion, and not to be prohibited from attempts to convert the natives; the Port of Tunis was to be opened to all Christian traders, and the rate of its commercial duties was to be lowered; finally, the King engaged to reimburse the French for the expenses of the War, and to pay a large annual tribute to the Crown of Sicily. Half of the indemnity, amounting to no less than one hundred and five thousand ounces of gold, was delivered on the signature of the Treaty, and the remaining moiety was to be discharged in two subsequent annual payments.‡

It is manifest that the burden of these conditions pressed not upon the Prince but upon his People. Personally, Muley-Mostanza surrendered nothing; the toleration which he promised might gradually be evaded when the Christian army was no longer present to enforce its observance; and for the drain upon his Treasury, the coffers of an arbitrary Sovereign are little likely to be empty while a sequin or a ducat remains to be exacted from his subjects. The Crusaders re-embarked and pursued their homeward voyage; part, among whom was King Philippe, with the intention of returning to France; part burning to fulfil their original vow in the Holy Land under Alfonso of Poitou. Off Trapani they encountered a terrific gale, which destroyed eighteen galleys, a far more considerable number of smaller vessels, and with them nearly four thousand lives. The French Knights, discouraged by this new loss of many of their bravest comrades, of most of their warlike stores, and of all the treasure received from the King of Tunis, believed themselves to be visited by the wrath of Heaven, and postponed their Syrian expedition to a season more favourable. The English, who had not partaken in the Tunisian negotiation, whose hands were clean from Infidel bribery, and who had escaped unharmed from the fury of the storm, claimed a miracle in their favour,* and under their Prince Royal, Edward, proceeded with alacrity to Palestine.

Philippe, having disembarked in Sicily, crossed the Strait of Messina, and pursued his journey to France over land. His march was a funeral procession. Already, while at Trapani, his brother-in-law, Thibaud II. of Navarre,† had yielded to a disease contracted under the burning sun of Africa: Isabelle, Queen of France, died at Cosenza, in consequence of premature labour brought on by a fall from her horse; and the mourning cavalcade with which the King re-entered his dominions presented the unwonted spectacle of five coffins conveying the remains of his Father, of his Wife, of her still-born infant, of his brother the Count of Nevers, and of his brother-in-law Thibaud. The obsequies of these illustrious dead were performed at St. Denis; and after May 22 a decent period of mourning had elapsed, Philippe celebrated his Sacré at Rheims.

We seek in vain for events of interest during this obscure and inglorious reign.‡ Edward I. of England, when called to the throne by the death of his Father, visited Paris on his return from the Holy Land, was pompously entertained, and did homage for his Comtental Fiefs. "My Sovereign," were the significant terms in which he expressed himself, as he knelt and placed his hands between those of Philippe, "I pay you homage for all the Lands which I ought to hold under you."§ This allusion to Normandy was too plain not to be understood, but it does not appear to have been resented. We read also of a futile attempt made by Philippe to support the claim of his orphan nephews, sons of Ferdinand de la Cerda and Blanche of Castile, to the throne of Castile. But so ill were his preparations conducted, that when his troops had already advanced to the Pyrenees, he was obliged to disband them from want of provisions and magazines.¶

In the little which we know of the personal character of Philippe le Hardi, no trace of any quality can be discovered to justify that epithet assigned to him by contemporary flattery. He appears to have been weak and ignorant, the dupe of unworthy Favourites, who obtained his confidence chiefly through that intimate access which is the necessary privilege of servile attendance. Thus, before his accession to the Crown, the

* Alii in nobilibus perierant cum potentissimis Barbarorum, unde Edwardus inter alias potius miracula servavit. Ad hoc cum Angli Dominum prestantidum non pervenit, meritis, quia precum Barbarorum non cupivit, sed terram asperam sanguine Jero Solvi, quantum in se fuit restituerit voluit Christianis. Matt. Westminster, 400. Knyghton, ep. X. Scriptores, 3456. writes to the same purpose.

† Thibaud married, in 1255, Isabelle (Hemault calls her Elisabeth) of France, daughter of Louis IX. She followed her husband to the grave within four months after his decease; and as they died without issue, the Kingdom of Navarre, together with the Counties of Champagne and Beie, passed to Thibaud's brother Henry.

‡ Gul. de Nang. 525.

§ In 1271, the important dominion of Toulouse, the prius brought by Jeanne, daughter of Raymond VII., to Alfonso of Poitou, brother of Louis IX., became united to the Crown of France by the death of that Prince without issue.

¶ Domine Rex, facio vobis homagium pro omnibus terris que debetis tenere de vobis. Matt. Westminster, 402.

 Gul. de Nang. 533.

 The Benedictines, in L'Art de vérifier les Dates, go yet further, and name him Cœur de Lion.

* Gul. de Nang. op. Duchesne, v. 518.

† Sales Malaspina, Rev. Sec. v. 1. ep. Muratori, vii. 859.

‡ Id. 522. Guo. Villani, Hist. Univers. vii. 38. op. Muratori, xiii.

259.

History. chief post of honour in his household, that of Chamberlain, was filled by a man of base extraction, Pierre de la Brosse, who performed the then united duties of Barber and Surgeon. To the same hands, Philippe continued to intrust the exercise of power after he became King, and the ancient Nobles observed with scorn, jealousy, and disgust, that they were supplanted by a menial.* By his first wife, Isabelle of Aragon, Philippe had four sons. One son and two daughters were the issue of his second marriage with Mary of Brabant, whose beauty won an ascendancy over her husband, which De la Brosse regarded with alarm. In order to counteract this influence, under which he feared that his own power might crumble away, he endeavoured to excite his Master's suspicions as to projects which the stepmother might entertain against the children of his first bed; and the death of Louis, the eldest of Philippe's sons, was sedulously reported to have been the effect of poison administered by the Queen.† To satisfy the doubts thus excited, the King was persuaded by his Minister to have recourse to certain Religious of both sexes, who were believed to be under supernatural guidance, and inspired through divine revelation; and care was taken by De la Brosse that these fanatics or impostors should return mysterious answers tending to increase the evil impressions already raised against the Queen. Philippe, however, pressed his inquiries further, and one of his Commissioners, a brother of De la Brosse, who had been raised to the Bishopric of Bayeux, unable to obtain so direct an accusation against the Queen as he desired, pretended that the Nuns whom he consulted had replied under the seal of Confession, the inviolability of which he was bound to respect. The King, irritated at this pertinacious and unseasonable secrecy, despatched a fresh Commission; and the Nuns, alarmed at these repeated examinations, then admonished him to place entire confidence in his Queen, and altogether to reject any whispers which he might hear to her disadvantage.‡ Two years elapsed during which the power of De la Brosse appeared undiminished; when one day a Monk placed in the King's hands a packet of Letters bearing the seal of the Favourite, which he stated had been found upon a courier, recently deceased while on his journey, in a Convent at Melun, and who on his death-bed had enjoined the Abbot to deliver them into no hands but those of the King. The contents of these letters never transpired; but they occasioned the immediate arrest, trial, and condemnation of De la Brosse. He was hanged at Montfaucon; and his brother, apprehensive of a similar fate, took refuge with Pope Nicolas III. at Rome, who refused to abandon him.§ Even when the Duke of Brabant, the Queen's Father, jointly with the Duke of Burgundy and the Count of Artois, who had sat in judgment upon Pierre de la Brosse, earnestly besought the Pontiff to surrender the delinquent, Nicolas replied with firmness, that it was not his habit to confer a favour upon one party at the expense of an injustice towards another; and that all the great power of the enemies of the Bishop of Bayeux would be unable to contravert that personage's innocence.||

* Hist. de Nang. 529.

† Messey states, but without producing his authority, that the Queen would have been buried alive for this murder, but that the Duke of Brabant despatched a champion to challenge the accuser, who being afraid to combat, was accordingly hanged. ii. 739.

‡ Gul. de Nang. 532.

§ Id. 536.

|| Raynaldi Annales, ad ann. 1279, § 47.

The Letters which the Pope wrote at the same time to the King and Queen of France are framed in cautious and somewhat equivocal language.* They advise a disregard of the evil rumours which had been scattered abroad concerning the latter, but they by no means contain any assurance that Nicolas disbelieved them. Not the least remarkable portion of this mysterious history is that, on the accession of Philippe le Bel, son of Philippe III. by his first wife, the Bishop of Bayeux was reinstated in his Episcopal functions; an act of grace which implied the new King's conviction that he had been wronged, and that his brother was a faithful servant who had perished by the artifices of a faction.†

The long struggle between Charles of Anjou and Sicily and Pedro III. of Aragon, (which belongs to our Italian Annals,) placed Philippe also in a hostile relation to the latter; but it was not until Martin IV., strenuously espousing the cause of Charles, directed the full vengeance of Rome against his enemy, that the King of France was stimulated to active operations. The prize which lured him to the field was the donation of the Crown of Aragon (of which Martin pronounced Pedro to be deprived) to his second son, Charles of Valois. The death of the King of Sicily, the original cause of enmity with Aragon, was not likely to divert Philippe from a War to the conduct of which so strong an additional motive had been supplied by the Pope; and for this Crusade, as it was named, he gathered a mighty armament, which has been said to amount to twenty thousand horse, and four times that number of fantassins.‡ At the head of this great force, he penetrated to the walls of Elma, a town esteemed the key and bulwark of Catalonia. Some treachery of the inhabitants roused the French to uncontrolled fury, and in the assault and storm which followed, but a single individual was spared; and that one, the Bastard of Roussillon, more wretched than his comrades who had fallen honourably beneath the sword, purchased life by the infamy of betraying his Country, and of acting as guide through the difficult mountain passes which were his sole hope of defence against invasion.§ One engagement occurred at Ostalrich, in the plains beneath; and victory in it was claimed by each nation. It was not till after nearly three months' siege that the French captured Gironne, which the King, provoked by the obstinacy of its defence, had rashly vowed he would master at all hazards, before he returned to France; and disease by that time had made so great havoc in their ranks, that further advance became impossible. All the calamities of retreat in an enemy's country overwhelmed them on their first backward movement; the peasants in every village rose and massacred such stragglers as fell within their power; and Pedro with his now superior army pressed upon their rear. Philippe himself, languishing under a mortal sickness and in peril of defeat and capture at every step, slowly traversed the defiles through which he had advanced but a few months before in the pride of conquest; and exhausted by pain, toil, and chagrin, expired, in his fortieth year, on his arrival at Perpignan.||

In the short space of five weeks after the death of the

* Raynaldi Annales, ad ann. 1278, § 34, 36.

† Chr. Nangui apud D'Achery, Speculogium, iii. 44. Gesta Philippi III. ap. Duchesne, v. 536. Duhaime, Hist. de Paris, li. 276.

‡ Gio. Villani, lib. vii. ap. Murat. xiii.

§ Id. de Gul. de Nang. 543.

|| Id. 548.

France.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

Martin IV. declares Charles of Valois
King of Aragon.
A. D.
1253.

Philippe's expedition against Aragon.
A. D.
1285.
May 25.
First successes.
Aug. 14.

Sept. 7.

and dimensions retreat of the French.

Death of Philippe
III.
Oct. 25.

History.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Philippe le Bel.

Peace of Anagni.
Feb. 23.
A. D.
1295.

Quarrel with England.
A. D.
1292.
Edward I. cited to Paris.
A. D.
1293.

Guy Count of Flanders

declares war against France.

Successful invasion of Flanders.
A. D.
1297.

Truce for two years.
Interference of Boniface VIII.

enemy whom he had thus repulsed, Pedro of Aragon followed him to the grave. The Crown of France devolved upon Philippe IV. (le Bel, as he was named from the beauty of his person,) a Prince scarcely seventeen years of age at the time of his Father's decease; yet he had been a Bridegroom more than a year, and in right of his Consort Jeanne he was the first French Monarch who bore the title of King of Navarre. The War with Aragon continued to rage in spite of the mediation of Edward I. of England, a near kinsman to both thrones; and with a few occasional spasms of hostility, the two Powers maintained an uninteresting and inglorious struggle during the ten succeeding years. Peace was at length concluded at Anagni, by the abandonment of the pretensions of Charles of Valois to the Aragonese Crown.

A quarrel with England, arising at first out of a petty affray between some Norman and British mariners, and heightened by repeated outrages on both sides, involved Philippe in much more active warfare than that which he inherited from his Father. When Edward I. hesitated to afford redress for a great violence offered to the French Commerce, he was formally cited to appear before the Royal Court at Paris.* Acknowledging vassalage to the Crown of France for his Duchy of Aquitaine, in which quality he had already paid homage to the King, he eluded rather than refused this summons. His brother Edmund, Earl of Lancaster,† was deputed to represent him, and Philippe seizing the pretext of the King's non-appearance to declare him contumacious, partly by treachery, partly by force, overran and occupied the whole of Guyenne.‡ A series of marauding expeditions followed; the English made a descent upon the Province which had been wrested from them; the French burned and pillaged Dover. But it was against an ally of England that operations were most seriously directed. Guy, Count of Flanders, had promised the hand of his daughter Philippa, with a portion of two hundred thousand livres, to the eldest son of Edward. The Treaty, although secret, was suspected by the King of France; who, having enticed the Count of Flanders and his daughter to Paris, charged the former with a breach of vassalage in contracting this marriage without consent of his Sovereign, and would not permit the Count to return to his dominions until he consented to leave Philippa as a hostage. Justly irritated by this affront, Guy no sooner felt himself at liberty, than he renounced his allegiance to Philippe, and openly declared war.§

In the invasion of Flanders which ensued, the French encountered stubborn resistance, but were invariably successful. Nevertheless, as Wieter approached, Philippe, whose disposition was unwarlike, and who desired rather to secure himself in the conquests already made than to hazard them by attempting others, willingly listened to proposals for an armistice, and consented to a Truce for two years with both the Confederates. Mediation had already been attempted by a hand little skilled in the application of lenitives. No spirit more fiery and arrogant than that of Boniface VIII. ever administered the government of the Holy See; and when he assumed the character of a Peacemaker, he employed menaces as his chief instruments of persuasion. To his threat of excommunication unless France and England should become reconciled, Philippe replied by disclaiming the Pope's temporal interference; and Boniface in return issued a Bull, by which he thought at once to deprive him of the sinews of War, peremptorily forbidding the Clergy to pay any impost assessed by lay authority, unless the Court of Rome should grant its previous sanction.* Philippe, in return, prohibited the exportation of treasure from France, a reprisal by which the revenues of the Holy See were severely affected. Yet notwithstanding these mutually venacious acts, a more open rupture at the moment did not accord with the policy of either party; but a feeling of deadly hate and bitterness was generated between them; the pride of tempers equally irritable was equally wounded; and when Philippe, to whom forgiveness was unknown, afterwards obtained the power of inflicting vengeance, he exercised it with relentless perseverance, to the utter destruction of the Pontiff from whom he had received offence.

Boniface, engaged in an important struggle nearer home, for a while exhibited symptoms of conciliation. He published a Bull explanatory of his recent prohibition;† and he consented to a request, long urged by France, and most gratifying to her National Pride,—the Canonization of Louis IX. A Commission had been instituted, twelve years before, to make inquiries concerning the life of the deceased King and the miracles performed by him since his death. The investigation had lingered on through no less than eight Pontificates, when Boniface renewed it with vigour. Joinville was examined during two days, the testimony of three hundred and one other witnesses was received, and sixty-five miracles performed at the King's tomb were verified.‡ When the Report of the Commissioners was presented to Boniface, he immediately issued the desired Bull, and himself delivered two Speeches in memory of the virtues of the new Saint.§ This act of favour excited universal joy in France; the remains of the canonized Monarch were translated with extraordinary pomp from St. Denis to the Sainte Chapelle; Philippe ordered the particulars of his Biography to be written at the public expense; and more than one Religious Community erected altars to his worship.|| Joinville was prompted by a vision to a similar good work, and founded a perpetual daily Mass "in honour of God and of St. Louis." The warm imagination of the loyal Knight, and the intensely affectionate reverence with which he contemplated the memory of his departed friend and master, may easily have deluded him into a fancy that he actually saw in his own chapel the image of the beatified King "resplendent with glory," and held with it a very edifying conversa-

* This Bull is known in Ecclesiastical History by the title of Gloria Lauca, the two words with which it commences. It is printed in the Preuves at the end of Dupuy's Hist. du Differend d'entre le Pape Boniface VIII. et Philippe le Bel, which Treatise, without the Preuves, may be found in the VIIIth Volume of the London Edition of De Thou, 1731.

† Preuves du Differend, 39.

‡ See the Miracles de Saint Louis at the end of Joinville, Ed. 1761, and another collection also by the King's Chaplain, William of Chartres, op. Duchesne, v. 466.

§ Both these Speeches are printed by Duchesne, v. 481—485.

|| Among them were the Jacobins of Evreux and the Canons of Tournai; several miracles performed in the Church of the former are recorded by Duchesne, v. 477.

* Florentin, ad ann. vol. i. part ii. p. 723.

† Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, had married the Dowager Queen of Navarre, mother of Jeanne, Consort of Philippe.

‡ Letter of Edmund to John de St. John. Florentin, ibid. p. 794. Explanatory Letter from Edward I. to the Prelates and Barons of Gascony, id. ib. p. 805.

§ Matthew Westminster, 429.

France.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Bull of Garret Louis.
Aug. 15.
A. D.
1296.

Disputed treaty between Philippe and Boniface.

Canonization of St.
Louis.
A. D.
1297.

Aug. 25.

History. tion.* But the judicious and sober-minded comment which he has annexed to his narrative of the Canonization distinctly evinces the rational estimate which he entertained of the chief benefit to be derived from it. "This was a great honour to his descendants, particularly to such as may follow his example, but dishonourable to those who shall not do so; and they will be pointed at by the fingers of the public, who will say, the holy man, had he been alive, would never have committed acts so disgraceful."†

Boniface negotiates.

Edward I., who during the winter had passed into Flanders, was soon recalled by troubles in Scotland; and he readily confided to Boniface full power to negotiate a final Peace, which might altogether disembarass him from a very formidable enemy. The King of France entertained equally pacific views; and there was yet another point in which the hostile Princes accorded. Both were alike jealous of the Papal claims to supremacy, and both took especial care, that in the Bull which announced their consent to the Pope's mediation, it should be expressly stated that they submitted to him, not in his Pontifical character, but as a private person, Benedict Gaetan.‡ The principal stipulations of the Final Bull (which, notwithstanding that title, was chiefly prospective) regarded a double marriage between Edward himself with Margaret, a sister of Philippe, and Edward Prince of Wales, with Isabelle, a daughter of the same King. The portion of territory to be restored to England, and other matters of scarcely less importance, were postponed for subsequent deliberation; and it will be perceived that the main point effected was the rupture of alliance between England and Flanders by setting aside the former compact of marriage which had been the foundation of their union. This new Treaty was signed at Montreuil sur mer on the 19th of June, and the nuptials of the King of England with Margaret of France were solemnized at Canterbury on the 12th of September following. Nevertheless, four years elapsed before the definitive arrangements were concluded; and it was then agreed that Edward, considering himself a Vassal of France, should be reinstated in his Fief of Aquitaine.

The Count of Flanders had been passed by in silence in the Treaty of Montreuil; and thus shamefully and faithlessly abandoned, he could oppose slight resistance to the overwhelming force with which, on the expiration of the armistice, Charles of Valois was instructed to pour into the Netherlands. Arras, Douay, Bethune, Courtrai, Dam, and Bruges rapidly yielded to the invaders; but Gand, the wealthiest and the strongest of his fortified towns, still remained to the veteran Prince, and within its walls he prepared to withstand a siege. Charles, however, enforced upon him the hazard of his situation and the inequality of the struggle, and expressed a conviction, little supported by experience, of the gentleness of Philippe's disposition. "Approach my brother's presence," he said, "with offers of submission, and I engage on the faith of a Prince, that if he does not reinstate you in your full sovereignty, he shall at least permit you to return to your present defences." The Count indiscreetly relied on this promise, which the Count of Valois was unauthorized to give, and which Philippe refused to sanction. When Guy had permitted a French garrison to occupy his last strong hold, and accompanied by his two elder sons, had thrown himself at the feet of the King of France, he was sternly informed that he was a rebel and a prisoner, and that Flanders henceforward was incorporated with the dominions of his Sovereign.*

It was in the year following this act of treachery that the smothered enmity between Philippe and Boniface kindled into open flame. Bernard de Sayset, Bishop of Pamiers, whom the latter despatched into France for the adjustment of some Ecclesiastical dispute, was a headstrong, passionate, and arbitrary Prelate, whose violence on former occasions had rendered him especially odious to the King. The choice of such a Minister, if accidental was unfortunate; if premeditated was insulting; and it was in the latter view that it was regarded by Philippe. A charge of Treason was instituted against the Legate by the Crown lawyers; he was affirmed to have used imprudent and unbecoming expressions concerning the King, and to have compassed his dethronement; and the ready accusations of heresy, blasphemy, and simony being annexed to his political offences, his servants were submitted to the rack in order to extort confessions; and himself, in spite of his advanced age, his high dignity, and his numerous infirmities, was ignominiously thrown into prison.

The first steps taken by Boniface on learning this unexampled outrage upon his Legate—whose diplomatic office, exclusively of the peculiar sanctity of his mission, ought to have guaranteed him sufficient protection—were calm and temperate. He summoned the French Clergy to attend him at Rome in the following November; and he addressed a Remonstrance to Philippe, full indeed of severity, but nevertheless tinctured with the spirit of paternal admonition which was claimed by its opening paragraph. It admonished the King as an erring Son, and commenced with the words from which it has received its name in History, Ausculat Fili.† But Philippe, unused to any voice but that of flattery, rejected with indignation a document which presumed to discuss his faults; he carefully suppressed the original missive, and in laying his complaints before an Assembly of the States-General—probably the first States-meeting in which the Tiers-Etat, or Commons, were General. summoned together with the Barons and the Clergy—his Chancellor was instructed to omit all those strong expressions which might be grating to the ears of Royalty; and to exhibit no more than a short abstract which has been termed La petite Bulle,‡ and which is sometimes mistakenly considered as another genuine Bulle. Instrument promulgated by Boniface.

* Malt. Westminster, 432. Promettendo Messer Carlo sopra se fu guarentirti, et di rimetterli nello amore del Re et in loro stato et signoria..... la qual cosa por lo unverso Mondo fu tenuta grande dalestia a si fatte Signore. Giov. Villani, viii. 32. See also Oudberg, Chron. de Flandre, ch. 136. f. 224.

† Preuves du Differend, 43.

‡ Id. 44.

France.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

Surrender and captivity of Count Guy.

Quarrel between Philippe and Boniface.

A. D.
1301.

Imprisonment of the Legate.
July 12:

The Bull
Ausculat Fili.

La petite Bulle.

The Treaty of Montreuil sur
mer.

June 19.

A. D.

1299.

Final Treaty of Paris.

May 20.

A. D.

1303.

resh invasion of Flanders.

A. D.

1300.

* "I was on a certain day in my Chapel of Joinville when I thought I saw him resplendent with glory before me. I was very proud to see him thus in my Castle, and said to him, 'Sire, when you shall depart hence, I will conduct you to another of my Castles that I have at Cherillon, where you shall also be lodged.' He thought he answered me with a smile, 'Lord de Joinville, from my affection to you, I will not, since I am here, depart hence so soon.' When I awakened I bethought myself that it was the pleasure of God and his own that I should lodge him in my Chapel, and instantly after I had an altar erected to the honour of God and of him."—Johnes's Translation, i. 246.

† Id. ibid.

‡ Fiedera. Bulla de compromise, &c. vol. i. pars ii. p. 694. Bulla finalis pronunciationis, &c. ibid.

History.

From
A. D.
1199,
to
A. D.
1314.

The Vatican declared this Little Bull to be an impudent forgery; and the condensation which it presented of the original expressions, divested of all the explanatory and qualifying context, went very far to justify this opprobrious designation. Its terms ran as follows: "Boniface, Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, to Philippe, King of the Franks, Fear God and keep his Commandments. We wish you to know that you are subject to us in matters temporal as well as spiritual; that the collation of Benefices and Prebends in no wise appertains to you; that if you are allowed the guardianship of vacant Benefices it is only to preserve their fruits for those who succeed to them; that if you have conferred any of them, we declare such collation invalid and altogether revoke it, pronouncing those persons to be Heretics who maintain an opposite opinion." These words were erroneously received by the Assembly as if they constituted the original Bull, and the Chancellor, Pierre Flotte, permitted his auditors to remain in their delusion. The answer framed by the King in return (but, as it is supposed, never absolutely despatched) was coarse, blustering, flippant, and undignified. "Philippe, by the Grace of God King of the French, to Boniface, who calls himself Pope, little or no greeting. Let your very great Fatuity know that we do not submit to any one in matters temporal; that the collation of vacant Churches and Prebends appertains to us by right of our Royalty; that their fruits are vested in us; that the collations which we have made or shall make are valid both for the past and for the future; that we will support all persons thus appointed with the full extent of our power; and that we consider as Fools and Idiots those who maintain an opposite opinion."²

The King's Answer.

The Three Estates write to the Pope.

April 10.
A. D.
1302.

His indignation against Pierre Flotte.

Nogaret denounces Boniface.
March 12.
A. D.
1303.

Even if this Letter was kept back, sufficient indignity was shown to Boniface by other proceedings. His Bull was publicly burned, and each of the Three Estates addressed to him a Remonstrance less insolent in expression but not less firm in defiance than the document which we have recited above.³ His chief indignation on receiving these addresses was directed against Pierre Flotte; he characterised the French Church no more harshly than as a foolish and mistaken daughter; but the Chancellor, he said, was "a very Beial;" and, alluding to the near-sightedness with which he was afflicted, he added, that he was "blear-eyed in body, and mentally altogether blind."⁴

It was early in the following Spring, that in a fresh Assembly of French Barons the ultimate designs which Philippe meditated against Boniface were distinctly avowed. Guillaume de Nogaret, an ambiguous character, half Military and half Civil, who had been a Professor and a Judge, and was now a Knight, received instructions from the King to denounce Boniface as a usurper, a false Pope, and a Heretic, who ought to be cut off from the bosom of the Church; and whose arrest and imprisonment he therefore formally demanded, until judgment could be obtained from a future Council. The Pope, in self-defence, retorted by a general

Bull of excommunication against all persons who had prevented the French Clergy from obeying his citation already issued, and summoned the King's Confessor to Rome; but the messenger who conveyed this Bull was seized and imprisoned, and in a new Assembly of the Barons the accusations of Nogaret were reduced to form and exhibited in detail. The nine and twenty counts of this Indictment, as we may term it, were framed according to the subtlest rules of special pleading. Many of the charges were mere repetitions little varied from each other; and almost all of them depended upon a somewhat nice induction. Thus, the Pope was accused of denying the immortality of the Soul, and the proof was obtained in the following Logical course. Boniface had said that he had rather be a dog, an ass, or any other brute animal, than a Frenchman; which he assuredly never would have said if he had believed a Frenchman to have an immortal Soul.⁵ No sensuality, however odious, was omitted in the Catalogue of his crimes, which contained a singular admixture of the blackest with the most frivolous offences. He was stigmatised as a sorcerer, the possessor of a Familiar Spirit,⁶ a violator of the secrets of the Confessional, the incestuous seducer of his own niece, and the murderer of many Priests, and of his predecessor Celestin; and in the same page, just as seriously, and with as much emphasis, he was declared a calumniator of the French by having called them Patarins, and of the Monks black and white, the Minorites, and the Preachers, by taxing them with hypocrisy. Guillaume de Plasian, the accuser, swore on the Gospels that he believed each charge which he had recited to be well founded; the King admitted the appeal which was demanded to a Council, in order to procure the speedy assembling of which he promised to exert himself to the utmost; the whole Parliament assented; the Ecclesiastics, who were present, adding their wish, rather than their hope, that Boniface might establish his innocence, and in the mean time protesting, beforehand, against any Excommunication or Interdict with which he might visit France for these proceedings.

Weapons more to be dreaded than these wordy Protestations of Ecclesiastics were employed by Philippe to avert the Spiritual Censures which it could not be doubted the Pope would now issue. The King's agents had long been secretly engaged in establishing powerful influence within the Pontiff's own dominions; and the party which a lavish distribution of treasure had gained in the town of Anagni was especially formidable. In that town, the place of his birth, Boniface passed the ensuing Summer, and he had already fixed the 8th of September as the day on which he would promulgate a Bull reciting every past incident of the struggle in which he was engaged, directly and personally excommunicating Philippe, and releasing his subjects from their allegiance. On the evening before that day, Nogaret, at the head of three hundred Knights and a numerous Body of other armed followers, entered Anagni, with the cry of "Death to Boniface, The King of France for ever!" The Muni-

From.
From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Formal accusation of the Pope,
June 15.

and appeal against him to a Council.

Seizure of Boniface at Anagni.
Sept. 7.

² Preuves du Différend, 44.

³ The Letter of the Nobles and that of the Prelates may be found in the Preuves du Différend, 60, 67. That of the Commons is lost.

⁴ Verba delictantis Alit. Bull of Boniface to the Clergy of France, Id. 65.

⁵ Beial sile Petrus Flotte; armenidens corpore, ventrique excocatus. Id. ibid.

⁶ Nogaret in his Speech condescended to a miserable pun upon the Pope's name. Sed et enim in cathedra Beati Petri mendaciorum magister, faciens se, cum sit omnisforti maleficus, Bonifacium nominari. Preuves du Différend, 56.

⁷ Ore pulchre dicere et prodicare non erudit, se magis velle rui vel curare, vel curare, se quodcumque animal bestium, quem Gullicum; quod non dixit, se crederet Gallicum habere amicum qui posset eternam beatitudinem promereri. Id. 102.

⁸ Habet Damoclem privatum cujus consilio utitur in omnibus. Id. 103

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.His distinct conduct.

His rescue

and death.
Oct. 11.Massacre of the French
at Bruges.
March 21.
A. D.
1302.

epal Authorities had been bribed to abstain from opposition, and the interference of the rabble was dexterously prevented by exposing the Pontifical residence to their plunder. Nogaret was accompanied by Scliarra Colonna, one of a family exiled by the Pope, and at whose hands therefore little mercy was to be expected. But the high-spirited old man, more dignified under misfortune than in his loftiest height of power, listened undismayed to the noise of tumult increasing as it approached more nearly to his chamber of audience; and when the doors were broken in, he was found clad in his robes of office, with the tiara on his brow, the keys and a Crucifix in his hand, and seated on his Pontifical Throne.* "Strike when you please," was his sole reply to the menaces with which he was assailed; "betrayed like my Saviour, and hard by the gates of death, I will still die as becomes His Vicar."† During three days in which he was permitted to remain in his Palace, (perhaps because his captors, embarrassed by the very completeness of their success, were not yet fully prepared for their ulterior course,) he refused all sustenance, either from fear of poison, or from the bitterness of a wounded spirit. On the third morning, the populace of Anagni, shamed by this outrage upon the Head of their Religion, their fellow-towansman, and their patron, and struck with remorse at the apathy into which they had been seduced by a pitiful lust for booty, rose in arms for his deliverance. They were joined by peasants from all the surrounding districts, who swelled their numbers to ten thousand men; the French were chased from the town after the loss of many lives, and Boniface was delivered from his captivity. But the object of Philippe was already compassed, notwithstanding the Pope's release; and the remembrance of his late sufferings and humiliation acting upon a frame enfeebled by the burden of eighty-six Winters, contributed to bring him speedily to the grave. He expired at Rome exactly one month after his restoration to freedom; and the delirium of the violent fever which immediately occasioned his death, was magnified by his enemies into a judicial phrenzy, in a paroxysm of which inflection, they affirmed that he dashed his head against the walls of his chamber and destroyed himself by his own act.‡

Thus freed from a dangerous opponent and fully triumphant in one quarter, Philippe in another had not been equally successful. The tyranny of Jean de Chastillon, the Governor to whose rule Flanders had been committed, goaded the Citizens of Bruges to a rising in which nearly four thousand French were massacred.§ A son of the imprisoned Count placed himself at the head of twenty thousand Burgheers, and taking post at Courtrai awaited the attack of the French army which had been put in motion for the punishment of the Rebels, as they were styled by their proud conqueror. The force led by Robert Count of Artois, cousin of the King and the most distinguished Captain of his time, amounted to seven thousand and five hundred Knights of gentle blood, ten thousand archers, and forty thousand fantassins.* The Flemings were drawn up on a plain having the town of Courtrai in their rear, and their front and flanks protected by a narrow, semicircular canal which had not been remarked by the enemy. The few gentlemen among them dismounted, and mixed on equal terms with the Burgheers, who fixing in the ground the butts of their long pikes presented an impenetrable cheval de frise. When the hostile columns appeared in sight, the Priests commenced the solemnization of Mass; and each soldier, without moving from his ranks to communicate, stooped forward, and plucking up the turf before him, pressed it to his lips, and devoted himself by a silent vow to what appeared almost certain death, in defence of his Country.

Robert d'Artois moved on proudly and carelessly as if secure of triumph. What could the lowly artisans of Flanders hope to effect against the high-blooded chivalry of France! When Raoul de Nesle, a veteran soldier, holding the important dignity of Constable, proposed a manœuvre which must infallibly have terminated in victory, Robert spurned every movement but that of direct advance; and, taunting his colleague with a marriage connection by which he was united to a daughter of the Count of Flanders, exclaimed scornfully, "They are no more than Flemish rabbits, and you yourself have some of their skin?" The brave Knight, stung by the imputation, replied with energy, "Sir, if you charge even with me, you will charge far enough!"† and his words were soon amply verified. Enveloped in clouds of Summer dust, the whole cavalry, headed by De Nesle, galloped on the enemy's line; and when the leading files arrived at the brink of the canal, of the existence of which they were ignorant, on account of the flatness of the country, they were pressed forward by the weight of the still advancing rear. Without the power of disengaging themselves on the smooth and perpendicular banks, man and horse continued to roll over each other; into this narrow but all devouring trough; while the light-armed Flemings, seizing the moment of confusion, readily threw themselves over the canal, closed upon their enemy in rear and upon both flanks, and completed their entire destruction. The richest blood in France was most profusely shed in this memorable defeat. Six thousand men at arms, more than two hundred of whom were of distinguished note, perished on the field. The Constable was one of the earliest who fell; Jean de Chastillon, whose severity had occasioned the revolt, was left among the dead; and Robert d'Artois atoned for his rashness after having been pierced with thirty wounds. Some estimate of the triumph of the Flemish may be formed

France.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Battle of Courtrai.
July 11.Rashness of Robert
d'Artois.Total defeat
of the French.

* Si free parare dell' amante di San Piero, et con le chiavi et croce in mano, et posati a sedere in su la sedia Papale. Giov. Villani, viii. 63.

† Da che per tradimento come Gherardo Christo veglio essere preso, et convenissi morire, almeno voglio morire come Papa. Id. ibid.

‡ A prophecy of Celestin after his dethronement by Boniface is often cited: Ascendisti ut Fulpes, regnabis ut Leo, morieris ut Canis. Thomas Walsingham, op. Anglica, &c. Camdeni, 437. Ce qui arrive, says Du Puy, 73.

§ Peter König, a weaver, headed this insurrection, as the French chose to term the struggle of a free people to throw off the yoke of foreign conquest obtained by treachery. In order to prevent any of the oppressors from escaping, König placed sentinels at all the gates, with instruction not to allow any one to pass without delivering the watchwords Scit ende Friend! a shibboleth which effectually defied all the attempts of French pronunciation, good hosts imitari student, nec valent recte offerre. Meyer, Annal. Flandriae, x. f. 91. b.

* Giovanni Villani, viii. 55.

† Robert's words, as given by G. Villani, viii. 56. are, Puis diable, ce sont deaconal de Lombars, et vos Constable avez ancor deu pel delu. The Constable's reply is, Sire, se vou ve res uge ira, vos tres bene avant. Or as they stand a little more intelligibly in the margin, Trus diable ce sont de guigles des Lombars, e vous Constable avez ancora du pel de la Sire, si vous tres ha je irai, vous tres bien avant.

‡ L'uno supra l'altro, is the repeated expression of G. Villani.

History. when it is added, that they collected no fewer than four thousand pair of gilt spurs as trophies of their prowess.*

From A. D. 1199. to A. D. 1314. Philippe de-teriorates the Coun-try, and unsuccess-fully invades Flanders. No effort was spared by Philippe to repair this great loss, and, among other expedients, he had recourse to the short-sighted and hazardous experiment of deteriorating the national coinage; a financial blunder which he adopted more than once during his reign, which on each occasion impoverished his own coffers and produced almost universal bankruptcy, and which has entailed upon his name the dishonourable title of le faux monnoyeur. The army which he levied to revenge his defeat exceeded in numbers that which he had just lost; but it was firmly encountered, it suffered much in skirmishes, and the King, unable to provoke a general engagement, was surprised by the rains, lost his convoys and baggage in the inundations which they caused, signed an armistice to continue during the Winter months, and fell back on France without retrieving his glory.

Renewal of war in Flanders. A. D. 1304. Before renewing his invasion he concluded that definitive Treaty with England, which we have mentioned in an earlier stage of his history; and in order that he might the more fully prepare himself for final and complete vengeance, he even extended his Truce with the Flemings for twelve months longer. But the sturdy and unyielding opposition of that singular people in the end frustrated his hopes. Their fleet was destroyed on the Zurrick-see, and their army completely routed at Mons en Pruille; yet so great was their energy, that within three weeks after their second disaster a well-appointed force of sixty thousand men was prepared to dispute the further advance of the invaders. A war in which the defeated, Antwerp-like, derived increase of strength from their fall, was apparently interminable; and Philippe wisely abandoned his futile design of conquest. He released his prisoners, and acknowledged the independence of Flanders; in return, Lille, Douay, and a few places in their vicinity, were ceded to him, and he received two hundred thousand livres as an indemnity for the expenses of the war.†

Peace. The two remaining chief transactions of Philippe's reign arose out of the paramount influence which a happy chance enabled him to establish over the Holy See, but they are involved in doubts which can never be dispelled. The troubled Pontificate of Boniface VIII. was succeeded by the short reign of Benedict XI., on whose demise, (attributed to poison, not unconnected with the quarrel of his predecessor,) the Conclave remained undecided in their choice after nine months' deliberation. At length, by a secret agreement of two leading Cardinals of the opposite factions, Gaetano and Di Prato, it was determined that the former should nominate three ultramontane Prelates, one of whom having been approved within forty days by the latter, should be raised by their joint influence to the tiara. Gaetano, a nephew of the late Boniface, named three Prelates of his own party, and Di Prato, who was in the interest of France, found means to inform Philippe that he only waited his consent in order to choose Bertrand de Goub, Archbishop of Bordeaux; a Prelate whom the King by that timely intimation might probably attach to himself, notwithstanding his hitherto avowed enmity.* Philippe, accordingly, in a secret interview made his compact with Bertrand,† whose election was immediately declared. The new Pope assumed the title of Clement V., and instead of proceeding to Rome for the solemnity of his Coronation, he invited the Cardinals to attend him at Lyon. A fearful accident which occurred by the falling of a wall crowded with spectators, on the day on which he received the tiara; was long considered as an evil omen of that subsequent residence of the Papal Court in France, which, from its seventy years' duration, has been compared by the angry zeal of the Italian Historians to the Babylonian captivity.‡

The financial distresses of Philippe were far from being removed by a confiscation of the property of all the Jews in France, preparatory to their expulsion from his dominions. The superstition of the times rendered this most crying and cruel injustice eminently popular; but it was far otherwise when the King assailed the purses of his Christian subjects; and when, having dis- charged a portion of the Crown debts in an adulterated coin, to which thrice its real value was assigned, he suddenly changed the standard, and ordered the same money to be received in payment of imposts at no more than its intrinsic worth. Public indignation was fiercely roused at this iniquitous Ordinance; the Palace was surrounded by a tumultuous mob, and but for a prompt and vigorous exercise of severity the throne might have been endangered. The King suppressed this brief insurrection by terror, but he perceived the necessity of rescinding his late fiscal regulations. It was not among the lower classes only that discontent had been excited: the rich Body of Knights Templars, whose revenue suffered greatly by the irregular value of the currency, is said to have secretly prompted the popular movement; and the relentless hatred with which Philippe was soon about to pursue that devoted Order has been attributed, among other motives, to his discovery of their participation in this sedition.

But the real motives of the Persecution which we are

* Consecratus humo vago di homere et di signoria, et che era Guascone, che di natura son cupido.

† Philippe made six demands upon the future Pope: 1. his own reconciliation with the Church; 2. the abolition of all his debts in the quarrel with Boniface; 3. a Grant of Tenth from his Clergy for five years; 4. the condemnation of Boniface; 5. the reinstatement of the Colonna Family; and 6. a condition, which for the present he was not prepared to state. It probably related to the Templars. G. Villani, viii. 80. This account of a transaction, which it was the interest of both parties to keep profoundly secret, may be thought too precise to deserve entire credence.

‡ Jean II. Duke of Burgundy was killed, and the King himself, together with his Brother Charles of Valois, who was holding the bridle of the Pope's mule, were hurt by this accident. Du Puy, Hist. du Differend, 77.

§ The Cardinal Matthew Rosso degli Orsini, one of the heads of the opposite faction, who most reluctantly quitted Rome on this occasion, observed with great foresight to Di Prato, whose intrigue in Boniface's election he had discovered, I'avevo se' alto fon di con- durreme oltremona, ma tardi ritornarò la Chiesa in Italia, si conosci fatti i Guasconi. G. Villani, viii. 81.

Pontificate and death of Benedict XI. July 7.

A. D. 1304. Intrigue for the

* Velly, iv. 156. where with more than customary elegance of allusion he notices the parallel of the three bushels of equestrian rings gathered by Hannibal at Canna. In our account of the Battle of Courtrai we have closely followed the picturesque, although doubtless very accurate narrative of G. Villani.

† G. Villani, viii. 79. One of the conditions of the Peace was the delivery to the Flemings of the remains of their unhappy Count Guy, who had died in prison the year before. Oudeghorst, Chr. de Flandres, ch. 140. f. 234. b.

‡ Benedict at first showed himself favourable to the French interests; but he soon acquired sufficient courage to excommunicate the chief agents in the outrage committed at Anagni. Within a month after the issue of a Bull to that effect, he was poisoned by a dash of figs, and strong suspicion attached to the parties whom he had spiritually censured.

France. From A. D. 1199. to A. D. 1314.

Election of Clement V. A. D. 1305.

Confiscation and banishment of the Jews. A. D. 1306.

New altera- tion in coin- age.

Tumult at Lyons.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

The Knights Templars

about to relate, belong to the many mysteries which accompany it, and which defy investigation. The Military Order of Knights Templars had existed little short of two Centuries from its original foundation at Jerusalem.* During that long period, it had continually increased in wealth, in reputation, and in illustrious connections; till, under the reign of Philippe le Bel, it is supposed to have numbered fifteen thousand members, many of them scions of the noblest and most ancient stocks of every Country in Christendom. France still maintained her preeminence among them; she had supplied a great majority of their Grand Masters; and Jacques de Molay, the occupier of that dignified office at the moment of which we are treating, himself a Frenchman, was planning, in conjunction with the Knights Hospitallers, that conquest of Rhodes, which the latter afterwards achieved single-handed.

On one and the same day, by virtue of sealed orders delivered to each Provincial Governor throughout France, every Templar in that Kingdom was arrested and thrown into prison, his property was sequestered, and an account of it transmitted to the King. One hundred and forty Knights were seized in their own abode, the Temple, at Paris; and De Molay, who was in their company, had not long arrived from Cyprus, at the express invitation of Philippe, by whom he had been received with much kindness and distinction. The Pope, on first receiving intelligence of this extraordinary exercise of power, testified some resentment at the violation of the privileges of a Religious Order; but his abode at Poitiers and his obligations to Philippe forbade any long resistance to the designs of the King; and content with reserving to himself the Processes against the Grand Master and a few other of the principal Officers, he abandoned the remainder to the ordinary Civil Tribunals.

The principal charges brought against the Order are said to have been framed by two Criminals condemned to imprisonment, one of them himself an apostate Templar; and they involve sufficient absurdity and contradiction, in many of their leading particulars, to ensure rejection, at least by posterity. It was pretended that the rites of admission to an Association, professedly established for the honour of God and the support of Christianity, commenced by a solemn renouncement both of God and Christ, by spurning the Crucifix, by the worship of a hideous Idol, and by an act of initiation disgusting, unmeaning, and ridiculous. Unspeaking pollutions were not only tolerated but enjoined by their rules. The choicest unguent with which a Templar could nourish the long beard distinctive of his Order, was the fat of a roasted Babe, the illegitimate offspring of some one of the Brotherhood, perhaps of himself, after it had been sacrificed with hellish orgies. His most delicious cup was mingled with the ashes of some deceased comrade, burned expressly to temper a beverage, which was asserted to inspire courage and mutual fidelity.† And lastly, it was averred that, being secretly and in heart Mohammedans, the Templars had betrayed the Holy Land and bartered it to the Sultan for Gold.

Pride, licentiousness, avarice, and ambition, an overweening lust for both wealth and power, and an influence and ascendancy dangerous to the existence of every Government under which they lived, might perhaps have been charged upon the Templars with justice; and might have afforded sufficient reasons for the policy of extinguishing their Order. But common sense and all experience revolt against belief in the atrocities which formed the basis of their accusation. Wheu were fifteen thousand men ever linked together by professed bonds of unprofitable crime and unnatural demoralization? What benefit was to be derived by secret apostasy from a Religion which they had openly sworn to uphold with their lives? Yet the solitude of a dungeon, the agonies of torture, and the terrors of an execrating death, wrung from many of the prisoners a partial confession of guilt; and in each of the Interrogatories of more than one hundred Knights still preserved to us, the admission of some one of the charges is to be discovered.* No further evidence, it may be thought, need be required of the utter futility of any criminal process in which the rack is admitted as chief cross-examiner.

Meantime, the Pope, urged on by Philippe, avowed his conviction of the guilt of the accused, and summoned an (Ecumenical Council to meet at Vienne on the 1st of October, 1310, to decide respecting the ultimate destiny of the Order. But the prisons of France overflowed with captives, notwithstanding the many who had perished by torture, by hunger, or by despair. The first capital punishments were not inflicted till nearly two years had passed since the arrests; and then fifty-six Knights, who had retracted their confessions, were burned as relapsed—burned, not only alive, but slowly, gradually, and limb by limb,† in the suburbs of Paris, protesting their innocence amidst their last shrieks of agony. Fresh executions, attended with similar horrors, rapidly succeeded each other; and when a Commission appointed by the Pope commenced the examination of the Grand Master, so acute had been his sufferings in prison, that the Procès-verbal (unused as are such documents to tenderness of expression) describes him in words of irresistible pathos. The old man, says that Instrument of blood, appeared "to have lost his faculties, and seemed as one beside himself."‡ He was remanded for a few days till he could answer; and he then affirmed that he knew no evil of his Order, to which he had belonged during ten years; and that, notwithstanding his ignorance and his poverty, four deniers being the only money which he possessed, he was ready to undertake its defence. He was reminded that no advocates were allowed to criminals accused of Heresy; and a former deposition which it was pretended that he had made, attested by three Cardinals, was read to him. He listened with unfeigned astonish-

France.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.
Abundantly of the pricipal charges.

Confessions extorted from the prisoners.

Clement V summons the Council of Vienne.

Executions
in Paris.
A. D.
1309.

Examination of the Grand Master.

* The Order was founded in A. D. 1118 by nine French Knights, who devoted themselves to the service of God and the defence of Pilgrims to the Holy Land. The Brotherhood derived its name from a residence near the Temple, assigned to it by Baldwin II.

† The Uskok Pirates in the Adriatic, suppressed by Venice in the early part of the XVIIth Century, drank the blood of their murdered prisoners from a similar superstition; but the Uskoks were a barbarous horde composed of outcasts from every nation in Europe: the Templars, on the other hand, were a corps d'élite of her noble sons.

* Simonâ, Hist. de François, ix. 206. and the authorities cited in his note to the page following.

† Fecit mettere fuoco a piede, et a poco a poco l'uno innanzi l'altro ardere. And see the account of the executions given by Boccardo, I Casi degli Humani Miseri, ix. Lentamente facevano arderli, per tutto il corpo pian piano gli abbracciavano. p. 368. Ed. Firenze, 1590.

‡ Futurus est non bene compos mentis; words which Du Puy (De la Condamnation des Templiers, ap. Thuanum, vii. p. xi p. 96.) wishes to interpret of natural imbecility and weakness; but it is little likely the administration of the Order would have been intrusted to any but a person of sound abilities.

History.

ment to its contents, crossed himself, and observed, that if the Cardinals had been of another quality, he should have well known in what fashion to answer them. The Cardinals, he was told, were not personages to take up wagers of battle; and he explained that such was not his meaning, but that he would have prayed God to award to them that punishment which the Turks and Saracens inflict on liars by beheading and evisceration.*

Council of Vienna.A. D.
1311.Suppression
of the Order.

May 6.

A. D.
1312.Execution
of the Grand Master.

March 11.

A. D.
1314.

The Council of Vienna did not assemble till more than a year after the time originally appointed for its meeting; and on its second Session, Clement solemnly pronounced the abolition of the Order of Knights Templars. The Apostolic Constitution enjoining this suppression is couched in equivocal language. "Whereas many confessions obtained from prisoners render their Order greatly suspected, and whereas moreover evil reports bruited abroad, vehement suspicions, and more especially the loud accusation presented by the Prelates, Dukes, Counts, Barons, and Commons of France have occasioned great scandal, which cannot be extinguished so long as the said Order continues to exist—therefore," &c. These are not the terms in which a Judge, convicted of the guilt of a prisoner, delivers his sentence.

The last act of this Tragedy was the execution of the Grand Master, which did not occur till nearly two years after the suppression of the Body over which he had presided. Three other dignitaries of the Order had been reserved with him in confinement, and all of them were led out before an Ecclesiastical Commission, to a scaffold erected in front of Notre Dame, where their pretended confessions were read, and they were adjudged to perpetual imprisonment. When the chief Commissioner had finished his recital, De Molay and one of his comrades in a firm tone protested their innocence, and retracted the confession attributed to them. It had either been falsified, they said, in the Procès-Verbal by advantage taken of their ignorance of Latin, or it had been extorted in moments during which they were bereaved of all mental power by the acuteness of torture. The Prelates were embarrassed by this avowal, not less unexpected than that made by Cranmer under similar circumstances; and they recommended the prisoners to their dungeon. But Philippe was more prompt; he prepared a stake within sight of his Palace Gardens, and burned the two Knights on that same evening, at the hour of Vespers. It was said that De Molay, while amid the flames, cited the Pope to appear within forty days, the King within a year and a day, before the judgment seat of God. The death of each of his Persecutors, which followed within the term prescribed, no doubt gave birth to the story; but its very existence may be assumed as a token that popular opinion inclined in favour of the sufferers.

To attempt any discussion of the secret History of this most striking transaction would far exceed our narrow limits, and could not lead to any satisfactory result. The only one of Philippe's motives for originating and following up the persecution, which is free from obscurity, is the great gain which accrued to him by the confiscation of the property of the Order. Nominally, indeed, it was transferred to the possession of the Knights Hospitallers, but they did not obtain it till after payments so extravagant as for a long time to impoverish them by their apparent increase of revenue.* To avarice there is little doubt must be added some bitter feeling of personal hatred. Philippe never forgave; and the other Process which we have before mentioned that he negotiated with Rome, sufficiently attests that even the grave was powerless to disarm his inextinguishable resentment. The object nearest his heart, immediately after the accession of Clement V., was to wreak a posthumous vengeance on Boniface, by coupling his name with perpetual infamy. He offered to establish his Heresy by indisputable witnesses before the Apostolical Court; he demanded that his remains should be disinterred; and that all the Acts of his Pontificate should be annulled.

To declare that Boniface had not been a legitimate Pope, was in great measure, as Clement could not but perceive, to invalidate his own election; for the nominations made by a false Pontiff could be of none effect, and the majority therefore of the existing Sacred College would be said to occupy their dignities illegally. Without directly opposing the requests of Philippe, Clement therefore discreetly temporized, and postponed the examination of the Cause till the assembly of the General Council at Vienna. But the rancour and impetuosity of the King urged him to an earlier hearing; and the Process, as conducted at Avignon in the beginning of the year 1310, is among the most remarkable judicial investigations presented by History. Nogaret and Plaisan were again, as before in his lifetime, the accusers of the deceased Pope; and the charges which they advanced were similar to those already recounted. Among the statements of numberless other witnesses, (many of them of broken character, and affording evidence of their own crimes by the very testimony through which they endeavoured to establish those of the Pope,) all Christendom was struck dumb by one deposition. Three gentlemen of unblemished reputation and of distinguished birth, natives respectively of Florence, of Bologna, and of Lucca, and who had filled the honourable office of Ambassadors from their separate Governments, declared that Boniface, in their joint presence, had asserted the eternity of the Universe, and denied the immortality of the soul and the divinity of Jesus. The charges which impute licentiousness to Boniface may readily be admitted, for the morals of the Clergy of his time were universally dissolute; those which assert his alliance with Demons and Sorcerers, grave as they were esteemed when produced, will not now require consideration; but that, on testimony which appears indisputable, the Head of the Christian Church should be proved wantonly and gratuitously to have avowed an infidelity which struck at the very root of his own power, is a paradox which Human Wit must ever be incompetent to resolve.

Every fresh witness increased the embarrassment of Clement. He could not exonerate Boniface without at the same time imputing falsehood and subornation to the King of France; he could not condemn him without disorganizing the whole frame and constitution of the Church. It is probable that Philippe had acuteness enough to perceive this latter hazard; and that satisfied with the exposure which he had made of his great enemy, and fully aware of the importance of the mastery which he possessed over Rome, he of his own Fraser.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.Philippe demands the condemnation of Boniface.A. D.
1305.Clement V. temporizes.The Cause is heard at Avignon.A. D.
1310.Remarks on the even-ing.Embarrassment of the Pope.Philippe relaxes.

* De la Condamnation des Templiers, ap. Thuanus, vii. p. xl. p. 96.

* Li quali ricompensarono grandissimo tesoro del Re et de' Signori che l'avevano occupate; onde lo Magistro dello Spedale si ereditò esser ricco, et per lo granche debito in che entrò per rancore venne in mal stato. G. Villani, ix. 22.

History.

From
A. D.
1199.
to
A. D.
1314.

accord forebore to press to dangerous extremities a measure which might render nothing worth a tool now so valuable. He agreed, therefore, to a compromise, by which Clement was extricated from his dilemma; and a Bull appeared, which, without touching upon the principal question of the guilt or innocence of Bouiface, declared that the motives of the King of France in instituting the inquiry were pure and honourable. It at the same time annulled all the spiritual censures which the late Pope had directed against France, and granted absolution even to Nogaret and thirteen others who had participated with him in the outrage at Anagni, on condition of their devoting the remainder of their lives to service in Palestine. Subsequently, at the Council of Vienne, the Pontificate of Boniface was declared legal, and he was exculpated from the imputation of Heresy.*

A few words may suffice for the remainder of this reign, the peculiarity of many transactions in which has imperatively required a somewhat detailed narrative. A feud between the Citizens of Lyon and their Archbishop, which Philippe himself had encouraged, enabled the rapacious Prince to annex that important City to his Crown. The state of Flanders once again obliged him to arm, but without proceeding to absolute hostilities. His finances continued embarrassed, and his domestic tranquillity was broken by disorders in the families of his three sons. One of them avenged the infidelity of his wife by death; another by the Cloister; the third by temporary repudiation; and the adulterers were condemned to a punishment, in which cruelty appears to have exhausted itself in search of refinement. At length after a tedious illness, produced by an accident in hunting, Philippe le Bel terminated a life of forty-eight years and a reign of twenty-nine, in which, although it is in many points of great note in History, he contributed neither to the happiness of his people nor to his own glory.

withstanding the allegiance which Henry had exacted before his death; and the Ghibelins named as King of the Romans, Philip Duke of Suabia, next brother of their deceased Monarch, who assumed the Crown as custos for his nephew; the Guelphs bestowed the same title on Otho IV., Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, and son of Henry the Lion. The Holy See had invariably shown itself hostile to the Suabian Family, and Innocent followed the steps of his predecessors by continuing to oppose its aggrandizement; but in the long ensuing contest between the rival Princes which harassed Germany for nearly eight years, neither party ever attained sufficient strength to enable him to claim the Imperial Crown at Rome. Philip was at length triumphant, and having forced his competitor, after a total defeat at Cologne, to seek refuge with his uncle John in England, he readily found means of reconciliation with the sagacious and politic Innocent. At the moment, however, at which his power appeared for the first time to rest on an enduring basis, his life was terminated by a private feud. The fierce temper of Otho of Wittelsbach, Count Palatine of Bavaria, had induced Philip to retract a promise which he had once made of bestowing his daughter's hand on that powerful Noble; and Otho, in revenge, poniarded him while confined to his chamber by indisposition, sprang upon his horse after disengaging himself from the terrified attendants, and escaped pursuit.*

Wearied by Civil war, the Germans, on the death of Otho IV., Philip, unanimously acknowledged the claim of Otho, who in the following year was crowned by Innocent at Rome. Yet notwithstanding the Imperial power was now vested in a Family whose cause had always been espoused by the Papacy, the main interests of the two Courts were too decidedly at variance to permit their amity to be of long continuance; and for a while we shall perceive the strange spectacle of a Ghibelin claimant opposed by the Pope to a Guelph possessor of the Empire, whom himself had but recently invested with that

Germany and Italy.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.

Success of Philip.
A. D.
1206.

His assassination.
A. D.
1208.

His quarrel with Innocent III.

PART II.

ANNALS OF GERMANY AND ITALY

The Crown of Germany disturbed between Philippe of Suabia and that of Saxony.
A. D.
1197.

During the first half of the XIIIth Century it is still necessary to confine the GERMAN and ITALIAN Annals in a single channel. The former indeed, if taken separately, are altogether barren; and the sole interest which the History of the Empire affords arises from its connection with the Southern peninsula. The death of Henry VI. and the accession of Innocent III. to the Pontifical Chair were nearly simultaneous; and the late Emperor's infant son Frederic was left under the guardianship of the Pope, who administered the government of Naples and Sicily far more as if they were his own Kingdoms than as belonging to a ward. The two great factions in Germany, however, were little inclined to submit themselves to the government of a child, not-

* Otho had treacherously assassinated a retainer of Philip, who on that account refused to complete the proposed alliance with his daughter. The Count afterwards sought the hand of a Princess of Poland, and asked letters of recommendation from Philip, who was her kinsman. Having some misgivings, however, as to the real contents of these despatches, which he himself was unable to decipher, nam rer. militaria litteras ipse non agnovit, he compelled a Secretary to read them, qui, ubi edit litteras Urise, exprobra. Philip, it seems, had written his real opinion of the Count, and had dissuaded his relation from the match, and this candour cost him his life. Krantz, Saxonia, lib. vii. p. 193.

† We have already explained the origin of these party names as connected with German History, ch. lxxiii. p. 633. The last heiress of the Bavarian Guelphs married a younger son of the House of Este, the most powerful Family in Eastern Lombardy, which about the end of the XIIIth Century became the Head of the Church-Party in their own district. The opposition raised by this faction to the Ghibelin or Suabian Emperors, transferred the two German names to Italy; and in the case of Otho IV., those names, with little regard to their Family origin, signified no more than that a Guelph espoused the side of the Pope, a Ghibelin that of the (Guelph) Emperor. The story related by Gianoone (xvi. l.) of the Feud between the Houses of the Buondelmonti and Amadei at Florence, by no means accounts for the adoption of the names in Italy.

Krantz has given a fearful, but probably by no means an exaggerated account of the fury of this party spirit in Italy. Sed quid de uno Tartaro nati dissensionis Italica Civitates per tot annos tumultuantes, miris circumventionibus et vertiginosis circuitu implicites, implorabiles obsecuri invicem, necessest quidam rē in te inquantur. Non modo enim agna bellica habent aeterna, sed colores, terrores, fremitus, hostilia corporum, ipse hominum incensus, digniorum convectus, et ora huius nam adhuc partium triumphantem. Saxonia, viii. p. 207.

* See the Bull, Preseus de Differend, 592. One of the most masterly portions of M. de Simond's Hist. des Français is the clear analysis which he has presented of the Process against Boniface VIII. (tom. ix. ch. xxiii.). Any one who has but glanced at the interminable pages of Raynaldus and of Du Puy, must be at once aware of the unwearied diligence and dexterous faculty of arrangement which so apparently hopeless a task required, and has received.

History.
From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.

War with Frederic II.

Invasion of Naples.
A. D.
1210.

Otho recalled to Germany
by an insurrection.
A. D.
1212.
His depression after his defeat at Bouvines.

A. D.
1214.
His anse-rities.

and death.
A. D.
1218.

dignity. Innocent's grand object was to erect the Holy See into a powerful temporal State; and during the weakness of the Empire by its late disputed succession, he had obtained possession of the March of Ancona and the Duchies of Spoleto and Romagna. In his further hope to extort from Otho more important portions of the great donation of the Countess Matilda, which had been withheld by his predecessors, Innocent, however, was disappointed; and the enmity which this refusal generated, occasioned for a time the anomaly which we have just mentioned in Italian Politics. The intrigues of the Pope secured for the youthful Frederic II., hitherto restricted to his hereditary Sicilian dominions, the powerful support of Philippe Auguste of France, and of many of the discontented Saxon Nobles; and he was already preparing to dispute the Imperial claim, on German ground, when Otho prudently anticipated the struggle by invading Naples. In spite of an Excommunication which Innocent hastened to promulgate, Otho was everywhere successful, and he felt assured of wresting his throne from the young King of Priests,* as he contemptuously termed Frederic, when he was recalled to Germany by a hazardous insurrection.

Frederic pursued with vigour the advantage thus offered to him, and at once transferred the seat of war into Germany. So powerfully was he supported in the upper districts beyond the Moselle, that Otho felt unable to meet him in the field; and when the memorable overthrow at Bouvines had destroyed the force with which the Emperor hoped to check the diversion made by Philippe Auguste, no chance remained of further opposition. He lived, indeed, four years longer, but abandoned by all his Princes, and apparently in privacy at Brunswick. From the details which we possess of his last moments, it would seem that he addicted himself to the austere penance, under a belief that his misfortunes were the result of the Papal wrath. Stripped naked, and prostrate on the ground, he submitted to a long discipline from the Priests who surrounded him, while the Miserere was chanted; ever urging them to strike yet harder, and inviting even his scullions to trample upon his neck.† So profound a humiliation won mercy from the Vatican. Honorius IV., who had succeeded Innocent in the tiara, confirmed the absolution which the attendant Bishop had not denied; and the remains of this spirit-broken and degraded Prince were allowed interment with Imperial honours in the Abbey of St. Blaise;‡

Of the great part which Innocent III. took in the IVth Crusade, and of the chief stains on his active and ambitious Pontificate, the Persecution of the Albigenses and the establishment of the Inquisition, enough has been already said in a former part of this Chapter. Few Papal reigns have been more enterprising, more brilliant, and more successful; and there was scarcely a single European Sovereign who at some time did not bow beneath his despotism. Occupied in the engrossing pursuit of enlarging the temporal power of his See, in his private habits he was liberal and unostentatious; he adorned the Chair of St. Peter by Learning, and he did not pollute it by immorality.* In the year after the close of the IVth Council of Lateran, which he had successfully directed to the support of Frederic II., and to the condemnation of Heresy, he terminated at Perugia, a reign which had lasted nineteen years, and which he had commenced at the unusually early age of thirty-seven.

Frederic II. had been crowned King of the Romans four years before the death of Otho. When that event occurred, he could entertain little doubt of his investiture with the Empire by the hands of Honorius III., who before his elevation to the Pontificate had long held the honourable post of Governor of Palermo. But the Pope not only knew, but resolved also to exercise the superiority which change of station had bestowed; and he refused to bestow the Imperial Crown till his former master solemnly engaged to undertake a Crusade. Two years elapsed after his accession before Frederic appeared at Rome; and many obstacles then intervened to prevent the rapid fulfilment of this extorted promise. Puglia demanded organization, and many of its Barons were to be restrained only by force of arms. Sicily was yet more disturbed; for the Saracens, who occupied the mountainous districts in the centre of the Island, profited by their strong position to ravage the surrounding plains; and were not unfrequently assisted in their work of rapine by roving bands of their Countrymen from the neighbouring coast of Africa. To remedy this crying evil it was necessary first to dislodge the brigands from their fastnesses, and then to locate them afresh; and many thousands were allured by the fertile plains of the Capitanata, to colonize Lucera and its neighbourhood.†

Five years had thus passed and Palestine was still neglected, while every moment diminished the waning power of the Christians in the East. But the policy of Honorius discovered means of stimulating the tardy and

* Nevertheless the Spirit of this Pope, which appeared to the Holy Virgin Lutgarde, informed her that it had merited eternal damnation for three sins; but that, through the intercession of the Virgin, to whom, while living, Innocent had dedicated a Monastery, those eternal pains had been commuted for the sufferings of Purgatory till the Day of Judgement. Lutgarde revealed the nature of these three sins to her Biographer Thomas Cantimpræ, who, out of respect to the great Pontiff, forbears to repeat them. Vita Lutgarde, ii. 7. Ap. Surium, Vita Sanctarum, iii. die 16 Jan. M. de Sigmund, from whom we derive this legend, which he has related with great happiness, concludes it by adding, Le lecteur trouvera peut-être plus de tristes crimes, dont Innocent pouvait être appelé à rendre compte devant la Majesté divine. Hist. de Rep. B. ii. 347.

† The reasons given for this transportation by G. Villani are per essere più al sicuro dell' Isola dai Saraceni della Barberia, et ancora per tenere la guerra per loro i suoi subditi del Regno di Puglia. The site chosen is described as follows: Una antica Città deserta, che anticamente fu in lega coi Romani, et fu disfatta per li Saraceni, così per quelli di Bravento, la quale all' hora si chiamava Lucera et oggi si chiama Noerra, et furono più di sex mila Saraceni da arme, et quella Città rifeccero molto forte. Lib. vi. c. 14. apud Muratori Script. B. xiii. 162.

* In contemptum Romane Ecclesie Regem Fredericum Regem appellavit Presbyterorum. Riccardo da S. Germano, cited by Giammoze, xv. 3.

† Optima autem spes salutis in tantâ contritione is the orthodox deduction of Krantz after relating some of the above particulars. Saxonia, vii. 199. The others may be found in Martenne, Thes. Anecdotorum, tom. iii. p. 1374, where a Narratio de morte Othonis IV. Imp. is printed ex MS. Viterbensi. Thomas of Walsingham assures us that the dying Emperor, being unable to swallow the viaticum, humbly adored it with outstretched arms; and that the consecrated wafer, leaping from the hands of the Priest, buried itself within the left side of the willing recipient, towards the region of the heart; the aperture, which spontaneously opened at its approach, closing again without a scar. Ap. Camdeni Anglica, p. 461.

‡ According to an ancient inscription in that Church, which, with the customary privilege of an epiphany, describes it as the burial-place of the grosmâchtige Kayser Otho.

Germany
and Italy.
From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
Pontifical and death of Innocent
III.
July 16.
A. D.
1216.

Accession of Frederic II.

He promises to undertake a Crusade.

The Saracens re-moved from Sicily to Lucera.
A. D.
1223.

Marriage of Frederic with Isabella, daughter of Jerusalem.
A. D.
1223.

History. reluctant Emperor. Frederic was a widower;* and the Pope engaged for him the hand of Yolanda, whose portion in right of her Father, John of Brienne, was no less than the nominal Kingdom of Jerusalem.† Little honour could be derived from the possession of this shadowy title, unless its reestablishment were attempted; and Frederic accordingly, during the year which followed his nuptials, appointed a general rendezvous for the Crusaders at Brindisi, and at length embarked on person. But a Summer passed in the burning and unwholesome climate of Southern Italy had spread disease among the troops; so rapid and so fatal was the contagion, that to proceed appeared hopeless; and after severe loss among his followers in a voyage of only three days' continuance, the Emperor returned to land. Some doubt may reasonably exist whether, after all, he had been sincere in this demonstration; and whether he did not still intend to evade a promise which from the first he had repented.‡

That Gregory IX., who had succeeded to the Papacy by the death of Honorius, esteemed the excuse no other than a subterfuge, is clear from the heavy penalty of Excommunication with which he immediately visited the Emperor. Shamed or alarmed by this censure, Frederic, in the following year, really sailed for Palestine. But his departure, without having sought previous absolution, was esteemed by Gregory an increase of sin: he occupied Puglia with troops;§ he pursued the Emperor even to the Holy Land by fresh Excommunication through the Patriarch of Jerusalem; he crippled his power by forbidding the Knights Templars and Hospitallers from serving under his command; and he even despatched Envoys to the Sultan to warn him against negotiation. When, in spite of all these unexpected obstacles, Frederic had concluded a most honourable Treaty with that Prince, by which the Christians were allowed free access to Jerusalem, and himself celebrated his Coronation within its walls,|| so inveterate was the enmity of the Pontiff, that he denounced the signature of a Peace thus advantageous, as an execrable crime which excited horror and astonishment.*

But the return of the Emperor changed the face of affairs in Italy. He recovered all the towns which the Papal troops had occupied in Puglia; and with the sword in his hand and a petition for absolution on his lips, he compelled Gregory to release him from Excommunication. In the Treaty negotiated with the Pope was included also a Confederacy, then first recognised, and long afterwards most harassing to Frederic. The Lombard Cities a few years back had embodied themselves in a Second League,† of which, as before, Milan was the Chief; the Pope assumed its protection; and as the obstinate refusal of the Iron Crown of Monza had greatly irritated Frederic against the Milanese, Gregory ensured their safety, which was essential to his own, by making them parties in this negotiation.

There can be little doubt, however, that the Pope's reconciliation was hollow, and that he was deeply concerned in the sedition which ere long assailed Frederic's power in Germany, and called up an unnatural enemy from the bosom of his own family. His son Henry, deluded by promises of support from Milan, actively excited rebellion on the Rhine, and engaged Ferdinand of Austria in his behalf. But the rapid movements of the Emperor, who hastened from Italy on the first alarm, anticipated this treachery; the guilty Prince besought mercy at his Father's feet, and expiated his crime by degradation from his title of King of the Romans, and by imprisonment for life in Sicily.‡ The Lombards merited severer punishment; and the Emperor was urgently instigated to wreak his vengeance upon their League, by one who indulged the hope of private aggrandizement in the renewal of War. The Family of Romano had long headed the Ghibelin faction in the Trevisan March; and of the two Brothers, Alberic and Eccellino, who now shared the Fiefs of that powerful House, the latter, eminent by his talents, his courage, his subtility, and his recklessness of crime, was earnestly waiting an occasion for the establishment of an independent Sovereignty; and regarded with especial avidity the Lordship which his ancient rival, the Marquis d'Este, had established at Ferrara.

Verona and Vicenza were soon mastered by the force

Germany and Italy.

From A. D. 1197.

to A. D. 1298.

He returns to Italy,

A. D. 1229.

and concludes a Treaty with the Pope, and the Second Lombard League

A. D. 1230.

Rebellion and punishment of his son Henry.

A. D. 1235.

Eccellino Romano excites the Emperor against the Lombards.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

A. D. 1235.

* By his first wife, Constance of Aragon, to whom he was married at fourteen years of age, Frederic had issue Henry, crowned King of the Romans in 1222.

† Yolanda was daughter of John, Count of Brienne, by Maria, eldest daughter and heiress of Isabella, wife of Conrad, Marquis of Montferrat. Upon Isabella, although she was the youngest child of Amaury, King of Jerusalem, that empty title had devolved in consequence of the failure of the elder branches; and the marriage of Frederic with Yolanda affords the present Roy a House of Naples one of their claims to the same title, which they still preserve, and which the lapse of six Centuries has not increased in value. See Hallam, Middle Ages, i. 264. 4to. The title of Yolanda (Iole) is very clearly traced by Giannone, xvi. 2.

‡ The representation given by Matthew Paris certainly warrants this suspicion. The Emperor, he says, embarked cum parvo comitatu; sed postquam per triduum ad terram promissionis tendere vidisset, dixit se subitū infirmatum præcepit, ita quod maris intemperies simul et æra corruptio non potuit mortis discrimine diutius sustinere, unde relictis velis ad portum quo mare ingressus fuerat post tres dies applicuit. p. 339. Here is no more than an appearance of sailing, and the excuse for giving up the voyage is a little seasickness.

§ The soldiers employed in this Crusade, as it was called, were named Chavengnati, Giannone, xvi. 6.

|| In a Letter cited by Struvius, the Emperor writes from Jerusalem with very just exultation. Scitis quod die Sabbathi, anni hujusce mensis Martii, prædictam civitatem sanctam Jerusalem intraui cum ingenti gaudio exercitus Christiani; in qua sepulcrum Dei cunctis præceperat visitandum, longum Catholicis Imperator; ac sequente die Dominici, anni ejusdem mensis, coronam ibi portavi, ad honorem et gloriam Sancti Regis. It is not easy to account for his great and rapid success under so many disadvantages. The heads of the Treaty with the Sultan are given by Raynaldus, ad ann. 1229, § 15.

* Raynaldus, ad ann. 1229, § 24. Letter from the Pope to the Duke of Austria.

† The Cities which signed this League were Milan, Bologna, Piacenza, Verona, Brescia, Faenza, Mantua, Vercelli, Lodi, Bergamo, Turin, Alessandria, Vicenza, Padua, and Treviso: Cremona, Parma, Modena, and Reggio remained devotedly Ghibelin. A very lucid arrangement of the complicated petty States into which Northern Italy was divided at this period, is given by Mr. Hallam, Middle Ages, i. 265, 4to.

‡ Bocaccio, in his Tract De' Coni degli Humani Illustri, gives a romantic account of the death of Henry. After he had been long imprisoned, his Father, touched with compassion, sent for him with the intention of restoring him to liberty. Henry, who anticipated some severe punishment, found an opportunity of eluding the watchfulness of his escort as he was passing a river, leaped his horse over the parapet of the bridge by which it was crossed, and was drowned in the water beneath. The more general belief assigns him a natural death in the year 1242. Krautz, who pursues the memory of Frederic with a bitterness of spirit which would have rendered him, if he had been contemporary, an oracle among the Guells, implies that Henry was put to death by his Father's order. The charge is qualified by an ut ferunt; the effect of which, however, is greatly diminished by the concluding remark, Crementum Imperium quod suis viaceribus non parceret. Saxonia, viii. 6.

History.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
Battle of Corte-Nuova.
Nov. 27.
A. D.
1237.
Siege of Brescia.

Frederic excommunicated,
A. D.
1239.

and a Crusade preached against him.

A. D.
1240.

The French Clergy proceeding to a Council in the La-teran

which Frederic directed against them in person; and Padua, a more important conquest, was won during his absence by Eccellino. When the Emperor reentered Italy, his force was strengthened by a body of ten thousand Saracens drawn from his new Colony in Puglia. Penetrating along the banks of the Oglio to Corte-Nuova, he surprised and totally overthrew the Milanese with the loss of their Carroccio; and the first check in his victorious progress was received under the walls of Brescia. That City, often afterwards similarly distinguished in Italian History, endured a siege of sixty-eight days, during which the assailants maintained themselves with unbroken perseverance, and in the end compelled the Emperor to burn his artillery and withdraw to Cremona. New enemies, meantime, had arisen. An ill-judged and cruel act, the execution of a Son of the Doge of Venice, who filled the office of Podestà of Milan, was not forgiven by that Republic; which, in conjunction with Genoa, allied itself to the Lombards. When Gregory also, in full Consistory, pronounced a Sentence of Excommunication against the Emperor, Frederic, well aware of the defection from his cause which was likely to result from this manifestation of Papal displeasure, determined to march at once on Rome. Gregory, as he approached, far from endeavouring to conciliate his powerful enemy, prepared for war with redoubled energy; he roused the passions and excited the imagination of the populace of the Capital and its neighbourhood by repeated processions, in which the most venerated relics were borne through the streets, and the spectators were besought to arm for their protection; and he summoned a General Council to meet at the Lateran during the following Easter. To his first call, and to the Crusade which the Dominicans and Franciscans preached by his instructions against Frederic, the people replied enthusiastically; and so numerous was the army which marshalled itself in defence of the Eternal City, that the Emperor, without attempting its investment, passed on into Puglia. Bitterly resenting the arts which had been employed to convert into a War of Religion that which ought more justly to have been considered a private feud, he ruthlessly put to the sword every prisoner upon whom he found the badge of the Cross, thus desecrated from its legitimate purpose.*

The invitation to a Council was promptly met by the Clergy of France; and the Emperor perceived that if he allowed it to assemble, his Excommunication would be confirmed, and his adherents would gradually drop away. He addressed letters, therefore, to all the European Princes urging them to oppose the gathering of this Council, which was not convened for the promotion of Ecclesiastical Peace, but rather to excite a cruel war against one of the Chiefs of Christendom. In order to intercept the French Clergy in their progress to Rome, he adopted yet more active measures. All approach by land being blockaded, for Frederic had six armies in the field,† the Genoese undertook to convey the Deputies to the Council, from their rendezvous at Nice to the mouth of the Tiber. Seven and twenty galleys freighted with this holy burden were already on their passage between the Isles of Meloria and Guglio, when they were encountered by a confederate fleet of Pisans and Sicilians. Never was victory more complete than that attained by the Ghibelins; nineteen of the hostile galleys were captured, three were sunk; the booty in money was so enormous that the allied sailors are reported to have divided their spoil, not by the tedious operation of counting, but by measuring it with a bushel; and the two Cardinals and the many Prelates who were found among the four thousand prisoners who had been taken, were confined in the Chapter House of the Cathedral of Pisa, and fettered, in mock respect, with silver chains.* The ultimate fruits of his victory were far greater than the conqueror had ventured to anticipate. Overwhelmed with chagrin and mortification, Gregory died within a few months after the discomfiture of the hopes which he had entertained from the Council, no longer to be assembled.

The Pontificate of Celestin IV., his immediate successor, endured but eighteen days; and so reduced in numbers, and so distracted in opinion, was the Conclave after his death, that an interregnum of twenty months ensued. Its choice at length rested upon Simbaldo di Fresco, a noble Genoese, who assumed the title of Innocent IV. When Frederic was congratulated on the elevation of an Ecclesiastic with whom he had always lived on terms of familiarity, and whose House had invariably espoused the Ghibelin principles, he evinced no small knowledge of mankind in his reply: "I am rather to be pitted than to be congratulated, for I have lost a zealous friend in the Cardinal, and I shall find a virulent enemy in the Pope."† If the speech be genuine, greater foresight has seldom been evinced. No efforts were wanting on Frederic's part to conciliate the new Pontiff; the noblest officers of his Court were despatched to compliment him on his accession, to offer entire submission, and to ask the hand of a niece of his Holiness for Conrad the Emperor's son and presumptive heir. As a preliminary, however, the Pope demanded the release of all prisoners and the cession of all conquests; a proposition which was met by another for the abandonment of the Lombard Cities, and the recall of the Legate who was preaching a Crusade. On neither side

* We have here followed Sismondi and his numerous authorities, (Rep. Ital. iii. 48.) Giannone, however, assigns a far heavier fate to the distinguished prisoners. He states the number of captured galleys to have been twenty-two, containing three Legates, the Archbishop of Rouen, many English and French Bishops besides inferior Clergy, and un grosso numero d'Ambasciatori. Some of these, he says, were massacred on the spot; some were distributed in various prisons, in which those who were not released at the instance of their respective Sovereigns died wretchedly by starvation. Struvius also writes, although more briefly, much to the same purpose. i. 463.

† Perdidi bonum amicum quia nullus Papa potest esse Ghibellinus. Galvaneus Flamma, Monip. Flor. c. 276. ap. Murat. xi. 680. Ex optimo amico Cardinale se infestissimum hostem Pontificem habuit. Raynaldus, ad ann. 1243. § 12. Giannone, when speaking of the change which Honorius III. on his accession had shown towards Frederic, has the following remarks which are very much to our purpose. Fu osservazione de' più diligenti investigatori de' costumi e delle azioni umane, appoggiata sopra antichi e moderni esempi, che i Pontifici maggiori nemici che hanno avuto i Principi, sono stati quelli che in tempo della loro privata fortuna furono di lui famigliari e domestici. Innocenzo IV. essendo Cardinale fu grand amico di Federico, ma questi quando intere la sua elezione si accorru, e prevede quanto accedeva a lui di male. xvi. ad fin.

* Both Giannone and Struvius represent Frederic as inflicting great cruelties upon his prisoners, but they do not cite authorities. The former says, Quant de Croisignants faicent prigioniers, tant faicent loro, a fendere in quattro parti la testa, o con ferro infocato signore in fronte una Croce, xvii. 2. The latter accuses the Emperor of throwing his captives after various molitions, and adds, Clerici carissimi in Cruxis furcam vulcerant per primum cutem usque ad cranium, quibusdam per se crani. i. 461.

† Habuit enim cum exerecibus, magnos, populosos et formidibiles. Matt. Paris, 256.

Germany
and Italy.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298. are captured by the Ghibelin fleet.
A. D.
1241.

Death of Gregory
IX.
Aug. 21.

Celestin IV.

Innocent IV.
A. D.
1243.

Frederic
attempts negotiations.

History. did there appear willingness to comply, and Frederic again took the field.

From Still the negotiations were not entirely broken off, and in the course of the following year they appeared ripe for amicable conclusion. Whether Innocent had been no more than temporizing, or whether he was apprized of some treacherous design, it is not now possible to determine; but at the moment in which the Emperor expected to receive his signature to the pending Treaty, he was astonished to learn that the Pope had taken horse by night, and had ridden to Civita Vecchia with the utmost speed, wholly unattended and in a military disguise.* He there found a well-armed fleet from Genoa waiting for his arrival, and embarking for that City he entered it in triumph, and proceeded over land to Lyon, where he fixed his Court under the protection of Louis IX. of France. On the first receipt of this astounding intelligence the Emperor published abroad that the Pontiff's flight had been occasioned by guilty terror. "Certain Monks," said Frederic, "have conspired to poison me, and all the evidence which I have received fixes the origin of the plot upon the Pope." From events which followed it is possible that his suspicion might be true; it is very probable, also, that, impressed with this belief, he had determined to seize the person of Innocent who saved himself by timely escape.†

Flight of Innocent IV.

A. D. 1244.

to Lyon.

Council of Lyon

A. D. 1245.

deposes Frederic.
July 17.

his conduct on hearing he was—nice.

"have I lost my Crown: nor shall it be torn from me by any Pope or Council without a bloody struggle! This new outrage is indeed a benefit, for it has freed me from all former bonds of reverence and obedience to the ungrateful Pontiff!"‡

The sentence of deposition was followed up by the open excitement of a revolt in Sicily, whither Legates were despatched to preach the duty of insurrection against this "second Nero." It seems, also, that the vengeance of Innocent directed itself not less against Frederic's person than his power. A Plot for his assassination was discovered in which many of the chief Sicilian Nobles participated; and each culprit who was brought to the scaffold affirmed that he had received encouragement from the Pope.† That which most profoundly afflicted Frederic was his knowledge that many whom he esteemed familiar friends were included among the conspirators. A similar spirit of rebellion was inflamed in Germany also, where Henry, Landgrave of Thuringia, having assumed the Imperial title, found powerful support, and overthrew the force with which Conrad, King of the Romans, was despatched for his suppression. Although, in a subsequent engagement, the Pretender was defeated upon the very eve of his Coronation, and died not long afterwards a victim to chagrin,‡ so deeply was Frederic impressed by the numberless perils with which he had been beset since the commencement of this last quarrel with the Holy See, that he was now willing to purchase reconciliation at almost any price which might be demanded. He offered to accompany Louis IX. in the armament which he was equipping for Palestine; and, with a promise of never again returning to Europe, to devote the whole remainder of his life to service against the Infidels. He agreed to the separation of the German from the Sicilian Crown in a partition of his dominions between his sons, stipulating only that Conrad should inherit the former.§ Innocent demanded yet one humiliation more, and insisted that the Imperial Penitent should personally appear at his Court. Even to this last contumely the Emperor professed willingness to submit, and he had already arrived at Turin on his route to Lyon, accompanied by a retinue slender in proportion to his high dignity, when he learned that the ceaseless enmity of the Pope, during this seeming approach to friendship, had stimulated the Guelphs in Parma to revolt, and had wrested that important City from his sway. Stung to fury by this insufferable perfidy, he renounced all further negotiation with Innocent; and rapidly assembling a numerous army, to whose ranks the Saracen archers and the retainers of Eccellino largely contributed, he invested the rebellious City.

In his first paroxysm of anger, Frederic had recourse to odious cruelties in the hope of striking terror. More than a thousand Parmesans languished in his prisons;

Germany and Italy.

From A. D. 1197, to A. D. 1298, Innocent excites rebellion in Sicily, A. D. 1246.

and in Germany.

The Emperor seeks reconciliation with the Church.
A. D. 1247.

Revolt of Parma.

Rupture of negotiation with the Pope.

Frederic besieges Parma.

* Dominus igitur Papa non mediocriter attentus, et perturbatus vultum præfrens, in hora primi anni, relictis Papalibus ornamentis, veterem intus vesiculidum (a word which we do not find explained either in the Glossary to Matt. Paris, or in Du Cange,) et leviter armatus equum aëreâ ebullitione; manu non vacillans, et viribus concussis concussis subito discedens, non equum pepercit lateribus: ut quod ante primam, triginta quatuor milibus pertransiit, nemine constanti vel ipsum equum potente. Matt. Paris, 637.

† Innocent propagated a report to that effect. Significatum fuit Domino Papæ, ut idem postea narravit, quod trecenti milites Turchi arant in veniendo ipsi nocte at ipsum apprehenderent. Id. ibid.

* Matt. Paris, 679. Raynaldus, ad ann. 1245, § 58.

† Letter from Frederic to Henry III. of England. Id. 712.

‡ Id. 726. Authorities differ as to the cause of Henry's death, some assign dysentery, some a wound by an arrow received before Ulm.

§ The second son here mentioned was another Henry, the issue of Frederic's third marriage with Isabella, daughter of John of England, a Princess of whose beauty, virtues, and accomplishments, Matthew Paris repeatedly speaks with unbounded commendation.

|| Quo audito idem Fredericus pro fratre vis se capiens totus accenditur irâ vehementer. Matt. Paris, 734.

History. and four of these unhappy captives, two of them soldiers, two civilians, were led out to a spot removed two bowshots from the walls and beheaded in view of the citizens who thronged the ramparts; proclamation being at the same time made that a similar bloody spectacle would be exhibited every day till the garrison should surrender. On one day more it was indeed repeated; and might have been continued according to the original menace, but for the interference of the Pavian troops who served under the Imperial banner. A sense of shame, or a fear of mutiny prevailed with Frederic, and he countermanded his sanguinary order.

and build the town of Vittoria.

Resolutely bent upon vengeance, and yet having made little progress towards the conquest of Parma, Frederic, as Winter approached, instead of distributing his troops into cantonments, resolved to fix them in the very lines which they had hitherto occupied. About four bowshots Westward from the great City which he was besieging, he laid the foundation of a town equalling it in dimensions* and strongly fortified; its houses were constructed out of the materials of all the neighbouring villages which he had destroyed; he turned into the fosses by which it was surrounded the waters of the Canal Navilio which hitherto had fed the cisterns of Parma; and he made a vow that when he had captured that City and razed every stone in it to the ground, he would transport its remaining inhabitants to this new creation, which he named Vittoria. So confident was he of success, that he refused all offers of capitulation proposed by the justly terrified insurgents; and having fully completed his arrangements, he contented himself by a blockade, till the return of Spring should permit the renewal of active operations. Meantime, he employed his unoccupied hours in the pleasures of the chase and of lawking, to which he was passionately devoted.† This careless security inspired the Parmesans with the hope of deliverance by a most daring project. While the Emperor one morning was distantly

Sortie of the Parmesans,
A. D.
1248, Feb. 18,
and destruction of Vittoria.

William Count of Holland crowned in Germany.

Frederic retires to Tuscany.

engaged with his Falcons, the garrison made a sortie; stormed the defences of Vittoria; put to the sword or captured the greater part of its occupants; utterly destroyed every vestige of habitation within its circuit; and retired laden with an inestimable booty, among which were the Carroccio of the Cremonese, and the jewels and Regalia of the Emperor. Frederic himself, while returning from his sport, was met by some fugitives from this great overthrow, and not without difficulty, after escaping a hot pursuit, gained an asylum in Cremona.

Nor was this his sole reverse; a new Pretender had succeeded the Landgrave of Thuringia in Germany, and William Count of Holland, after having been crowned by the discontented Nobles, defeated Conrad, and compelled him to seek refuge with his Father in Italy. The Pope, still obdurate, declined all renewed offers of submission; and Frederic, abandoning his attempts upon the Lombard Cities, directed himself to operations in Tuscany. The Ghibelin Cause, although predominant in other Cities of that Republic, did not establish itself in Florence till after a severe struggle; and even when the Guelfs, perceiving further opposition to be hopeless, evacuated the town by night in one body,

* So it is described by Matthew Paris: civitatem grandem et populatam ut ipse Parmam perfricat exterior. Ibid.

† Under the head FALCONRY, in our Macedonian Division, may be found some account of a Treatise written by Frederic II. on that Art.

the Emperor forbore from personal occupation of his important conquest. He was deterred by a superstitious dread. Astrology had been among his favourite studies, and he had read the stars under the guidance of Michael Scott, whom he admitted to the most intimate familiarity. The Wizard, it seems, had cautioned him that if he entered the walls of Florence, death would be the consequence; and Frederic, intimidated by the warning, after a short abode in the neighbourhood, proceeded onward to Puglia.*

More than one calamity pursued him during the short remainder of his troubled days. On quitting Lombardy, he devolved the care of that district upon one of his natural sons, Heinisius, to whom he had also given the Crown of Sardinia. But the force under that young Prince was inadequate to the maintenance of his great charge; and when he encountered the Bolognese, at that time the most active among the Guelfs, at Fossalta, it was to experience a signal overthrow, the prelude of more than two and twenty years of hopeless captivity. Partly from hatred to the lineage, partly from a just apprehension of the distinguished talents and valour of their prisoner, the Senate of Bologna passed an express law prohibiting the future release of Heinisius, whatever might be the ransom tendered for his liberty. He was lodged honourably, and treated with marked indulgence in all points which excluded hazard of escape; and at his decease, in 1271, a pompous monument and a gilded statue were erected in the Church of S. Domenico, more, doubtless, to perpetuate the triumph of his captors, than as a token of respect to the memory of the prisoner.†

But the treachery of a familiar friend and most able Minister, whom he had long regarded with lively affection and unbounded confidence;‡ was perhaps the severest affliction which clouded the latter days of Frederic's reign. Piero delle Vigne, one of the most remarkable personages of his own, or indeed of any times, was born in obscurity at Capua. At the University of Bologna, in which he begged alms for subsistence during the progress of his education, he astonished his teachers by the facility with which he ranged over all varieties of knowledge; and when accident had once introduced him to Frederic, his elevation was rapid and permanent. During a long course of years, the brilliancy of Piero's administration fully justified his Master's choice; and his profound Juridical knowledge, the persuasiveness of his eloquence, and the singular skill in diplomatic composition evinced by his numerous Letters (the State Papers of that Age) which are still extant,§ prove how richly he merited the high ascendancy which

Germany
and Italy,
From
A. D.
1197,
to
A. D.
1298.
The Guelfs lose every Florence.

Prince Heinisius defeated at Fossalta,
May 25,
A. D.
1249.
His captivity.

Rise of Piero delle Vigne.

* Non volle entrare in Firenze, perche per vana predicatione di Michele Scotti, grande Astrologo e Mago di que' tempi, gli era stato detto che aveva da morire dentro, e fermatosi ad un luogo suo vicino, poco dopo passò l'Imperatore in Puglia. Giannone, xvii. 4. The prophecy ran that Frederic was to die in castris Florentinis; (Florentinae) and like Cambyzes and our own Henry IV. he referred the prediction affecting him to a wrong place, and verified it in the end by dying at Ferentino in the Capitanata. See also G. Villani, vi. 35.

† Giannone, ibid.

‡ Del cuor di Federico.

§ Io non così che tenni ambo le chiavi Dante, Inf. xiii.

And Matthew Paris expresses himself very similarly when he calls Piero delle Vigne ipsum Fredericum familiarissimum consiliarium, et singularis amaris silius carum. 764.

¶ The best Edition of these Letters was published at Basle, in 1746, under the superintendence of M. Isel.

History.
From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.

he enjoyed. On one occasion only does he appear to have been wanting, and his motive is undiscovered. At the Council of Lyons, to which Frederic had deputed him, he maintained an unbroken and mysterious silence, and the defence of the Emperor was conducted solely by the exertions of a colleague. This breach of duty may have produced some estrangement on the part of his Sovereign; and Piero, mortified by the loss of favour, may have listened, in an evil hour, to the fatal suggestions of the Papal emissaries. But we are without details, and some obscurity attaches to the remainder of this sad story. The Emperor, on his return to Puglia, was attacked by severe illness, and Piero is said to have bribed the attendant Physician to mingle poison with the medicine which he administered, and to have stood together with him by the sick Prince's couch. Frederic, seasonably apprized of his danger, looked steadfastly at Piero as he received the cup, and observed, "I do not think you would give me poison!" He was answered with loud assurances of fidelity; but disregarding those protestations, the Emperor, before he tasted, commanded the Physician to drink half the potion. The traitor raised the chalice to his lips, and affecting to stumble at the same moment, spilled the greater part of its contents upon the ground. Enough, however, was remaining to allow proof of their deadly nature by experiment on some condemned malefactors. The Physician was immediately executed; and Piero, having been first deprived of sight, and exhibited as a spectacle of scorn to the chief towns of Italy, was delivered for capital punishment to his most grievous enemies the Pisans; a fate which he anticipated by dashing out his brains against a column to which he had been chained.*

His attempt to poison
the Emperor.

His punishment,

and suicide.

St. Louis intercedes with the Pope,

Once again was a most powerful solicitation, not less unavailing than all which had preceded it, to be addressed to the Holy See in behalf of the excommunicated Emperor. After the Winter which Louis IX. of France had passed in Cyprus on his route to Palestine, that Island, exhausted by the great influx of population brought by the Crusading armament, was exposed to the peril of famine. But the cause of St. Louis was the general cause of Christendom, and Frederic not only granted safe-conduct to the Venetians, with whom he was at war, to transport convoys to the famishing army, but himself also furnished considerable supplies. Louis was not likely to be deficient in gratitude; he wrote earnestly to Innocent, and he was seconded with no less ardour by his Queen-Mother Blanche, expressing his desire that a Prince who had saved the whole Christian army might no longer be excluded from the favour of the Church. "But our Lord the Pope," says Matthew Paris, never backward in stigmatising the pertinacity of hatred which Innocent manifested to the last, "spurned all these prayers, and every hour became more and more inveterate against the Emperor."† Death alone was to terminate the quarrel; and a dysentery removed Frederic from all further contests in his fifty-sixth year, after a few months spent in Puglia.‡ Perhaps the fairest estimate of his character may be drawn from the admissions of his opponents; many of whom, while denouncing him as an evil incarnation, on account of his schism with Rome, are nevertheless compelled to allow him more good and great qualities than form the ordinary portion of humanity. That he was occasionally cruel when roused to anger, and that he yielded with too great facility to the allurements of pleasure, are charges which, it is to be feared, may be fully substantiated; but we read at the same time of his rare talents, his general vigour of intellect, his love of letters, his cultivation of Science, his sagacity, his generosity, his courtesy, his prudence, and his valour. That Prince who can win testimonies such as these from the virulence of party animosity, (and that party a party of Religion,) needs little defence from his friends, and may be content to seek his epitaph from hostile pens.

Germany
and Italy.
From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
but in vain

Death of Frederic II.
Dec. 13.
A. D.
1290.
His character.

With the death of Frederic II. the History of ITALY ceases for a while to maintain the intimate connection which it has so long held with that of Germany; and we shall at present confine ourselves singly to the Annals of the former Country, as they treat the fortunes of the deceased Emperor's immediate posterity. Of the two sons of Frederic born in wedlock who survived him, Conrad IV., the elder, succeeded to the Crown of Germany. To the younger, Henry, his Father bequeathed the Kingdom of Sicily; and a far more stirring spirit than either was found in Manfred, Prince of Tarento, a bastard whom Frederic appears to have legitimized,‡

Distribution of Frederic's dominions.

* Matt. Paris, 764.

† The rumour that he was poisoned or suffocated with a pillow by his natural son Manfred is indignantly rejected by the Neapolitan Historian Pandolphus Colletanus. Minimè autem credibile est quod quidam scribunt, rumorem de Manfredi sparsum fuisse, ne si pulvino ari admoto obitum illi acceleráret; id enim nec verisimile est, neque ab eo fieri potuisset; et longè aliter scribere qui eo tempore vivebant Ecclesiastici auctores. Lib. iv. p. 181. op. Struvium, i. 475.

Struvius also mentions a romantic tradition long believed in Germany, that Frederic was not really dead, but that he slumbered in a cave in the mountains of Kyffhusen, and would awake and return to power in his own good time. To increase the marvel of this legend, which may be found at large in the Herzogia curiosa of Behrens, (esp. vi. p. 151.) it is by no means certain which of the three Frederics it is who does within the mountain. Not less than four impostors, each asserting himself to be the Emperor, appeared within forty years after his decease, and paid the forfeit of their lives on the scaffold for their ambitious daring. Even so late as the year 1546, another pretender arose, in the person of a mad cobbler, who succeeded in establishing his claim among a credulous rabble, and escaped with the milder punishment of exile from the scene of his folly.

‡ Frederic is believed to have married the Marchioness of Montferrat, (by whom he was Father of Manfred), overcome by her piteous solicitations on her death-bed. Matt. Paris, 930.

5 s

* Matthew Paris, 764. No reader of Dante can have forgotten the touching speech, in part already cited, in which Piero delle Vigne, when suffering like Polydorus in the Enéid, addresses the Poet who has plucked a branch from the Tree in which his Spirit is confined. He there pleads entire innocence, and attributes his fall to Envy, La Morteccia-delle Corti virio. The strong attestations which Dante puts into his mouth, sufficiently evince that he was convinced how unjust had been Piero's treatment.

*Fi giuro, che giammai non ruppi fede,
Al mio Signor, che fu d'onor sì degno;
E se di voi alcun nel mondo ride,
Conforti la memoria mia, che giace
Ancor del colpo ch'è invidia te diede.*

Inf. xiii.

It should be added, that the location of Piero in Hell does not in any degree arise from a suspicion entertained by the great Florentine that the common accusations against him are true. He is condemned solely on account of suicide, a crime which transferred him to the meata selva, in which the leaves of the tortured Plants furnish a Banquet for the Harpies.

Piero delle Vigne is little noticed by modern writers, with the exception of Tinocchini, who has given a very detailed account of him, vol. iv. lib. i. § 5. Ac. Ed. Modena, 1774, &c. He discredits the story of the attempt to poison Frederic; and also the imputation against Piero of having written the disputed Blasphemy, De tribus Impostoribus.

VOL. XL

History.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
Naples united to the Holy See.
A. D.
1251.

Recovered by Conrad.

Innocent offers the Sicilies to Richard, Earl of Cornwall.
A. D.
1253. who declines.

The invest-ture accepted for Edmund of England.

Death of Henry, King of Sicily;
A. D.
1254.

and to have equalized in rights to his half brothers in case of their death without issue. Although scarcely eighteen years of age, Manfred, as Regent, administered the Government of the two Sicilies with distinguished vigour; and before the arrival of Conrad in Italy he had suppressed a dangerous rebellion, and had reduced all the insurgent towns excepting Capua and Naples. The latter of those Cities had indeed been formally united to the Holy See by a decree of Innocent IV. at the moment of Frederic's decease; when, hastily quitting Lyon, he made a triumphal progress through Lombardy and fixed his Court for a while at Perugia, the factious state of Rome preventing his further advance. But it was not long before he discovered that the Church in herself was too weak to hope for the acquisition of the Sicilies; and when both Capua and Naples had yielded to the arms of Conrad, Innocent, still actuated by insatiate hostility to the House of Swabia, resolved, at any price, to remove so dangerous a neighbor from the vicinity of Rome. The Holy See might be unable to conquer Naples for itself, but it might assign that Kingdom as a Fief to some hand sufficiently powerful to win it; and the double object of overthrowing an enemy, and of introducing an obedient vassal, might be compassed by dexterous negotiation.

The first offer of the Crown, as if it had been vacant and his own to bestow, was made by Innocent to Richard, Earl of Cornwall, brother of Henry III. of England; a Prince distinguished by personal valour and by extraordinary wealth, upon which latter, it cannot be doubted, that Innocent chiefly relied for the success of his design. But Richard, upon whom Fortune had resolved in her sport to thrust more than one vision of a Crown, discreetly perceived in this instance that his resources were inadequate to the enterprise, and declined the glittering offer. When a like tender was made to Henry III. himself, for his second son Edmund, that weak King was flattered into acceptance; and during ten years of idle pursuit of an object which perpetually eluded his grasp, by permitting the Holy See to drain his coffers, he involved himself in inextricable bankruptcy and in continued disputes with his subjects. But these negotiations were interrupted for a while by the death of both the legitimate sons of Frederic. Henry, the younger, died first, and the Papal agents endeavoured to fix upon his brother a crime not less useless than odious, by imputing to him the administration of poison.* † He was followed to the grave in a few months afterwards by Conrad himself, whom the same busy malice pronounced, most probably with equal falsehood,* to have perished by similar treachery on the part of Manfred.

Overjoyed at this mortality amongst his enemies, Innocent appears to have renewed his hopes of obtaining the Sicilies for himself, and he accordingly suspended his recent Treaty with England. One son, Conrad, a child of three years old, was Conrad's sole issue; and the rightful claim of this unhappy infant appeared to have little chance of establishment, while his Crown was almost virtually possessed on the one hand by Manfred, on the other was coveted by the ambition of Innocent. Conrad remained in Germany under the tutelage of his mother, a Princess of Bavaria; and to the overtures of submission made in his name, Innocent returned an answer almost openly avowing his designs of usurpation. The Two Sicilies, he said, must in the first instance be ceded to him in full possession; and when the young Prince should arrive at man's estate, his claims might be examined, and it should be then seen what favour could be accorded him.†

Stimulated by the Papal emissaries, the native Sicilians, on the death of Conrad, broke into open revolt against the Germans and Saracens. In this emergency both parties had recourse to Manfred, and confirmed him in the full powers of Regent. His task was difficult; all Sicily was in arms against him; and the Pope, at the head of an army which he was incompetent to oppose, already approached the Neapolitan Provinces. Without hope from any immediate resistance, he determined to temporize, and accordingly took the bold resolution of at once treating with Innocent personally. With this object he advanced to meet him on the frontiers, bent on his knees in adoration;‡ held the bridle of his mule as he passed the boundary stream of Garigliano, and signified that, with a due reservation of his nephew's rights, he was most eager to testify his submission and reverence to the Holy See. How far this dissimulation might ultimately have effected its purpose it is not possible to determine. Innocent, it is said, treated him with consideration, and confirmed him in some portion of authority. But it was plain that nothing short of the annexation of Sicily to the Pontificate was contemplated by his ambition; and the Guelf Nobles who accompanied him, were little careful to 1197. to

Italy.
From
A. D.
A. D.
1298. and of Conrad IV.
May 12.
Innocent suspends his Treaty with England.
His answer to Conrad's offers of submission.

Revolt in Sicily.
Manfred, Regent.
Assembly with Innocent.

simam partem nostri pectoris perdidisse dolamus. In spite of the barbarous mediæval Latin in which Letter is couched, it is impossible to doubt that it was dictated by very poignant affliction. Fœdera, l. 302.

* There is not any satisfactory evidence for this most atrocious charge, which ought never to have been advanced unless it could be substantiated. But unconscious as is the fierce virulence of party spirit at all times, at no season has it been more so than in the Guelf and Ghibelin contest, during which accusations of the blackest nature were affirmed and retorted without a shadow of proof on either side. It surely cannot be deemed enough to say, that Henry being dead, the removal of Conrad and the feebleness of his infant son's minority, rendered usurpation easy to Manfred. That there is strong motive for a crime, of itself singly, is by no means sufficient testimony to establish its commission. On the usurpation itself we shall say more by and by.

† Nicolas de Jamsilla, Hist. de Robt Geis Fred. II. Imp. ap. Murat., viii. 507.

‡ Fido supponezione aderiva, Giannone, xviii. 2; a chapter in which he frequently expresses unbounded admiration of the ambasciatore, the ingegni, and the grandissimo talento of Manfred. Nicolas de Jamsilla (Murat, viii. 512.) does not say that Manfred did more than hold the Pope's bridle, acting as his equerry, (struttor.)

* Quod non est credibile, says Matthew Paris strongly, since the brothers loved each other with the sincerest mutual affection. Sed hæc fœdus Papa, ut dicitur, ut sic Regem Anglia contra ipsum Conradum exortaret provocatum, 889, 890. There is little doubt, however, that Henry was poisoned, although certainly not by Conrad. One of the most remarkable perversions which History affords has been made by Giannone, of some further words of Matthew Paris connected with this subject. After stating that Conrad Henricum offerens fratrem dilectissimæ, et, non arguente dilectionis fraternæ profunditatis; and that on his death he observed, quod in ipse dilectum sui corporis reputat amissum, possumus; Matthew Paris concludes by intimating the profound melancholy which the loss occasioned. Rex autem Conradus post mortem dilecti fratris sui nunquam ut antea cultum utendū arrexit. This passage has been covertly by the Neapolitan Historian to his own purpose by the following very twisting misrepresentation. Narrat Matteo Paris esse Conradum diu non legisset, suspectum d'esse regi, stato autore della morte di quell' innocente fanciullo, perchè da allora in poi non mostrò mai Conrad il suo volto così sereno e giocondo come prima. xviii. 2. One of Matthew Paris's expressions appears borrowed from Conrad's Letter announcing his Brother's death to Henry III., preio-

History. imitate his courtesy, or to abstain from tokens of open disrespect to Manfred. It would far exceed our limits if we were to detail the circumstances of a private feud, in which Borello d'Angione, an hereditary enemy of the House of Suabia, was killed by one of Manfred's retainers; and the romantic incidents of the flight to which the Prince was afterwards compelled in order to preserve his liberty, perhaps his life. In his passage from the neighbourhood of Capua, in which the fatal quarrel occurred, to Lucera, the strong-hold of the Saracens, where alone he could promise himself safety, a large tract of hostile country was to be traversed; and sometimes treading almost impassable by-paths amid the mountains, sometimes desperately braving the crowded streets of a town occupied by enemies, after countless perils and hair-breadth escapes, he at length descried the ramparts of his asylum. He was received with exultation by the Saracens; the German troops of the deceased Emperor flocked to his standard; stores and treasure were at his command in this city which had long been the chief military depot of the Imperialists in Italy; and he soon found himself at the head of a force with which he need not fear to encounter the Papal army.*

where he collects a powerful army.

Death of Innocent IV. Dec. 7.

Tyranny of Eccellino Romano.

Alexander V. proclaims a crusade against him. A. D. 1255.

No sooner was Manfred confident of his strength than he took the field, and repulsed a superior force which had been despatched against him. Meantime, death had terminated at Naples the ambitious schemes of Innocent; and Alexander IV., the successor whom the Conclave elected, inherited all his predecessor's lust for power, without either his energy or his ability. During two years, the War with Manfred lingered on in the Neapolitan Provinces, undistinguished by any event of interest, but invariably to the disadvantage of the Pope. But the troops of the Holy See were employed in a far more righteous cause, and happily with far greater success, in the plains of Lombardy; where the Ghibelin partisan Eccellino, converting the general turbulence in his own profit, had at length established himself in a dominion over which he exercised a tyranny unparalleled in the blackest pages of the History of Mankind. From the moment of the death of Frederic II. Eccellino had declared himself an independent Sovereign; and Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Feltre, and Belluno groaned under a despotism in which the sole tribunal was the scaffold, and the headman was the only lawyer. Red as are the Annals of Italy with blood, defaced as they are with crime, no portion is more deeply incarnadined, none more foully polluted, than that which records the four and twenty years during which Eccellino swayed the unhappy Country between the Trentine Alps and the Oglio, as Vicar of the Empire, or some of its districts as their peculiar Lord. Almost the first act of the Pontificate of Alexander IV. was the proclamation of a Crusade against this sanguinary monster; and the chief Powers of Northern Italy who enrolled themselves in the name of God against the enemy of man,† were the Signory of Venice, the Citizens of Mantua, and Azzo, Marquis d'Este, between whose House and that of Romano a deadly feud had existed during three generations. When the confederates stormed Padua, eight prisons of frightful construction were thrown open. Each of the two larger contained three hundred captives; and a huge multitude of miserable wretches issued from the remainder, among whom there was not one of either sex or of any age who did not exhibit some token of savage mutilation. The Tyrant, irritated by the loss of his chief City, which he ascribed partly to the disaffection of its inhabitants, mustered his whole army at Verona. One-third of it, eleven thousand men, consisted of Paduans; and all of these, excepting a small remnant, about two hundred in number, were gradually disarmed by stratagem, and perished under the axe, at the stake, or by slow and secret torture in the dungeon.*

Not to dwell upon this tale of horror, it may suffice to state that, after a contest of three years' duration, prolonged by want of military skill on the part of the allies, by consummate ability on that of Eccellino, he was abandoned by his chief supporters on the discovery of faithlessness even to them. In a final engagement at the bridge of Cassano, (a spot which, together with all others of similar termination, he had ever superstitiously avoided in obedience to the warning of his Astrologers,) he was defeated and taken prisoner. Racked by fury and despair, he tore the bandages from his wounds, and expired—almost as he has been represented by Dante still to exist in his place of retributive punishment—wallowing in blood. His brother Alberic continued in arms; and with his whole family, a wife, six sons, and two daughters, fortified himself in a strong tower among the Euganean hills. After three days total want of food, they surrendered and besought mercy. But the Crusaders had sworn that they would extinguish the very name of Romano; the prisoners were ruthlessly put to death; and every town which had suffered under the cruelty of this detested race possessed itself of some limb of one of the slaughtered corpses, as a monument of recovered freedom.

The fall of Eccellino restored Peace to Lombardy; and in the South also, the Papal Legates, after repeated overthrows, consented to treat with Manfred; but Alexander disavowed his officers; and provoking new hostilities, without power to withstand them, paid for his rashness by total expulsion from the Neapolitan Provinces. Those dominions were still administered in the name of Conradin, till a report of his demise, scattered abroad, as his enemies affirmed, by Manfred, induced that Prince to assume the Kingly title. Scarcely had his hasty Coronation been solemnized, when Envoys arrived from Bavaria contradicting the false rumour, and summoning Manfred to lay aside his unauthorized dignity. He received them with distinguished courtesy, and returned an answer which, even if it be considered as invented but to excuse his usurpation, must still be

Italy. From A. D. 1197. to A. D. 1298.

Cruelty of Eccellino to the Paduans. A. D. 1256.

His final defeat, Sept. 16. A. D. 1259. and death, Sept. 27.

Extinction of the family of Romano. A. D. 1260.

Further success of Manfred.

Rumour of Conradin's death. Manfred, King of the Sicilies. A. D. 1258.

* Rolandinus, de factis in Marchid Trevisana, lx. 7, 8.

† La riviera del sangue in la qual bolle Qual per violenza in altrui nocca.

*P' elli gente sotto infuso al ciglio
E l' gran Continoro disse, o non si muore,
Che dice nel sangue, e nell' over di piglio,
Quivi in p'non gli spiorati danno.*

E quella fronte ch' ha 'l pel così nero, E Avoloio.

Boj. xli.

* Manfred's escape to Lucera has furnished M. de Sismondi with a most brilliant and interesting episode, (Rep. Ital. iii. ch. xviii.) which it would be criminal to mutilate, and which is too long for entire translation into our pages.

† C'est une noble chose qu'une guerre prêchée au nom de Dieu contre l'ennemi des hommes. Sismondi, Rep. li. iii. 187.

History	admitted to be pregnant with Truth. The Kingdom, he said, as every one well knew, had been lost for Conradin, and recovered by his own sword, in spite of the utmost efforts of two successive Popes. The tender age of the young Prince, if he should resume the Crown, would again expose it to the grasp of the Papacy, and consequently would bring dishonour on the House of Subbia. He spoke also of the national antipathy of the Italians to a German Government, and of their being accustomed to his own rule. And, in conclusion, he entreated Conradin to believe that it was not from ambition that he coveted the sceptre, but rather for the benefit of his Family and his Country; that he would retain it for life, and bequeath it to him on his death-bed.*	Italy. From A. D. 1197. to A. D. 1298. Henry III. abandons the investiture of the Sicilies. A. D. 1263.
Great power of Manfred.	The dominion of Manfred was now confirmed.† The Tuscan Ghibelins sought his alliance; by his aid re-established themselves in Florence, long the Capital of their enemies; and appointed him Protector of the Government which they framed. In Lombardy, the overthrow of Eccellino had not been effected without the co-operation of the same party, which continued fully to balance the opposite interests of the Gueffs. Alexander IV., everywhere defeated, was unable to renew hostilities, and but for his death; the King of the Sicilies might perhaps have closed his days in peace. During three months, the choice of the Holy College remained undecided, and the Cardinals, reduced to the scanty number of eight, unable to satisfy themselves within their own Body, at length elected the Patriarch of Jerusalem, who happened at the moment to be engaged on a mission in Italy. Urban IV., as he styled himself, was a Frenchman, earnestly devoted to the interests of his Country, ardent in temperament, and cherishing a most lofty estimate of Ecclesiastical authority. Against Manfred, accordingly, he inherited more than the virulent hatred of his predecessors; and its activity was manifested immediately after his accession. An outrage committed upon the Papal territories, by the Saracens, during the late interregnum, was made a plea for the denouncement of a Crusade against their offending master; and great but ineffectual pains were taken to break a Treaty of Marriage which James of Aragon was negotiating for his son with Constanza, the daughter of Manfred. The King of Aragon, however, was little deterred from the completion of an advantageous compact by learning that his proposed ally was excommunicated as a Tyrant, a Heretic, and an enemy of the Church; and the nuptials were solemnized which trans-
Death of Alexander IV. May 25. A. D. 1261.		It is offered to Charles of Anjou.
Urban IV.
preaches a Crusade against Manfred.		and ac- cepted.
who negoti- ates an in- termarriage with Ara- gon. A. D. 1262.
	* The Ambassadors were not dismissed empty-handed; but Conradin could scarcely estimate the toys with which they were laden as equivalent to the Crown which they were denied. There is much naïveté in Giovanni's account. Gli Ambasciatori ricevettero tal risposta, ch'era teneva a partito ricomente presentati; e mandati al Duca di Baviera dieci cartieri bellissimi, ed al piccolo Conradino molte gioie. xix. iust.
	† It is to this zenith of the prosperity of Manfred that the City Manfredonia, which he founded, owes its birth. It still retains its name, notwithstanding the efforts of Charles of Anjou and his faction to call it, from the ancient town near which it is built, Nuovo Siponto. Id. ibid.
	‡ Manfred, according to Giovanni, was a professed Pope-killer. He broke the hearts both of Innocent IV. and of his successor. The former avendo intesa la novella della vittoria ottenuta da Manfredi se ne morisse di cordoglio, xviii. l. and Alexander also, non potendo soffrire di vantaggio i continui dispiaceri che per le prosperità di Manfredi e de' Ghibellini riceveva nell'animo, vinse finalmente da grave cordoglio, gravemente infermarsi, ed indi a poco uscì di vita. xix. iust.
		Death of Urban IV. A. D. 1265. Clement IV. March of the French army. Charles is crowned at Rome.
	It was to his own native Country that Urban naturally turned for a Prince who might dispossess Manfred, and indeed the state of Europe forbade him from looking elsewhere. England, as we have seen, was impotent; Germany was torn asunder by faction and involved in Civil War, the result of a double election to her Crown; and in Spain, some of her Princes were friendly to the present dynasty of Sicily, some were too weak, some too remote for exertion. For himself and for his son, Louis IX. of France declined the proffered Crown, no doubt in part from conscientious scruples; but he forbore from interposing any objection when the like honour was tendered to his brother, Charles of Anjou. Rich, brave, and enterprising; possessed of just so much power as to make him covetous of more; undeterred by that nice sensitiveness of right and wrong which has rendered his sainted brother proverbial in History; and stimulated by the ambition of his wife, who panted for a Crown which might raise her to an equality with her three sisters, Charles was in all respects well adapted to Urban's purpose; and so fully did he know his own importance, that he rejected the first extravagant overtures made by the Pope, who demanded for himself the richest portion of the territories which he affected to grant. In the end, the Count of Anjou received plenary investiture of the Two Sicilies, as they had been held by the Norman and Swabian Princes, at the price of the single town of Benevento and its dependencies, and an annual tribute of ten thousand ounces of gold.
	The death of Urban IV. interrupted the preparations of Charles, almost at the moment at which he was about to enter Italy; and Manfred sanguinely hoped that the dissensions usually consequent upon a new election, perhaps the choice of an Italian instead of an ultramontane Pope, might free him from the great peril with which he had been menaced. But another Frenchman, at that time Legate in his own Country, and a Vassal of the Count of Anjou, was called to the tiara; and Clement IV. not only renewed the Treaty of his predecessor, but yet more, IV. commuted with all those who chose to accept the agreeable exchange, any vow which had been pledged of service in Palestine, for a much lighter engagement in the Crusade for the conquest of Sicily. The invading army, headed by the Countess Beatrice and her son-in-law Robert de Bethune, son of the Count of Flanders, traversed the Alps; and Charles himself, impatient of the slow progress by land, embarked at Marseilles for Rome. After escaping the dangers of a furious tempest and of interception by Manfred's greatly superior fleet, the Count triumphantly entered the Eternal City; and received, almost at the same moment, the dignity of perpetual Senator from the Gueffs among the popular party.* the
	* The one Senator into whose person the Romans condemned the History. Crown of the Two Sicilies and the Gonsalon of the Church from the hands of a deputation appointed by the Pontiff; * little regarding the incompatibility of the two offices, and the directly opposite duties which each of them demanded.

No precaution which sagacity or military experience could prompt had been neglected by Manfred to raise obstacles against the advance of his enemy; but the fickleness and the cowardice of his Neapolitan subjects (two evil qualities which stain every page of their History down even to our own days) frustrated all the arrangements of his skill and foresight. The French had passed through Lombardy with slight and only occasional opposition; and although it was mid-winter before they arrived at Rome, Charles too well knew the advantage which he must derive from the disaffection then existing in his adversary's dominions to hesitate on an immediate invasion. Treachery opened to him the first passes in which he might have been resisted; and his fixed resolve not to rest satisfied without entire conquest, was evinced by the reply made to some Envoys who attempted negotiation. "Go and tell the Sultan of Lucera," as he contemptuously denominated Manfred, "that either I will presently send him to Hell or he shall send me to Paradise!"† A single battle, fought in the plain of Grandella near Benevento, decided the fortune of the competitors. After some appearance of success in the outset, Manfred at a critical moment was deserted by his faithless Puglians; and resolved not to survive defeat, he headed a few brave comrades still attached to his person and spurred into the mêlée. As he adjusted his helmet before the final charge, its crest, a silver eagle, fell on the pommel of his saddle. "This is a token from God," he exclaimed; "I fastened it with my own hands, so that it ought not to have been loosened."‡ He was slain by two mortal wounds§ given by a French soldier ignorant of his person, and it was not till the third day after the battle that his fate was known. A corpse to which suspicion attached|| was then found among the dead and conveyed to Charles, who exhibited it to his chief prisoners; by one of whom, the Count Giordano Lancina, it was recognised with passionate exclamations of grief and of affection, which extorted admiration even from the French Captains.* Touched with compassion for their fallen enemy, they earnestly solicited that he might be allowed the rites of Christian sepulture. But the temper to which their petition was addressed shared little in those generous emotions by which it had been prompted; and both the Legate and the Count of Anjou replied, that such an indulgence could not be extended to one who had died under sentence of Excommunication. The body, therefore, was deposited without any funeral solemnity near the Bridge of Benevento, where each soldier dropping a stone above the grave contributed to erect a rude monument. Even this slight honour was envied by the posthumous malice of his unrelenting foes; and the Archbishop of Cosenza remarked, that although the carcass of the dead dog had been excluded from consecrated ground, it nevertheless reposed in soil which was the property of the Church; whereas it ought to have been carried without the Kingdom, and scattered to the winds. Clement approved this uncharitable suggestion; and the remains of Manfred, disinterred by torchlight, were transported to the banks of the river Verde, the present Marino, and there ignominiously exposed, till the Sun and the rains completed the hideous work of decomposition.†

The Neapolitans were soon taught to lament the change of masters which their own want of courage and of fidelity had tended to produce. During eight days in which Benevento was abandoned to pillage, it underwent every calamity which invaders flushed with triumph can inflict; yet ferocity and thirst for blood appeared to predominate over all other unlicensed passions of the soldiery. When these first horrors had passed away, the suffering population groaned under oppression sanctioned by a show of law; and a multi-

Italy.
From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1299.
Ignominious treatment of his remains.

Battle of Grandella.
Feb. 26.
A. D.
1266.

Defeat

and death of Manfred.

Pillage of Benevento.

authority of the whole Assembly not long after its revival, about the middle of the XIIIth Century, was at the head of the municipal Government of the City, almost always opposed to the Pope, and as factious as the Tribunes of the Ancient Republic. At first he was some private citizen, afterwards an independent foreign Prince from whom more certain protection could be derived. Thus when the Guelphs named Charles of Anjou, the Ghibellines at the same time called Manfred to the Senatorial dignity, greatly to the violation of its boasted unity. Among the instructions which the Archbishop of Cosenza received for his negotiation with Charles when he first offered him the investiture of Sicily, was one to press strongly on that Prince's conscience that he could not possibly retain his Senatorship without hazard of eternal damnation; a hazard concerning which Charles does not appear to have entertained any very great apprehension. Velly, iii. 159. There are Medals still existing which bear the legend, Carolus Rex, Senator Urbis.

Before Clement bestowed the investiture of the Sicilies, he manifested his pique at the acceptance of the democratical office, by discharging Charles from the Vatican in which he had taken up his residence. "Our Palaces," remarked the Pope, "shall never be lodgings for the Senator! however exalted may be his rank." Raynaldus, ad ann. 1265, § 12.

• Clement refused to quit Viterbo for Rome.
† Alles ist mir als Sultan de Nocer hoggi meterei lui con Enferm d'el merà un con Paradis. G. Villani, vii. 3.
‡ Dissi contra i Baroni che hanno dal lato in Latino. "Hoc est signum Dei, per quod que cito cadere appicari con le mie mani per modo che non dover potere cadere." G. Villani, vii. 9.
§ Pancia ch' è rbbi rotta la persona
|| Da due punte moridi; i mi rendei
Piangendo a uci, che volentier perirono.

Dante, Purg. iii.
Manfred had a scar on his face by which he might easily be recognised.

*Biondo era, e bello, e di gentile aspetto,
Ma l'un d'è c'igi un colpo era' d'arco.*

Id. ibid.

G. Villani states that the corpse was discovered on the field by a Ribaldo of Manfred's own army, who threw it, like that of the Prince of Condé after the Battle of Jarnac, across an ass which he drove into the French camp, calling out, "Chi cercate Manfredi!" for which brutal levity he was most deservedly well beaten, allora uno Barone del Re lo batte forte d'un bastone.
* The words cited by Giannone from some Annals of Palermo are most uncharitably inflated. "Oimè, Signor mio, ch'è quel ch'è veggio! Signor buono, Signor saggio, chi ti hà così crudelmente tolto di vita! Fatto di Filocofia, ornamento della Mhizia, gloria de' Regi, perchè mi è negato un calicello, ch'io mi potessi accendere per accompagnarti alla morte, come ti fosse nella miserie!" xii. 3. G. Villani's report is far more touching; Ma quando venne il Conte Giordano a dir delle mani nel volto piangendo e gridando, "Omè, omè, Signor mio che è questo?"

† Dante, in continuation of some lines which we have already cited, represents the Spirit of Manfred as expiating its sins in Purgatory, and finally compares the inexhaustible treasures of divine mercy with the pettiness of human revenge.

*Se 'l Pastor di Cosenza, ch' alla caccia Di me fu meno per Clemente allora,
Avesse un Dio ben tetta questa focaccia;
L'anima del corpo mio servire! ancora
In co del Ponte presso a Benevento Sotto la guardia de la grave mora;
Or te lagna la pioggia, e move 'l vento
Di fur del Negro, quan lungo il Verde;
Dove te trasmutò a lume opento.*

Purg. iii.

History.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.

Tyranny of the French.

Conradin, invited by the Ghibel-lins, enters Italy.

A. D.
1267.

Battle of Tagliacozzo.

A. D.
Aug. 23.
1268.

tude of Civil offices, all occupied by the French, were instituted to regulate extortion. This tyranny gradually extended itself into the adjoining districts, and Florence once again submitted to the Ghibels. But from many of the Lombard Cities, and from Pisa, Charles encountered a resistance which exposed his newly won Crown to hazard. The young Conradin had been carefully educated by his able and high-minded mother, and already in his sixteenth year, he exhibited more than the seeds of those distinguished qualities which had rendered his ancestors illustrious. To him, the rightful heir of the Sicilian Crown, the suffering Ghibelins appealed for protection; and ambassadors from Pisa, and afterwards from the chief Lombard States, from Sicily, and from the Moslems of Nocera, laid before him their own wrongs, together with those of his Father and his Uncle; and proffered support which gave ample promise of revenge. When Conradin lent an eager ear to this invitation, and signified his resolution to undertake the enterprise, many of the leading Nobles of Germany voluntarily joined his armament. Among them was a youthful Prince whose fortunes in more than one point resembled his own; Frederic, Duke of Austria, who had been chased from his hereditary dominions by Ottocar II. of Bohemia. The force with which Conradin traversed Lombardy scarcely amounted to four thousand men, but it increased largely as he advanced; and in spite of three separate admonitions from the Pope, followed at last by a Bull of Excommunication which deprived him of his sole remaining title as King of Jerusalem, he continued his march till his banners were displayed under the walls of Viterbo, in which City the Pontiff held his Court. Viterbo was strongly fortified and garrisoned, and more important ulterior objects forbade Conradin from halting for its siege; but it is said that as his army deployed in military pomp beneath its ramparts, Clement, regarding the two commanders who were proudly marshalling their Knights, exclaimed in words which the event rendered almost prophetic, "Behold the victims who are permitting themselves to be led to sacrifice."^{*}

Conradin pressed his march to Rome, where Henry of Castille (an adventurer of Royal blood who had been introduced to the Citizens by his kinsman Charles of Anjou, and who had afterwards supplanted his patron in the rabble-honour of Senator) received him with distinction, and placed a considerable force at his disposal. Hitherto, his advance had been unopposed: and even when Charles, hastening from the siege of Lucera, confronted him on the plain of Tagliacozzo in the Abruzzi, so great was the disaffection of the subjects of the King of Sicily that he could array no more than three thousand men at arms against the five thousand led by Conradin. A cruel, treacherous, and selfish stratagem gave him more than equality. At the suggestion of a veteran officer, he arrayed Henry di Cosenza, who resembled him in person, in his own armour; and placing two-thirds of his whole army under his command, marshalled them in order of battle on the plain; the remainder, the flower of his troops, being reserved with himself in ambuscade. The first charge of the Germans put the devoted band opposed to them wholly to the route; and when, after a miserable slaughter of his followers, Henry di Cosenza himself fell pierced with a thousand wounds, and the Royal armour was recognised on his corpse, a shout of exultation proclaimed the imagined death of Charles; and the conquerors, secure of victory, dispersed themselves in pillage and pursuit. At that moment, the reserve of French galloped from their ambush; and the compact body of fresh horsemen, however inferior in general number, easily overthrew the scattered and fatigued enemy thus taken by surprise. Conradin and his chief followers escaped from the field of battle, but not many days elapsed before they were taken prisoners. All those qualities in the captured Prince which appeared to give him claims upon the generosity of his successful enemy, tended but to strengthen resentment. The youth of Conradin, the indisputable legitimacy of his title, the popularity which he had acquired by his dignified yet gentle bearing, every gift of mind or body which endeared him to others, rendered him doubly hateful to Charles. To the honour of the Tribunal which the Tyrant convened for the institution of a mock legal process against the chief prisoners, one Judge alone was found base enough to pronounce capital sentence; but satisfied with that authority the King proceeded in his bloody design. A scaffold was erected in the Mercato di Naples, and Charles and his Court assembled to witness the execution. Robert di Bari, the Prothonotary of Naples, whose single voice had pronounced for death, stepped forward and read the accusation, which involved charges of rebellion against a lawful King, and of plundering and burning some Monastery.* When he had finished, and had added the penalty adjudged by Law, the generous spirit of Robert of Flanders, Charles's son-in-law, revolted against the crying enormity of the proceeding. "Wretch," he exclaimed to Di Bari, "it is not for you to condemn to death a Prince so noble and so high-born!" As he spoke he struck the unrighteous Judge to the heart with his poniard, and sheathed it again without molestation.

The Duke of Austria was the first who submitted to the executioner;† and Conradin, raising his bloody head as it fell, passionately bedewed it with tears, and blamed himself as the cause of his friend's untimely murder. Then, as he collected himself for his own sad part, one tender thought wrung him to the heart for a moment. "Oh, my mother," were his words, "what will be your grief when intelligence of this day shall reach you!" With a firm hand he unfastened his cloak,

* Sive humanæ prudentiæ juvenum temeritatem et Caroli militarem scientiam artesque perpendere, nec id e celo præcisiæset. Raynaldus, ad ann. 1268, § 20.

† Henry was brother of Alfonso of Castile, and maternal cousin of Charles of Anjou. Banished from Spain on account of rebellion, he took refuge with the King of Tunis, in whose service he was many years engaged. The conquest of Naples by Charles of Anjou tempted him into Italy, where he secured the favour of his Cousin by a considerable loan, the produce of his gains among the Infidels. Charles, jealous of the ascendancy which he had obtained at Rome, hesitated in repayment, and Henry in consequence became his avowed enemy.

* Charles pressed for a capital sentence, quod contra cum justum Regem arma moverent, et quod Monasterium prædonalet et quoddam succederent. Ricobaldus Ferraronius, Hist. Imperatorum, ap. Muratori, ix. 137. There is not any foundation, therefore, for the anecdote of Voltaire, la sentence portait qu'ils méritaient la mort pour avoir pris les armes contre l'Église. Sur les Mœurs, ch. lii.

† Pandolphus Colestinus, ix. p. 218, and Gerhard a Roa, l. p. 181, both cited by Struvius, l. 492. But Ricobaldus of Ferrara, who states that he received the particulars of his narrative from a Judge who was present, positively affirms that Conradin was beheaded first; and adds, Dux Austria cum vidit Conradi propinqui cervice ferri, quantū potuit indignantis animæ voce rugienti cūst, et doloris desperatione, nec erga Deum culpam voluit profiteri. 138.

July.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.

Captain of Conradin.

He took trial.

Execution of the Duke of Austria.

and of Conradin.
Oct. 28.

History.
From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
Extinction
of the House of Sualbia.

Cruelties of Charles of Anjou.

The King of Tunis becomes his tributary.
A. D.
1270.

Brilliant Pontificate of Gregory X.
A. D.
1272

and casting one glance on the weeping multitude which surrounded the scaffold, he plucked his glove from his hand, and threw it among them, as a last token of defiance to his oppressors. The sacred pledge was conveyed to the King of Aragon, who accepted it as an investiture of the Sicilies in right of his wife, the daughter of Manfred. A single blow severed the head of Conradin, and extinguished the line of Sualbia; a line descended on both sides from the stocks of Clovis and of Charlemagne, and which had counted amongst its members none Crows and Principalities than any other in Europe.

Henry of Castile, the least worthy, perhaps, of Conradin's supporters, was the only one who obtained mercy; and the scaffold and the gibbet daily received a numerous tale of victims. Never did the cowardice of suspicion and ferocity exact severer punishment. In many instances, death was preceded by mutilation; and when it was feared that the loss of sight or of limbs might excite pity for the sufferers, we read with horror of their being shut up in wooden inclosures, and consumed to ashes.* When the town of Augusta in Sicily, between Catania and Syracuse, after a resolute defence, was occupied by treachery, every living soul within its walls was delivered to the executioner; and perished either singly beneath the axe, or, when that was blunted, by a shorter process of noyade in a scuttled galley.† In a few weeks, not one inhabited spot in the two Sicilies offered resistance to the French, nor was there one in which blood poured out like water did not cry aloud for vengeance.

The power of Charles gained material increase by a long interregnum in the administration of the Holy See, which continued during the unprecedented period of three and thirty months after the death of Clement IV. The influence of the King of Sicily was all powerful in the Ecclesiastical States while thus deprived of their supreme head; and in the Northern districts, opposition to him was wholly extinct. For a while he was called away by the necessity of attending his brother of France in his last Crusade; but even that expedition, so fatal to others, was profitable to Charles; and he returned to Naples enriched by the tribute of the King of Tunis. There can be little doubt that his ambition, which we shall by and by perceive grasping at the Eastern Empire, cherished a design of uniting the whole of Italy into a single Kingdom; and he might have been successful in this project; but in the first instance, for the foresight of the Pontiff whom the Conclave at length elected to the firm, and in the second, for the bloody resistance produced by his own insufferable tyranny. Gregory X., whose fondest wish was to deliver the Holy Land, in which many years of his former life had been employed, was more willing to reconcile the Gueft and Ghibelin factions, in order that they might contribute to his great purpose with united force, than on its own account to give predominance to either. His Pontificate, little exceeding three years in duration, bears a distinguished place among the few periods of Glory which belong to the History of modern Rome. By his moderation, the Civil Wars which had so long ravaged Italy were hushed; the anarchy of Germany terminated in the foundation of one of the most powerful and enduring dynasties in Europe; the great schism which had rent the Eastern from the Western Church was healed for a season; and from one of the most numerous Councils which Christendom ever witnessed, issued a Code of Ecclesiastical Constitutions, alike honourable to the Assembly and salutary to the Church.* Too soon for the welfare of Europe was the brilliant reign of Gregory brought to an end. Ceaseless in his efforts to promote a new Crusade, he died at the moment in which he had almost attained his object; and while the Emperor, the Kings of France, of England, of Aragon, and of Sicily, were preparing to accompany him to Palestine.

The three short Pontificates of Innocent V., of Adrian V., and of John XXI. were included in the narrow limit of twelve months. From the last-named of those Popes Charles received investiture of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, the title to which he had purchased from Mary of Antioch.† But in his successor, Nicholas III., the ambition of the King of Sicily found a vigilant and active opponent, whose care to prevent encroachments upon the power of the Holy See was increased by causes of personal offence. A near connection of the new Pope had been beheaded for adherence to Conradin; and a proposal for alliance between his family and that of Charles had been rejected by the latter with disdain. No purer blood than that of the Orsini, the House to which Nicholas belonged, flowed in any Roman veins; yet when he sought to enite one of his nephews with a granddaughter of the King of Sicily, he was rudely answered, that in spite of his red shoes he was not quite fitted for connection with the Royal Family of France.‡ The sarcasm was never forgotten; and almost immediately after his accession, Nicholas prevailed upon the Emperor Rodolph, now confirmed in his throne, to demand from Charles the surrender of two offices which were deemed incompatible with the paramount Imperial claims on Italy—those of Vicar of the Empire, and of Senator of Rome. It was not the interest of Charles to provoke a quarrel with so powerful a Monarch as Rodolph, and he obeyed promptly and with a well-affected semblance of cheerfulness. The Pope was deeply versed in human nature; and when he heard of the courteous reception which Charles had offered to the Legate who conveyed these offensive demands, he observed that there was little chance of surmounting him; that he might have inherited his good fortune from France, and his refined policy from Spain; but that nothing except close intercourse with the Court of Rome could have taught him the master-secret of self-control §

During the reign of Nicholas III. Charles found himself gradually reduced from the high station of arbiter of Italy to the comparative insignificance of Sovereign

* Siamondi, Rep. Ital. iii. 422. At the Council of Lyon, assembled in 1274, were present five hundred Bishops, seventy mixed Abbots, and more than one thousand other Divines. Velly, iii. 363. has given a clear abstract of its proceedings.

† We have already traced the descent of this title to the Emperor Frederic II, by his alliance with Isolina, granddaughter of Amaury, King of Jerusalem. On the extinction of the House of Sualbia, the claim was contested between the descendants of the two younger daughters of Amaury. Hugh II, King of Cyprus, was grandson of the elder, Mary of Antioch was daughter of the younger; and from her, as one step nearer Amaury in consanguinity, Charles purchased the faneul right for a pension of four thousand livres.

‡ Ferant enim clauco Carolum Pontificis genus ob rubra calceos gubius sanguinibatur, dignum non videri ut cum Regio genere mueretur. Raynaldus, ad ann. 1278, § 67.

§ Raynaldus, ad ann. 1278, § 69. Blanche, the Mother of Charles, was a Spanish Princess.

Baly.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
His death.
A. D.
1276.

Nicholas
III.
A. D.
1277.

Causes of his opposition to Charles.

* Sabas Malepisc, Rever. Siculorum Hist. iv. 13. ap. Muratori, viii. 849.

† Id. 855.

History.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
Martin IV.
A. D.
1281.

Views of Charles upon the Greek Empire.

Giovanni of Procida.

Kind protection from Pedro of Aragon.

of his own Kingdoms. But on the next election in which the Conclave was engaged, he fixed its choice, partly by intrigue, partly by violence, on a Cardinal servilely devoted to his own interests.* No sooner had Martin IV. received consecration than he stripped the Ghibellins throughout the Ecclesiastical States of their offices, and conferred them on creatures of the King of Sicily. Then, condescending to solicit the votes of his own Citizens, and having obtained from them the dignity of Senator, he transferred its real authority to Charles by nominating him his Deputy. The ultimate object of Charles's ambition was to place his daughter's husband Philip on the throne of Constantinople, to which, as son of the Latin Emperor Baldwin, he had some just pretence. Venice promised to assist him with forty galleys, and his own force amounted to ten thousand men at arms, a numerous body of infantry, and more than three hundred ships and transports.† It might have been difficult for the reigning Greek to oppose this formidable armament with success; but the sagacity of Michael Palæologus had foreseen the approaching invasion, and he had employed surer weapons than the sword to avert his peril.

Among the few eminent partisans of the House of Suabia who had escaped the fury of its destroyer, was a Noble of Salerno, Giovanni Lord of Procida. A love of knowledge had induced him in early life to study Medicine in the celebrated School of his birth-place; and his talents may be fairly estimated from the high reputation which he enjoyed for attainments in a Science to which he must have been led in the first instance chiefly as an amusement.‡ Giovanni had enjoyed the confidential friendship of the Emperor Frederic II. and of his son Manfred; he had appeared in arms for Conradin; and after the success of Charles he had paid for his fidelity to the Suabian cause, by the confiscation of all his Fiefs. In poverty and exile, he had found the refuge which his loyalty deserved in the Court of Pedro of Aragon; to whom he is said to have been the bearer of the glove which Conradin threw from the scaffold, as a token of the investiture of the Queen Constanza with the rights of her Father Manfred.§ The liberality of Pedro bestowed upon this faithful adherent competence and honour; but the temper of Procida was not one likely to remain inactive, while a hope existed of revenging the wrongs of the Princes to whom he had been attached, and of liberating his Country from her present oppression. In the King of Aragon and his Consort, he excited an ardent desire to establish their claim upon Sicily, checked only by a consciousness of want of power; and in order to procure them the necessary support, and to cement alliances in their favour, he undertook a difficult and most perilous series of negotiations. In Puglia, which he first visited, he discovered little hope of assistance; for the whole Country had changed its ancient possessors, and a powerful colony of French Barons swayed the domain once occupied by friends of the House of Suabia. Continuing his disguise, and crossing to Sicily, his prospects became far brighter; disaffection was there general, and the French were by no means firmly established: the chief difficulty indeed which he encountered was to restrain the spirit almost kindled to premature explosion, and to induce the suffering natives to delay their insurrection, till he had consolidated a League which should insure its success. His next visit was to Constantinople, where having alarmed Palæologus by a display of the vast preparations of Charles, and having recounted also the spirit by which the King of Aragon and the Sicilies were animated, he obtained from him a first subsidy, and a promise of yet further aid, provided the approbation of the Holy See, (whose recently obtained friendship the Greek Emperor would on no account sacrifice,) could previously be obtained. Nicholas III. unhesitatingly granted his consent that Constanza should attempt to establish her rights; and fortified by a written document to that effect which fully satisfied the scruples of Michael, Procida, after a most successful mission, again betook himself to Spain.

The death of Nicholas severely affected the prospects of the confederates, and the part which Martin IV. adopted in behalf of Charles deprived them of all hope of support from the Holy See. Suspicion, indeed, had been already excited by the great preparations which the King of Aragon had long been making, and which it was not possible that he should conceal. To a question put by Philippe le Bel as to their object, he replied, that they were to be directed against the Infidels, and that he hoped for the cooperation of his Brother of France. To the Pope he was far less communicative; and the only answer delivered to a similar inquiry made by the Legate was, that if his right hand knew the secret of his left, he would cut it off and cast it from him.* Procida meantime was actively employed in organizing the proposed insurrection in Sicily: where so consummate was his own dexterity, so loyal the fidelity of his partisans, that his plans, which had been ripening for more than two years, were still wrapped in impenetrable secrecy from the eyes of those against whom they were directed.

Accident, however, forestalled his designs and involved the French in a hideous calamity, unprepared even by the hands engaged in its infliction. On the Monday in Easter week, the 30th of March, 1282, the inhabitants of Palermo were accustomed to attend Vesper service in the Church of Monte Reale about three miles distant from their City; and a festal throng of both sexes crowded the intermediate fields. The French Governor had forbidden the Sicilians from carrying arms even on holidays; and a licentious ruffian named Drouet, asserting that this ordinance had been violated†

* Nicholas III. died of apoplexy Aug. 19, 1280. The wise Constitution by which Gregory X. secluded the Cardinals while in Conclave from all external communication, had been suspended by John XXI.; and Charles, having acquainted himself with the state of parties in the Sacred College, contrived that three of the Italian Cardinals most hostile to his views should be carried off; and after six months' discussion, he succeeded in persuading the remainder to agree to the choice which had been made by the French faction. Raynaldus, ad ann. 1281, § 1, 2. Giovanni Villani, vii. 57. where he describes Martin as free from the besetting sin of nepotism, as di vile nazione, ma molto magnanimo e di grande cuore ne fatti delle Chiese, and as molto amico di Re Carlo.

† Gibbon, xi. 341. Du Cange gives the Treaty with Venice among the documents at the end of his Hist. Byzant.

‡ Giannone, xx. c. 5, in which he gives a detailed account of Giovanni di Procida, refers to Tutini, degl' Annunziati, 66. for an application made by Guaspari Carraciolo to Charles II., for permission to visit Sicily in order that he might consult Giovanni di Procida, at that time an old man, per farli curre d'una infermità. § Id. ibid. Gibbon, xi. 342. mistakenly calls Constanza of Aragon sister of Manfred. It is true that the Emperor Frederic II. had a daughter named Constanza, but she was married to the Landgrave of Hesse. Struvius, i. 478.

• Se l'una delle sue mani li manifestasse a l'altre la morderebbe. G. Villani, vii. 59.

† The extent of Drouet's outrage was probably overrated by Italy.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1298.
His return to Puglia, Sicily.

Constantinople.

and Rome.

Preparations of the King of Aragon.

Procida's gracious resurrection in Sicily.

The Sicilian Vespers.
March 30.
A. D.
1282.

History. by a native girl of great personal beauty, offered her a brutal insult under pretext of searching for a concealed weapon. A youth betrothed to her, who was present, struck Drouet to the heart with his own sword, and at the sight of this first blood, the fury of the Sicilians burst all bounds, and on every side fierce shouts reechoed of "Death to the French!" Not one, indeed, of that nation who was assisting in the procession escaped, and while the Bells of Monte Reale were chiming to Vespers, two hundred victims fell in its immediate precinct. Hurrying back to Palermo, the Citizens commenced an indiscriminate massacre of their oppressors, and during that single night four thousand French were slain. The example of carnage was followed but partially in the remainder of the Island; but every town and village throughout its circuit enrolled itself in a common League, which renounced allegiance to Charles, expelled such of his garrisons as it spared from the sword, and invited Pedro of Aragon to assume the government, and to undertake the protection of his willing subjects.

The Sicilians invite Pedro of Aragon.

Attempt to conciliate the Pope.

One attempt was made by the Ecclesiastics of Palermo to obtain grace with the Pope after this massacre; and their Deputies knelt at his footstool repeating that solemn apostrophe from the Litany, "O Lamb of God that takest away the sins of the World, have mercy upon us!" The sole reply of the indignant Pontiff was couched in Scriptural language expressing a stern belief in their insincerity. "They began to salute him, 'Hail King of the Jews!' and they smote him on the head with a reed." Thus deprived of all hope of mediation, the Sicilians resolutely prepared to defend themselves against the vengeance of Charles; whose armament, equipped for Greece, received a destination nearer home. It is needless to follow the details of the ensuing War, which indeed are by no means distinctly preserved to us. It appears that Charles crossed into the Island and laid siege to Messina, but that after no more than three days' investment he made a precipitate retreat on the approach of the Aragonese fleet, commanded by Roger di Loria, a Calabrian by birth, and the most distinguished Admiral of his day. The land-forces retired in safety, but Di Loria captured or destroyed the greater part of the French fleet; and so deeply was Charles irritated by this early want of success, that he offered a chivalrous proposal, which in after-times has more than once been imitated by other Crowned heads, of referring the decision of the quarrel to the issue of a personal contest. Bourdeaux was named as the scene of battle, under the guarantee of the King of England, to whom it at that time belonged. Each Prince was to be accompanied to the field by one hundred Knights; the 1st of June† in the ensuing year was chosen as the day of combat; and if either party failed to appear he was not only to lose the prize of Sicily, but to be stripped of his hereditary Roger di Loria destroys the French fleet.

Challenge given by Charles to Pedro.

dominions also, to be stigmatized as a recreant and a traitor, and to be deprived of all his Knightly honours.

The Pope could not be blind to the gross impolicy of this engagement on the part of Charles, who, rashly abandoning his superiority of resources, placed himself at once on a level with a much weaker enemy. Martin IV., therefore, refused his sanction to the proposed combat, on a plea that it was contrary to the spirit of Religion. A more important party was equally hostile, and Edward I. declined to afford his guarantee not only for Bourdeaux, but for every other place in his dominions; and declared that his consent should not be purchased, if even the Kingdoms of Aragon and Sicily were offered as its price.* Charles, nevertheless, on the appointed day, having entered the lists with his hundred Knights, remained in them till sunset; and the French Historians loudly denounce the cowardice of his antagonist, who failed to confront him. But they forget to add that Pedro was well aware that the King of France, with three thousand men at arms, prepared to support his Uncle's cause, was stationed within a day's march of Bourdeaux. Pedro, indeed, showed that he was far from deficient in courage. In spite of his great peril from the neighbourhood of this overwhelming force, he remained during the day at Bourdeaux, in disguise; and after Charles had withdrawn, he presented himself before the Seneschal of England, and left with him his armour, in token that he had been at hand to fulfil his engagement, if he could have done so without hazard of treachery. Then clapping spurs to his horse, he never drew bit till, by galloping all night, he had ridden ninety miles, and had extricated himself from the snares with which he was environed.†

Notwithstanding Martin IV. had refused to authorize this combat, he seized the non-appearance of Pedro as a pretext for his deposition; and he issued a Bull conferring upon Charles of Valois, second son of Philip le Hardi, the investiture of Aragon; at the same time granting the Indulgences usual in a Crusade to all those who should assist in its conquest. The efforts of the French, however, in the first instance, were directed more to the recovery of Sicily than to new acquisitions in Spain; but the rashness of the young Prince of Salerno, (Charles le Boiteux,) whom his Father, the King, had left in command at Naples, while himself assembled reinforcements in Provence, inflicted a death-blow on the hopes of the Angevins. Too confidently measuring himself with Roger di Loria, the Prince of Salerno

Italy.
From A. D. 1197.
to A. D. 1298.
Charles appears in the Lists, May 15.
A. D. 1283.

from which Pedro is deterred by the neighbourhood of the King of France.

The Pope invests Charles of Valois with Aragon.

Defeat and capture of the Prince of Salerno.

* In the Foderus, vol. i. part ii. may be found several documents of Martin IV. relative to this combat. Among them is a Bull of Martin IV. addressed to the King of England, and warning him, on pain of Excommunication, not to accept the office of Judge of the Lists, nor to permit the duel to take place within his territories. The terms of the compact are strongly denounced as indecentissimas et temeritate non vocatus, reprobas quidem et merito reprobandas—obviam Crucifixa negotiis—Christianis procul dubio prodigne sanguinis, amaram inimici aduli, publicaque poenis annis et quibus—detestabilis et nociva, perniciosus et noxia. (628.) Before the issue of this Bull, however, Edward had addressed a Letter to Charles, declining to sanction or to participate in the combat. He speaks of *le grant peril e la grant damage qe avendrait a la Cristientee se ceste chose se feist; adde that, toutes e cestes choses regardies e bien estreot examinares nous ne pourrions trouver en nule manere, en nostre queor, qe si grantee cruaulte se feist devant nous, ne en nostre poer, ne en autre liu, ou nus le pussions destourber; and concludes with the expressions which we have given in the text. Sur ouchez en veritez, qe pour quier tous deux rousours, come celui de Craule e de Aragon nous n'en serriens gardiens du champ ou la susdite bataille se feist. (627.)*

† G. Villani, vii. 76.

Voltaire, (Ser les Mœurs, ch. lxi.) and brought down upon him a most grave remonstrance from Velly, backed with cogent reasons to prove its exaggeration. The note in which Voltaire abandoned his extreme position is not likely to be forgotten by those who have once read it. Giovanni Villani, however, plainly imputes the worst possible intention to Drouet, per suo orgoglio prese una Donna di Palermo per farle violenza. vii. 60.

* "Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi misereere nobis!"—Ave Rex Judæorum et doliati ei oleum!" G. Villani, vii. 62.

† M. de Sismondi throughout gives the 15th of May as the day agreed upon; but Giannone, xx. 7, names the 1st of June, and so it stands in the document mentioned in the following note.

History.

From
A. D.
1197. to
A. D.
1398.

Death of Charles of Anjou.
Jan. 7.

A. D.
1285.

Death of Martin IV.
March 25;
of Philippe
le Hardi, Oct. 6;
of Pedro of Aragon,
Nov. 8.

was completely routed, and, with his chief followers, remained a prisoner in the hands of his enemy. The Sicilians would have exacted a bloody reprisal for the death of Conradin; but the generous interference of Queen Costanza prevented their cruel design, and removed the illustrious captive from all hazard of his life to confinement in Aragon.⁶ Naples had evinced symptoms of revolt on learning the defeat of her Viceroy, and on the return of Charles of Anjou this disaffection was most severely chastised. He threatened to raze the City to the ground, and in a single day he gibbeted no fewer than one hundred and fifty of her inhabitants whom he most suspected. Increasing years, however, had diminished his energy, and a long tide of prosperity had unfitted him to endure reverse of fortune. During the short remainder of his life he exhibited but little vigour; and worn down by impatience and disappointment, he expired at Foggia, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and in the nineteenth of his possession of the Crown of the Sicilies. Seldom has either Hypocrisy or Self-delusion (it is not for mere human judgment to decide between their respective claims) held longer dominion over any mind than that of Charles. History presents few instances of more unscrupulous ambition than that which marked his career: yet the last words of a Prince, upon whose parting spirit it might be supposed that the blood of Conradin alone would press heavily, were addressed to the Host, as he received the Viaticum, with a tone which implied far more of confidence in the future than of remorse for the past. "Lord God," he exclaimed, "I acknowledge Thee as my Saviour, and I entreat mercy on my soul. Even as I conquered the Kingdom of Sicily, more for the service of the Holy Church than for my own profit and advantage, so do Thou forgive me my sins!"⁷

The death of Charles was followed by those of several of the most eminent of his contemporaries; Martin IV. expired on the 25th of March, in the same year; the King of France, after an unsuccessful attempt upon Spain, died at Perpignan on the 6th of October; and Pedro of Aragon, languishing under wounds received in defence of his Country from that invasion, did not survive his enemy longer than a month. The Spanish dominions of that Prince devolved upon his eldest son, Alfonso III., (the Beneficent;) the Crown of Sicily upon the second, James; during the captivity of Charles of Salerno, now King of Naples, the government of that State was administered by his eldest son, Charles Martel, assisted, in consequence of his extreme youth, (he was not more than thirteen years of age,) by a Council of French Barons, over which Robert d'Artois presided.

The Pontificates of Honorius IV. and of Nicholas IV. were marked by Favouritisms; the former devoted himself to the aggrandizement of his own House, the Savelli; the latter similarly advanced their rivals, the Colonna. An Interregnum of more than two years succeeded; and the final choice of the Conclave excited universal astonishment. Actuated probably by mutual jealousy, and by the hope which each separately cherished of establishing his own predominating influence over a Pontiff wholly incompetent to his station, they fixed upon Pietro di Marone, an aged Benedictine Hermit, distinguished only for his ascetic practices, and the reputation of miracles, bestowed in consequence of them by the superstition of the vulgar.⁸ A few months' rule exhibited manifest proofs of the incapacity of Celestin V.; and the bold intrigues of the most ambitious among the Cardinals profited by his weakness. Benedetto Gaetano foresaw the great influence which Charles II. of Naples (now released from his long imprisonment in Aragon) must exercise over the next election to the Papacy; for he had prevailed on Celestin to nominate at once twelve Members of the Sacred College, each wholly devoted to his own interests. Gaetano, therefore, having secretly made his compact with the King by stating that, in spite of the enmity which he had hitherto shown to the Ghibelins, he possessed not only willingness but ability also to serve him, an ability in which Celestin was deficient; next applied himself by juggling tricks to awaken spiritual fears in the conscience of the simple and credulous Pope, which might induce his abdication.⁹ Although such a step was unprecedented; the remonstrances of the Consistory were useless, when Celestin was once persuaded that any admixture of temporal concerns was incompatible with the due care of his soul. When the Holy See was declared vacant, the discussions in the Conclave were brief; and in ten days after the secession of Celestin, Gaetano, aided by the creatures of Charles II., was consecrated as Boniface VIII.

The deluded Hermit had entertained a hope that he might be permitted to return to his loved seclusion; §

Italy.

From
A. D.
1197.

A. D.
1298.

Pontificate of Boniface IV.

A. D.
1285.

Nicholas IV.

A. D.
1288.

Celestin V.
A. D.
1294.

His abbas
Dec. 13.

Boniface VIII.
Dec. 22.

Coadjutor

⁶ Giannone, xx. 8.

⁷ G. Villani, vii. 94. Giannone mentions a report, on the authority of a writer who lived within a century after the occurrence which he relates, that Charles of Anjou committed suicide, xx. 8. Ad hoc morte oppressus et paulatinum tandem factus est ut dicitur quod mortuus sub constituto, necesse sub talento sapientum loquere strangulans. Theodoret de Nem. De Prin. et Jure Imperii, p. 282.

The character of Charles as drawn by G. Villani is a very striking portrait. Questo Carlo fu uomo di sano consiglio, però in arme, et aspro et molto temuto et ridottato da tutti li Re del Mondo; magnanimo et d'alti intendimenti in fare ogni grande impresa, sicuro in ogni avversità, fermo et veritiero d'ogni sua promessa, poco parlante et molto diligente. Quan non ridia et non poco; honesto come un religioso et Coltriveto; aspro in giustizia et di ferace riguardo; grande di persona, et bene neborato, di colore scuro, et con grande naso, et bene parva moesti reale più ch' altro Signore. Molto vegghava et poco dormiva, et usava di dire che dormendo tanto tempo si perdeva. Largo fu a' cavallieri d'arme, non cupidino d'acquistar Terre, e Signoria, e moneta, d'onde si veniva per fornire sue imprese e guerre. vii. 1. In one or two points the likeness is probably flattering; nevertheless in the whole picture there is not a single amiable trait.

⁸ The account of the Pontificate of Celestin V., given by Raynaldus, is plentifully sprinkled with miracles.

⁹ Primum etiam et hanc eorum delationem, quatenus ad hoc illum flagrantius incitaret, dum anno exultatus mox Leonem contramphilem, per foramen, quod ante fabricaverat, vocat, sapienter, et cum multum advenire illi, ut illi dicitur falsi mundi relicta. sub Dio arere disponeret. Ferrutus Vicentinus, Hist. ii. ap. Murd. lib. 966.

It is to Celestin that Petrarch, De Vit. Solit. 2. § 3. c. 18, has referred a passage in Dante, concerning which some of the commentators have doubted. The Poet, in his descent, observes a set of glorious Limbs, in which, among the neutral Angels, are placed the Spirits of such men as have lived without either praise or blame, and are therefore rejected alike by Heaven and Hell. Among this band he sees

L'ombra di colui

Che free, per celtate, si orava vivuto. Inf. iii.

§ Petrarch describes the joy of Celestin on his abdication, from the report of eye-witnesses. Audisti narrantes qui viderunt, tandem illum fugisse cum gaudio, reges signa letitiae spiritibus oculis ac fronte gestantem, dum a conspectu Conclii jam tandem illi reditus ac liber abbas foret, quasi non humerum blando oneri, sed collum diris acerbis subdideret, atque rursus in vultu mentis quid angelicum reluceret. De Vit. Solit. ad sup.

History. but his freedom might have proved dangerous to Boniface; for the weakness which had consented to abdicate might hereafter be prevailed upon to resume; Celestin, therefore, was conveyed in the strictest custody to a fortress in Campania; and even if the dark reports current at the time, that his death was occasioned by absolute violence, be rejected, it is too much to be feared that it was intentionally accelerated by privation and cruelty.*

From A. D. 1197. to A. D. 1298, and death of Celestin. The release of Charles II. had been obtained by a promise that he would cede Sicily to James, son of the deceased King, Pedro III., and that he would insist upon the renunciation by his cousin Charles of Valois, of all claim upon Aragon which might be rested on the Investiture granted by Martin IV. From this oath he obtained absolution from Nicholas IV., the reigning Pope at the moment of his return to freedom; and in direct violation of the Treaty, to which his signature was as yet scarcely dry, he leagued with the King of Castille and Charles of Valois for the conquest of Aragon. The Crown of that Kingdom soon afterwards passed to James by the death of Alfonso, and Sicily was relinquished to a third brother, Frederic; but James, allured by a rich portion which Charles II. proffered with the hand of his daughter, entered into an unnatural compact, the object of which was no other than the de-thronement of his own family, and the transfer of Sicily from Frederic to Charles.

Leagued against Frederic, King of Sicily. A. D. 1295. The war which had so long desolated the Sicillies recommenced, therefore, in Calabria, with more than former violence; and Frederic, before he disgusted Loria so far as to induce him to change sides, was for the most part successful. Boniface at length resolved to secure, by ample bribes than had hitherto been offered, the active services of Charles of Valois. No Prince in Europe had achieved for himself a higher military reputation; and even his name and his unvaried good fortune, exclusive of his great talents, appeared to the Pope well deserving the high price at which he bartered for them. The Count of Valois, with a sufficient force maintained at his own expense, was to place himself at the disposal of the Holy See, and, in return, he was to receive in marriage the heiress of the Latin Empire; he was created Count of Romagna, Captain General of the Patrimony of St. Peter, Lord of the March of Ancona, and Pacifier of Tuscany; a further assurance was given that the authority of Vicar of the Empire should be committed to him; and he was dazzled by a yet more brilliant hope that the Pontiff might elevate him hereafter even to the lofty station of King of the Romans. Thus stimulated, Charles of Valois entered Italy, and his first services as Pacifier of Tuscany were employed in Florence. The incident, unless on account of the great celebrity of some of the names connected with it, is too unimportant to demand any place in our rapid summary of general History. It may suffice to say that the Tuscan Capital, at that moment altogether in possession of the Guelphs, was, nevertheless, distracted by two factions introduced from Pistoia, originating in a private feud, and bearing the party names of Neri and Blancho.* The latter had offended Boniface by refusing his mediation; and the Count of Valois, having gained admission into Florence, under a solemn promise that he would not attempt any change, or pretend to any authority in matters of State, immediately violated this engagement.† He strengthened himself by recalling the heads of the Neri, who had been exiled by their opponents, arrested the chief Blancho, abandoned their houses to pillage, sequestered their property, and condemned six hundred of them to banishment. Among the proscribed on this occasion were Dante and the Father of Petrarch.

Charles of Valois engages in the Papal service. A. D. 1300.

He enters Florence. A. D. 1301.

The Pacifier of Tuscany departed from Florence, after six months' abode, laden with maledictions; and embarking at Naples, led fifteen hundred men at arms to complete the conquest of Sicily. Half of that Island had already been wrested from Frederic by his brother, the King of Aragon; who, at length, touched with remorse, quitted the scene of his odious triumph, before the arrival of the French. Undismayed by his first reverses, Frederic persisted in heroic defence, till he so distressed the invader by a war of skirmishes, which intercepted his supplies, and wasted away his forces ingloriously, that he compelled him to solicit Peace. By the Treaty which Frederic dictated, Sicily and its immediate dependencies, under the name of the Kingdom of Trinacria, remained under his own sway for life, and on his death were to revert to the Angevin dynasty.

The principal event in the turbulent Pontificate of Boniface VIII., his dispute with Philippe le Bel, has been sufficiently detailed in our former pages; and there is little else in his history which need detain us. One of the chief agents in the outrage which the King of France ultimately directed against his person was, as we have already seen, a member of the Family of Colonna; a Family which, having greatly increased in power under Honorius IV., claimed to rank in some of its branches among the Princes of Italy. The enmity of Boniface to this House was first excited by the strenuous opposition which two Cardinals who bore its name offered against his election; and he seized the pretext of a correspondence which they maintained with the King of Sicily to depose them from the Sacred College, to confiscate all their property, and to subject them to an Excommunication. The Bull which promulgated this anathema was couched in language singularly ferocious;‡ and it was answered with unexpected firmness by a manifesto, which denied the validity of Boniface's election, on the ground that the abdication of Celestin was neither legal nor even voluntary. The fury of the Pope was boundless at this reply; he denounced its authors as Heretics, proclaimed a Crusade against them, razed their Palaces in Rome, and marched an army to besiege their fortresses in the Campagna. Palestrina alone main-

Italy.
From A. D. 1197. to A. D. 1298.

Banishment of Dante.
Invasion of Sicily.
A. D. 1302.

Frederic concludes an advantageous Peace.
A. D. 1303.

Boniface excommunicates the Colonna.
A. D. 1297.

Crusade against them.

* His cell was so small that the steps of the altar on which he celebrated Mass in the day-time furnished his nightly pillow. Petit autem ut duo abba dormirent fratres cum quibus diuinan ageret officium. Quia ei concessit illius carceris angustiam duo ferre non valentes, inde contrahuntur suffragi. Erant cum tanta spolia turris orculo, ut vir sanatus ubi habebat pedes dum Massam celebraret, ibi caput recinqueret dum dormiendo quiesceret. Sed, prohi pudor! sic Bonifacius ille, aut Herodes, Petrum arrebat in carcere! Vita Hicini Petri Cælestini Authore Petro Aliaco Cardinale Cameracensi, li. 17. op. Surium de probatis Sanctorum Historiis, iii. 363.

† The Feud originated between two members of different branches of the Pistoian Family Cancellieri, whose common ancestor had been twice married; the children of the first wife, Blancho, were called after their mother, Blancho, and those of the second bed received in opposition the title Neri, names which continued among their descendants.

‡ Dante pointedly represents Charles as combating solo con la lingua

Con la qual giostra Guido.

Futur. xx

Raynaldus, 1297, § 35. &c.

History.

From

A. D.

1197.

to

A. D.

1298.

Advice of Guido di Montefeltro

tained an effectual resistance; nor did Boniface succeed in capturing it till he asked and acted upon the advice of Guido de Montefeltro, a Ghibelin Captain, who after winning reputation as much for subtilty as for valour,* had taken the habit of St. Francis and devoted himself to a life of penitence and seclusion. How far his Religious observances had extinguished in him the spirit of worldly craftiness may be determined by the suggestion which he offered to Boniface, after surveying the great strength of Palestrina, and declaring it to be impregnable. "If you would win it," said the Devotee, first demanding absolution for that which he was about to utter, "you must promise much and perform little;"† and having delivered this single-hearted admonition, he returned to his Convent, to fix his thoughts once more on Heaven. Advice flowing from a source so celebrated was not likely to be rejected by the Pope: he promised favour to the Colonna, if they would appear before him within three days after the surrender of their town; and at the same time he secretly resolved to put them to death, so soon as they were in his power. Palestrina opened her gates on advantageous terms; but her Lords, seasonably warned of the intended treachery, and having no further refuge in Italy, dispersed themselves in foreign parts, and found protection, among other places, in the Court of Philippe le Bel.

Flight of the Colonna.Translation of the Santa Casa to Loretto.

A. D.

1294.

To the reign of Boniface belongs one of the most daring legends of the Romish Church, the Translation of the Lady-Chapel of Loretto. On the capture of St. Jean d'Acre by Melec Séraph in 1291, the Santa Casa, or House in which the Virgin had dwelt in Nazareth, was saved from its menaced profanation, by a band of Angels, who carried it on their wings to Tersactio in Illyria. After an abode of three years and seven months in that spot, it once more traversed the sea, by a like conveyance, without any assignable reason for its departure. Celestial music was heard as it passed; the trees inclined themselves to it in reverence; and it was deposited at the distance of a few leagues from Ancona in a wood belonging to Lauretta, a Lady of Recanati, from whom the once flourishing town which soon gathered round the inestimable relic derives its name.‡ The first arrival in Italy occurred three days before Celestin's abdication; but as the Angels twice changed the site of their holy burden to different hills, the final settlement did not take place till after the accession of Boniface.

* Guido, speaking of himself when Dante encounters him in the Inferno, rests his fame more upon the former than the latter.

*L'opere mie
Non furon lionarie, ma di volpe;
Gli accorgimenti, e le coperte vie L'oppe tutte: e si unmai lor 'arte
Ch' al fine della terra il suoco uoce.*

†

*Pader, da che tu mi lavi
Di quei peccati, oie no veder deggio,
L'ango promessi, con l'attendere corto
Ti farà tramfar nell' alto seggio.*

Ist. xxvii.

Id. ibid.

‡ "Loretto," says Eustace, "has now shared the fate of Delphi." (l. ch vii.) We may refer to the account of the Santa Casa there given, not only as being very copious, but as it affords a remarkable specimen of the great candour of that always amiable, not unfrequently eloquent, and somewhat hardly-used writer. The Reader who wishes to exhaust the history of the Santa Casa may turn to the V Books of Turrellinus; to Le Glorie Morales del Santuario di Loretto, by Bertoli, Chaplain to the Elector of Bavaria; to the Archea Domus Lauretane perstricta relato by Nollius; or to La S. Casa Abbezzita by Serragli.

The institution of the Centenary Jubilee affords Boniface another claim to distinction. It was pretended that at the expiration of each Century especial Indulgences were to be attained by the Faithful who should visit the Tombs of the Apostles; and accordingly on the dawn of the 1st of January in the year 1300, an innumerable multitude of Pilgrims thronged to the Basilica of St. Peter. The policy of Boniface perhaps created, certainly confirmed, a belief so advantageous to the coffers of the Holy See; and a Bull was promulgated announcing plenary remission of sins to all persons who in the course of that year, or of any hundredth year afterwards, should accomplish the like Pilgrimage. It is affirmed by an eye-witness that during the celebration of these first Secular Games of the Church, no day passed in which Rome did not contain two hundred thousand strangers; each of whom vied with the others, proportionally to his means, in the richness of his pious offerings.* The harvest was too plentiful not to excite a desire for the more frequent recurrence; and Clement VI. commiserating the brevity of human life, when the next Centenary had been trodden but half through, fixed the cycle at half its original term. Urban VI., equally desirous with his predecessors to witness in his own time so devout a celebration, reduced the intervening years to the same number as those which our Saviour had passed on Earth. And finally, Sixtus IV., benevolently wishing that a remedy so salutary should be more often thrown open to mankind, consented that a Jubilee should be proclaimed after the lapse of every twenty-five years; an interval which has been observed ever since his Pontificate.†

The death of Boniface VIII. affords a fit resting place in our narrative of the general fortunes of Italy; but we must briefly advert to a few incidents belonging to the History of the Maritime Republics, which it has not been in our power to interweave with the common Annals, but which still should not be passed in entire silence.

The commencement of the XIIIth Century was an epoch of unexampled glory to Venice; but if we were to relate in this place the share which that great Republic bore in the IVth Crusade, we should tear a splendid page from another Chapter of our Work. The Commercial rivalry with Genoa, which the rapidly increasing wealth of either State was certain to generate, had been

* Al continuo in tutto l'anno havea in Roma oltre al popolo Romano 200 mila di pellegrini, senza quelli ch' erano per li casamenti andando e tornando, e tutti erano forniti e contenti di vitteuaglie giustamente, con i cavalli come le persone. Et so il poco testimoniar, che vi fu presente e vidi. Giov. Villani, viii. 36.

† An inscription over the gates of the Cathedral at Sienna runs as below.

*Anno centum Romæ semper est Jubilæus;
Crimina laxantur, cui ponitur ista donatur;
Hæc decrevit Bonifacius, et roboravit.*

The author of a Life of Clement VI., edited by Bosquet, states that Pope to have been actuated by the following reasons when he shortened the interval of years by one half, quia visio hominum labitur et decrevit, et malitia superabundat in mundo, proinde deducit &c. of Urban VI. the Magnum Chronicon Belgicum states that he ordered ut omnis Jubilæus in futurum de tricesimo tertio anno in tricesimum tertium annum semper institueretur, — quo cum commovisset tempus vitei Domini nostri Jesu Christi in humanitate, quod totum postquam natus est de Virgine (per cujus mortem thesaurus Ecclesie, unde redemptio peccatorum annis emanat cumulatus) triginta annorum curricula completum fuit. Da Change, (ad v. Jubilæus), from whom we borrow the above notice, adds that the motive of Sixtus IV. in still further curtailing the interval to twenty-five years, was that quoque alius participi istius beneficii fieret. See also JUBILÆUS in our Miscellaneous Dictionary.

Italy.

From

A. D.

1197.

to

A. D.

1298.

First Jubilee.

A. D.

1300.

Second.

A. D.

1350.

Third.

A. D.

1382.

The interval fixed at twenty-five years.

The Maritime Republics.

Rivalry between Venice and Genoa.

History.	Italy.
From A. D. 1197. to A. D. 1298. 1st War. A. D. 1269.	From A. D. 1197. to A. D. 1298. The Tus- cans form a League against Pisa. Count Ugo- lino ap- pointed Captain- General of Pisa. A. D. 1285. Succeeds in dissolving the Con- federacy. Noble con- duct of the prisoners.
1st War. A. D. 1293.
Disadvan- tageous to Venice.
Power and wealth of Pisa.
War with Genoa. A. D. 1282. Great de- feat of the Pisans off Meloria. Aug. 6. A. D. 1284. Their pri- soners re- tained in captivity.	Ugolino usurps the sovereignty of Pisa. His tyr- any.

greatly enhanced by the new connection thus formed by Venice with the East; and the long-suppressed jealousy kindled into open flame about the year 1298. In their first War with the Genoese the Venetians were almost invariably successful in many sanguinary naval battles; and yet neither the resources nor the spirit of their antagonists appeared to have suffered under defeat. The expedition of St. Louis to Africa for a while demanded accordance between the leading maritime European Powers, upon whom he relied for means of transport; and the rival States, adjured by the common voice of all Christendom to suspend their private feuds for the sake of the general interest, reluctantly consented, not to a Peace, but to a five years' Truce. On the expiration of that term, war was renewed with more than former implacability, and Fortune then became favourable to the Genoese. The Venetians were twice vanquished, losing altogether more than one hundred ships; and they were compelled to seek the close of a useless and destructive contest, by abandoning for the next thirteen years all right of navigation with armed vessels in the Black Sea or on the coast of Syria.

A similar spirit of bitterness, arising from like causes, armed the Genoese against the Pisans also.* Of the great victory obtained by the latter when their enemies endeavoured to convey the French Prelates from Nice to the Council summoned by Gregory IX. in the Lateran, we have already spoken; and during the forty years succeeding that triumph, Pisa constantly augmented her power. The habits of her population were frugal, the produce of her territory was abundant; she counted the neighbouring Islands of Elba, Corsica, and Sardinia, among her dependencies; and her factories were extensive both in Acre and in Constantinople. Although Venice did not escape from her share of that jealousy which is the natural result of common enterprise in the same path, yet she was more remote than Genoa, and she bordered not on the Mediterranean but on the Adriatic. With that Republic, therefore, Pisa for the most part cultivated a good understanding, occasionally cemented into offensive and defensive alliance; but with the Genoese it was far otherwise, and a series of petty outrages, inflicted and endured, led to open hostilities in the year 1282. One battle fought two years afterwards, off the little Island Meloria, between nearly equal numbers, proved most disastrous to the Pisans; five thousand of their mariners fell in the contest, eleven thousand were carried in chains to the dungeons of their enemy; who well aware of the great advantage to be derived from retaining them in captivity, refused all proposals for exchange or ransom. Their wives, it was said, cannot re-marry, and the population of Pisa therefore will decay. Without vouching for the soundness of this reasoning, it must be admitted that the resolution was most destructive to the prisoners themselves. Sixteen years afterwards, when the conclusion of Peace restored them to freedom, scarcely one thousand survivors returned to their native walls.

It was that period of danger and dismay, when all Pisa seemed as one house of mourning for her past calamity, and when yet greater dangers were impending, which raised to the Dictatorship of his Country one whose name has received from Poetry an immortality which it never otherwise would have obtained. Pisa was the only Ghibelin City bordering on Tuscany; and the Guelphs of that State, earnestly desiring to profit to the utmost by her recent calamity, offered their alliance to the Genoese, undertook to conduct a land attack while their confederates should maintain a blockade by sea, and pledged themselves never to consent to Peace, but utterly to destroy the devoted City, and to scatter abroad its population.* Apprized of these savage intentions, the Pisans consented to bestow unlimited authority for ten years on the most powerful of their Nobles; and Count Ugolino delle Gherardeschi, notwithstanding he had contracted certain family alliances with the Guelphs, and still maintained private intercourse with Florence, was nominated Captain-General. Ugolino conducted separate negotiations with the allies with considerable dexterity, till, by tempting each with the bribe which it most coveted, he dissolved the Confederacy. It was during this diplomacy that the prisoners taken at the Battle of Meloria displayed a more than Roman self-devotion. They learned that Ugolino had proposed, on condition of their release, to surrender to the Genoese the important town of Castro in Sardinia; and shrinking from freedom purchased on terms so injurious to their native land, they obtained leave to send a deputation to the Pisan Council. By their representatives, they not only declined the proffered boon, but avowed an intention, if they should be restored to liberty against their will, to pursue even to death the Magistrate who should be base enough to bring so foul a stain upon the honour of their Country.†

Ugolino, doubtless, was well pleased that the ulterior designs which he then cherished were not embarrassed by the return of spirits thus ardent with Patriotism. By sacrificing much of her territory, he obtained Peace for his Country, and he secured support also for the treason which he meditated against her liberties. It was not without a struggle, however, that he won his way to despotic power; but when, after more than one alteration of Fortune, he established himself in the Municipal Palace, and chased the Podestà from the City, he felt confident of the permanency of his rule. He had selected his birthday for the Festival of his inauguration; and when wearied but not satiated with the pomp of magistracy, he entered his chamber after the ceremonial, he asked an attendant, "What more can be reserved for me?" the fearless and almost prophetic reply which he received was, "Nothing more but the wrath of Heaven."

False to both parties while he seemingly encouraged each, without breaking with his Guelph connections in Florence, Ugolino concerted with Ruggieri, Archbishop of Pisa, a plot for the expulsion of the Ghibelins. The measure was successful, and Ruggieri, not less ambitious than his brother conspirator, so far advanced himself in the affections of the populace, that they loudly insisted upon his being admitted to a moiety of the Government. But Ugolino refused to divide his power, and, inebriated by prosperity, he despised the murmurs of the people whom he oppressed, and surrendered himself to unbridled bursts of passion. On one occasion, when irritated by the remonstrances of a kinsman, he unsheathed his poniard and would have despatched him on the spot. A nephew of Ruggieri who was present arrested the blow, and diverted the tyrant's fury upon himself. Ugolino, seizing an axe which was un-

* The rivalry between Genoa and Pisa is detailed fully in the Vth Book of Ubertus Folietti, Hist. Genuesium, op. Ciceronii, l.

* G. Villani, vii. 97.

† Marangoni, Chron. di Pisa, p. 571. cited by Simsoni, Rep. It. iv. 28, to whom we are greatly indebted in our abstract.

History. happily at hand, cleft the skull of the mediating youth, and laid him dead at his feet. Ruggieri still dissembled, till an alarm of the return of the Guelphs roused the Citizens of the opposite faction in their own defence. Their first attack was directed against the Palace, which Ugolino bravely defended from mid-day till nightfall, when it was fired over his head. Ruggieri then conducted him, but not alone, to a prison at that time known as the Tower of the Gualandi, now bearing, from the savage deed of which it was to be the scene, the name Della Fame. The Gaddo and the Uguccione, the Brigata and the Anselmuccio of Dante, are not fictitious personages; the two former were the sons, the two latter the grandsons of Ugolino. After a few months' delay, the Archbishop, disappointed in his avaricious hope of extorting treasure from the imprisoned Count, threw the key of their dungeon into the Arno, and the five captives perished by a lingering death of horror, which, but for our remembrance of the Inferno, we should pronounce to be unspeakable.*

GERMANY. We turn now to GERMANY singly. When Conrad IV. succeeded to his Father's throne, he inherited also from him the opposing pretensions of William Count of Holland, who in Frederic's lifetime had been crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle.† That Prince survived his competitor about two years; and many of the German writers do not begin to reckon the commencement of the great Interregnum (as it is termed) till his death.‡ He was killed in a winter campaign against the Frieslanders, while crossing a frozen dike on a heavy war-horse. The ice, unable to support his burden, gave way under him, and the Prince, deprived of all power of disengaging himself, was put to death slowly and miserably, after receiving innumerable wounds.§ The vacant throne was filled by a double election; and the wealth of the English Richard, Earl of Cornwall,|| the virtues of Alfonso of Castile, won for each a choice which bestowed no more than nominal power. Three successive

* It is quite needless to cite the most pathetic episode in modern—perhaps in any Poetry—which Dante has presented in the XXXIIIrd Canto of the Inferno, † On November 1, 1248. Struvius, i. 467.

‡ The Interregnum, if reckoned from the deposition of Frederic by the Council of Lyon to the election of Rodolph of Hapsburg, lasted twenty-eight years; if from the death of Frederic, twenty-three. Perhaps the death of Conrad IV. would be the most legitimate point of commencement.

§ Matt. Paris, 793, ad ann. 1256. William's chief claim to remembrance arises from his sister Margaret, Countess of Henneberg, according to legendary history the most prolific of her sex. It seems that a beggar-woman who with twice at her breast once suckled alms from the Countess, was not only rejected, but was taunted also with incontinence; being told that no woman could bear twins who was faithful to one man. The beggar appealed to Heaven in proof of her chastity; and implored as a sign, that if her adoration were well founded, the Countess might have at a single birth as many children as there were days in the year. Accordingly, on Whit Sunday, 1246, when Margaret was in her fortieth year, (so precise are the biographers in their details,) she brought forth at the Hague three hundred and sixty-five children of both sexes, each about the size of a chicken; who were baptized altogether in one basin by the Bishop of Utrecht, the boys being named John, the girls Elisabeth; and who afterwards with their mother died on the same day. Mattheus, from whose Theatrum Historiarum (961.) we derive the above particulars, cites Ludovico Guicciardini, Krastius, Ludovicus Vires, and Camerarius as his authorities.

|| Richard's accumulated wealth is estimated by Matthew Paris to have been sufficient to allow of the daily expenditures of one hundred marks, without drawing in any way upon his German and English revenues. 809. The best account of this Prince may be found in Göbauer's Leben und Thaten Richard Erbkönig Römischer Kaysers.

Popes refused to decide the controversy; Alfonso, harassed by the Moors in his hereditary dominions, was unable to prosecute war in Germany; and Richard, although crowned, never established a substantial authority even by the most lavish expenditure. During this period of anarchy, in which the Empire was convulsed with Civil dissension, and each petty Baron, fortified in his strong-hold, lived for the most part with impunity upon rapine, numerous Associations and Confederacies were instituted among the chief German Cities for mutual protection; and the Commercial union of the Hanse Towns, although strictly perhaps a few years earlier in its origin, was at the same time materially consolidated by a feeling of common peril. We willingly hasten over these inglorious and most deplorable scenes of misery, discord, and confusion; and we pass from the "winter night full of darkness and dangers," as it is described by a contemporary pen, to that which it names, with equal justice, the "return of a genial Spring."*

On the death of Richard, Alfonso urged Gregory X. to sanction his claims: but that wise and benevolent Pontiff, anxious to restore peace to Germany, and foreseeing that a powerful faction existed which could never become reconciled to the King of Castile, peremptorily refused assent. The Pope then called upon the Electors at once to proceed to an entirely new choice; threatening that he would nominate by his own authority, unless their discussion terminated in agreement. That there were private motives which regulated the decision at which they arrived is little to be doubted; but there were enough general reasons arising out of the personal character and pretensions of Rodolph, Count of Hapsburg, to justify the union of all suffrages in his favour. The House which he represented was of very ancient stock; it might be traced with probability, by those not too fastidious in the examination of genealogies, so far back as the VIIIth Century, and with certainty even by the most scrupulous to the Xth. His possessions were far from large, for his chief inheritance, the County of Hapsburg, contained only a part of the district now called Argau. In the course of an active life, having now arrived at his fifty-fifth year, he had manifested brilliant talents both for War and for Civil Government; and he appeared in all points well adapted to restore order to a distracted State, without rendering himself too powerful a master of those by whom he had been elevated.

When his election as King of the Romans was announced to the Count of Hapsburg, he was encamped under the walls of Basle, in order to punish the Bishop for an act of very treacherous cruelty. The Citizens opened their gates on receiving intelligence of the choice of the German Diet, and hailed Rodolph with acclamations; while the Bishop is reported to have vented his chagrin in an irreverent sarcasm; "Sit fast, great God! or Rodolph will occupy thy throne."† The new King's first care after his Coronation was to obtain the sanction of Gregory; and it was cordially granted, both by a reply to the Imperial ambassadors, and afterwards, in a personal interview at Lausanne; and the assurance then confirmed to Rodolph that on visiting Rome he should receive the Crown of his predecessors, although in truth he never performed

* Letter of the Archbishop of Cologne cited by Cane, Hist. of House of Austria, i. 22.

† Sede fortiter, Domine Deus, vel locum Rodolphus occupabit tamen. Albert Aytzinger, 100.

Germany.
From
A. D.
1250.
to
A. D.
1295.
Interregnum.

Rhenish Cities.

Election of Rodolph of Hapsburg
A. D.
1273.

Sanctioned by Gregory X.

History.
From
A. D.
1250,
to
A. D.
1298.

that journey,* will justify us for the future in styling him Emperor. The first great peril which his new authority encountered arose from Ottocar, King of Bohemia, the most powerful European Prince of his time. To his patrimony of Bohemia and Moravia, the courage and enterprise of Ottocar had made large additions, by conquests from the Prussians and from the King of Hungary; and yet more by a seizure of the dominions of the House of Austria when Innocent IV. excommunicated its Duke. The tragical death of Ferdinand in the Italian expedition of Conradin, confirmed Ottocar in this last great acquisition; and it is little a matter of surprise that a Monarch, whose territories extended from the frontiers of Bavaria to Raab in Hungary, and from the Baltic to the Adriatic, should view with jealousy an election which had advanced so inconsiderable a Prince as Rodolph so far above him in titular dignity.

Rodolph, in early youth, had borne arms in Ottocar's service; and when the Diet of Princes, irritated at the contumacy with which the King of Bohemia refused the performance of homage, menaced him with the ban of the Empire if he persisted, he haughtily replied that he owed nothing to one who in former days had been his servant, and who was not worthy that Kings should obey him.† When the ultimate resolutions of the Diet were communicated to him, his fury spurned all bounds; and in defiance of their sacred character and immunities, he put to death the heralds by whom they were announced. The prudent dispositions of Rodolph, and the wisdom with which he conciliated alliances, soon placed a powerful force at his command; and while the King of Bohemia remained inactive from contempt of an enemy whom he considered little deserving of regard; the Emperor penetrated Austria by rapid marches, sat down under the walls of Vienna, and had prepared, what in those days was esteemed an unheard of miracle of military skill, a bridge of boats, on which he intended to cross the Danube, and to transfer the war into Bohemia itself. Thus surprised and embarrassed, Ottocar was compelled to negotiate a Peace, which deprived him of Austria, Styria, and Carinthia; a double intermarriage between his family and that of the Emperor was projected in order to cement their future friendship; and the King of Bohemia, with little intention of adhering to the Treaty whenever he should recover sufficient power to defend its infraction, did homage to his Rival.‡

* Rodolph is said to have excused himself for not visiting Italy by referring the Apologue of the sick Lion—estigma nulla retrorsum—to the expeditions of his predecessors to that Country. Gerard de Roo, p. 34.

† Cox, Hist. of the House of Austria, l. 37.

‡ Nihil se debere famulo suo neque digno cui Reges obsequantur, are the words of Gerard de Roo, which we think Archbishop Cox has translated rightly in the sense which we have given above. Others, with some degree of violence, render nihil se debere, that he owed nothing, i. e. that he had paid him all his wages; and infer from them the truth of a report that Rodolph had once held office in Ottocar's household. That assertion is by no means improbable; although much deference is undoubtedly due to its rejection by so diligent an investigator as Archbishop Cox; and if it had no other support than the above forced translation it would be altogether futile.

§ Navigis nihilominus apparatu bellico mirifice ordinatis, quibus latum flumen Danubii transire disposuit. Letter from the Archbishop of Salzburg to the Pope ap. Gerbert Collex Epist. p. 126. See also other praises of the naves mirantes cited by Struvius, l. 516. || Archbishop Cox indignantly rejects a tale which, if it were true, would do little credit to either the discretion or the delicacy of Rodolph. Ottocar is said to have stipulated that his homage should be offered in private; but Rodolph contrived that while the King

Scarcely a year elapsed before it became plain that Ottocar meditated a renewal of hostilities; and the resources which the Emperor brought to this second contest appeared far from adequate to its support. The backwardness of the leading German Princes in his cause, and the consequent inferiority of his own army to that which he knew had been assembled by his enemy, for a while occasioned most gloomy anticipations; and when the two Princes at length confronted each other on the plain of Marchfeld, it was for his Crown and his life, not less than for victory, that Rodolph was about to fight. In the very heat of the engagement, while fortune was still doubtful, Rodolph was unhorsed and wounded; and till his Knights hastened to his rescue, he lay on the ground, unable to rise on account of the weight of his armour, and covering his head, from which the helmet had been loosened in his fall, with the uncertain protection of his shield. His reappearance decided the combat; and among the fourteen thousand Bohemians who perished in their total rout, Ottocar himself was numbered. Disarmed and a prisoner, he is believed to have fallen under the vengeance of some Styrian Nobles whose families had suffered bitterly from his tyranny.

The possession of the Austrian Provinces being thus confirmed to Rodolph, he sheathed his sword without reluctance, and both wisely and justly forebore from any attempt to deprive Wenceslaus, the infant son of the fallen Ottocar, of his paternal Crown. Four years, however, elapsed before the great territory which he had won could be settled as the perpetual inheritance of his own family. At length, after the extinction of some claims and the adjustment of others, the Fief which he had acquired at the sword's point was declared vacant, and conferred on his son Albert, with the consent of the Diet of the Empire.

The restoration of internal tranquillity to his harassed dominions formed the paramount occupation of this able Prince when disengaged from foreign War; and he proceeded with a firm hand to restrain those violations of the peace which hitherto had set Law at defiance. In one year, he razed to the ground seventy castles, the habitations of banditti or of powerful Barons worse than banditti; and he condemned to death in all nine and twenty Nobles belonging to the most illustrious families in Thuringia, who had been guilty of atrocious outrages.* The preservation of the integrity of the Empire, and the recovery of such Fiefs as had been wrested from it during the recent Interregnum, were his other leading objects; in pursuit of which he was more than once compelled to have recourse to arms. It was in an engagement near Morat, with the troops of the Count of Savoy, who had dismembered many Helvetic districts

Germany.
From
A. D.
1250.
to
A. D.
1298.
Renewal of War.
A. D.
1277.
Battle of Marchfeld, Aug. 36.
A. D.
1278.

Defeat and death of Ottocar.

Rodolph invests his son Albert with the Fief of Austria.
A. D.
1282.

His inter-admi-nistation.

was upon his knees, the hangings of the tent should be raised, so that he was exhibited to the view of the whole army. The reasons adduced against the story seem quite sufficient to prove that it is apocryphal; 1st, the petty fraud is wholly alien from Rodolph's general character; and 2dly, it is not mentioned by any writer within two hundred years of his time. It might be added, that it is most unlikely that Ottocar should make, or that Rodolph should grant the request for a private performance of homage; the actual payment of it must be generally published abroad, and it would be known therefore by all men that the ceremony (which in the estimation of the times did not contain any thing degrading) had been really performed. Frölich has written an especial Dissertation on the falsehood of the anecdote: Dialogus qui discipulatus ante Rodolphum Hapsburgicum Regi Bohemico Ottocaro ab obsequio fuerit, tandemque Tentorio lapsus delatus.

* Cox, l. p. 57.

Jealousy of Ottocar, King of Bohemia, who refuses homage.

War with Ottocar.
A. D.
1276.

He loses Austria, and performs homage.
Nov. 25.

History.

From
A. D.
1250.
to
A. D.
1298.

His great danger at the Battle of Morat.

A. D.
1253.
Invasion of Burgundy.

Transactions with Bohemia.

The Diet refuses to elect Albert King of the Romans.

Disappointment

and death of Rodolph.
July 15.

A. D.
1291.

from the Empire, that the active and beneficial career of Rodolph was nearly terminated. Ever in the van of battle, he was unhorsed and surrounded, and must have perished had he not sprung boldly into the lake, where, supporting himself by grasping the bough of a tree with one hand, he defended himself with the other, till the arrival of fresh troops released him from his great peril. In a similar expedition, undertaken to punish the defection of the Count of Burgundy, Rodolph successfully pursued his design, in spite of the menaced hostility of France; to which Crown the Vassal of the Empire had transferred his allegiance. Not less watchfully protecting the interests of his allies than his own, he rescued the young King of Bohemia from the thralldom which had been imposed upon him during his minority; overthrew the usurpation of the Regent; and substantially increasing the power as well as the dignity of Wenceslaus, by the grant of new Fiefs and of high offices, insured his fidelity, and found in him a useful ally instead of a turbulent Vassal.

It might be thought that nineteen years of active service, in so many ways directed to the welfare of the Empire, would have secured to Rodolph the gratitude of its Princes; and that the wish of the veteran Monarch to entail the Crown on his only surviving son would have met approval from the German Diet. Urgent, however, as was his request, and strong as were his representations of the hazard of another Interregnum if they should refuse, the proposal was evaded; and the jealousy of hereditary succession was more powerful than the apprehension of renewed Civil discord. The fortitude of Rodolph gave way under this disappointment of his most cherished hope; and probably with an anticipation of the result, he avowed his intention of visiting Spire, the great cemetery of the Emperors, that he might see the Kings his predecessors. Before that object was attained, his strength failed on his passage down the Rhine; he expired at Gemeschein in the seventy-third of his age; and his remains were conveyed onward to the City which he was forbidden to enter except for interment. Of the sound discretion which marked Rodolph's Government, the salutary change produced among his subjects during his reign affords sufficient testimony; of his individual qualities an equally favourable report is to be obtained from the very numerous personal anecdotes which have been preserved.* Few Princes have been so freely exposed to general view, and fewer still could have profited so greatly by undisguised exhibition.

It is most probable that the disposition of Albert, who little resembled his Father, was not without its weight in contributing to his rejection by the Diet when Rodolph proposed him as King of the Romans. His Austrian Vassals more than once had struggled to throw off his very grievous yoke; and at the time of Rodolph's death, they were in open rebellion. The claim, therefore, which he then advanced upon the choice of the Electors was little likely to be received with favour; yet nine months elapsed before they decided against him, and tendered the Crown to a Chief of great military repute, but of scanty possessions, Adolphus of Nassau. The seven years of that Prince's reign afford little matter of interest; his Vassals were turbulent, and himself was unpopular. In an alliance which he concluded with England against France, he received large subsidies which he appropriated to the relief of his own pressing wants; and, perhaps, the neglect of a seasonable distribution of some portion of those moneys among his disaffected Princes, accelerated their final resolution to remove him from the throne. His deposition was solemnly pronounced, and the election of Albert proclaimed in a Diet at Mentz; and when the latter took the field to enforce his claim, he was powerfully supported. The competitors encountered at Gelheim, between Spire and Worms; and a hard-fought battle was terminated by the death of Adolphus, who received his first wound from the hand of his Rival and successor in the Crown of the Empire.

the goodnatured, although perhaps somewhat broad humour, which is frequently elsewhere attributed to him. It should be noticed beforehand that Rodolph's person does not appear to have been by any means well-favoured; Struvius describes him as "a lengthy man, seven feet high, thin, small-headed, pale-faced, long-nosed, and very scantily provided with hair." i. 514. It is of his nose that Cuspinian is about to speak below. *Cum Rex corpus habere procerum et faciem regiam, naso equino, qui iusto major, in decem semit obviu quendam habuit disculcum, qui Regis faciem novu, ejusque elementum. Cum itaque pratercundo ex angustis semit Regi cedere a utellibus crebro jussu nollet, rogatus cur non cederet? "Regius," inquit, "naso viam implet, praterire non possum." Subridens Rex flexu in alius latu naso meum ead, "Fide," inquit, "mi fili, nasum torquere meum ne te impediat." 354. cited by Struvius, ibid.*

A memorable instance of his piety while he was still only Lord of Hapsburg, in giving up his horse to a Priest carrying the Viaticum to a dying man, and thus saving him from wading through a river, forms the theme of a very spirited ballad by Schuler, Der Graf von Habsburg; which may be found well translated in the Appendix to a History of Switzerland, lately published among the Volumes of the Cabinet Library.

* Many of these anecdotes may be found in Archdeacon Cox's History, a Work to which access is so easy, that we forbear from transcribing them. One which we shall give is taken from a less obvious source, and is eminently characteristic of the familiarity with which the Emperor permitted himself to be approached, and of Germany.

From
A. D.
1250.
to
A. D.
1298.

Election of Adolphus of Nassau.

His dependence.
A. D.
1298.

and death
in Battle, July 2.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF THE XIIIth CENTURY.

History.
General
remarks.

THE History of the Christian Church during the XIIIth Century presents a picture little differing in its general features from that which we have had occasion to contemplate in the course of our last two Chapters of Ecclesiastical Annals. The Roman Pontiffs continued, with unabated boldness and equal success, to vindicate those pretensions to spiritual and temporal supremacy, (for the one in a great degree involved the other,) which had been put forward and enforced with audacity so remarkable by their more immediate predecessors in the Chair of St. Peter; and, in the Colleges, by the industry of the Scholastic Theologians, the doctrines and methods of Aristotle were acquiring something of analogous predominance. Of events connected with the external affairs of the Church, the successive failures of the IVth, Vth, and VIth Crusades form the most interesting and important. The prospects of a revival of Christianity in the East, were thus completely and finally extinguished; a calamity which seems to have been felt with peculiar acuteness by the Bishops of Rome, and for which the triumph obtained under their auspices by the armies of the Church, over the Heretics of Languedoc and Provence, afforded probably but an inadequate consolation. A more important accession of strength and influence was derived from the foundation of the Mendicant Orders; the Members of which, by their unqualified devotion and indefatigable industry, constituted, during this and the following Centuries, the firmest supporters and most active instruments of the power of Rome.

Adhering to our former arrangement, we shall resume our view of Ecclesiastical affairs, by a summary account of the succession of the Popes during the present Century, as forming the ground and the connecting link of the whole.

Celestin III., as we have seen, died on the 8th of January, 1198. By the immediate and almost unanimous suffrage of the College, the succession devolved on the Cardinal Lotharius, who assumed the name of Innocent III. He was the son of Count Thrasimund of Segui, and was not more than thirty-seven years of age at the time of his election; a circumstance which seems to have constituted the only ground of objection to it, and which would have been fatal to his success, but for the preeminent character which he had acquired for talents, courage, and disinterestedness.*

* He was at this time only Deacon, and his consecration was deferred till the Ember week in Lent, in order to give time for his previous ordination. See the LXXXIIIrd Epistle of the 1st Book VOL. XI.

One of the first acts of the new Pontiff was to take measures for asserting his sovereign authority over the City of Rome. The very day after his Coronation, he exacted of the Magistrates that they should take to him that oath of allegiance which they had hitherto sworn to the Emperor only; thereby compelling them to acknowledge his sole and independent jurisdiction. At the same time he despatched his Legates into various Provinces of Italy, for the purpose of recovering possession of such of the domains of the Church as had been usurped by laymen or foreigners during the recent troubles. These missions, which in some instances the Pontiff supported by his own presence, were almost everywhere successful.

A similar vigour and success distinguished his dealings with foreign Powers. The Empress Constance, widow of Henry V., had, immediately after the election of the new Pontiff, applied to him for the investiture of the Kingdom of Sicily and its continental dependences, for herself and her son Ferdinand. After a long negotiation, Innocent granted her request, but on condition that the Empress should swear before the Legate to do homage to the Pope for her Kingdom; a ceremony to be observed equally by her son on his coming of age; and it was further exacted that the right of the Roman See to receive appeals in all Ecclesiastical matters; to interfere by its Legates and Deputies in the administration of the same; and to confirm the elections of Bishops, should be admitted without limitation throughout her dominions.* Before the Bulls containing the ratification of this Convention had reached Sicily, the Empress herself died, leaving, by Will, the Regency of the Kingdom, during the minority of her son, to the Pope.

One of the earliest cares of Innocent was to endeavour to revive the interest of Christendom in the suffering condition of the Syrian Churches; with this view he published a Circular Letter, addressed to the Kingdoms of France, England, Hungary, and Sicily, in which he called upon both Princes and people to take instant measures for succouring their brethren in the East. At the same time he addressed an Epistle to the Greek Emperor, Alexius Angelus, in which he reproached him

Ecclesiastical History of the XIIIth Century.
Asserts his Sovereignty over Rome.

Affairs of Sicily.

of the Epistles of this Pope; a very large and complete collection, divided into nineteen Books, corresponding to the successive years of his Pontificate, and which contains very ample and interesting materials for the illustration as well of the character and genius of the man as of the Ecclesiastical and Political History of the times in which he lived.

* Epist. Innoc. 410. lib. i.

Innocent
III.
A. D.
1198.

History.

as well with the indifference which both he and his predecessors had manifested for the recovery of the Holy Land, as with the continued ichism of the Greeks from what he called the Universal Church. A few years after, a violent end seemed likely to be put to this division, when (April 1204) the French and Venetian Crusaders made themselves masters of Constantinople; and a Latin Patriarch, Tomaso Morosini, was installed in the See of that Metropolis under the immediate sanction of the Pope.

Quarrels of Innocent with John, King of England.

Nothing can bear stronger witness to the ascendancy of the Papal power at this period than the transactions which we have related under the Annals of the Empire. A similar evidence to the same point is to be found in the process and result of the contest which broke out about the same time between the Pope and John, King of England. The dispute in its origin respected the election of a successor to Archbishop Hubert in the See of Canterbury.* The Monks of Canterbury had, in the first instance, secretly chosen their Sub-prior, Reginald, for that dignity; but the King insisted upon the election of Gray, then Bishop of Norwich, and sent certain of the Chapter to Rome in order to obtain the Pope's confirmation. Innocent, however, thought proper to set aside both these candidates; and, ordering the Monks to proceed to a fresh election, imposed upon their suffrages Cardinal Stephen Langton, an Englishman by birth, and a man of distinguished character and talents, but who was otherwise disagreeable to the King, as having passed the greater part of his life at Paris. John accordingly declared his resolution never to suffer Langton to set foot within his dominions; at the same time, he took vengeance upon the Monks of Canterbury, by sending his officers to expel them from their house, and by confiscating all their goods and possessions.† Meanwhile, he wrote to the Pope, remonstrating with him on his conduct in this affair, as totally subversive of the known rights of the English Crown, which he declared it to be his determination to maintain to the last drop of his blood; and reminding the Pontiff that the Romish See derived greater emoluments from his Kingdom than from all the other Transalpine States together. Innocent coolly and firmly answered, that the alliance of the Apostolic See was not less needful to the King than the King's friendship was to the Apostolic See; and warned him, that if he persisted in his present violence, he would live to repent of it.‡

The Kingdom of England laid under an Interdict.

A. D. 1208.

Matters soon came to extremities. The King continued to refuse either to restore the ejected Monks or to receive the Archbishop; and Innocent, after giving due warning of his purpose, commissioned the Bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester to lay the whole Kingdom under an Interdict, which was published on the 23d of March, 1208. The immediate effect was to put a stop throughout the Kingdom to the exercise of any Religious rite or function, with the exception of the Baptizing of children, and the administration of the Vaticum to such as were at the point of death.‡ Almost all the Clergy implicitly obeyed the Papal injunction, and the King retaliated by driving them from their houses and monasteries, and by seizing their possessions of every kind. This state of things continued for above five years, when the Pope, moved by the representations of the Clergy, sent the Sub-decan Pandulfo to endeavour to bring the King to terms. John, who began to feel the inconvenience of his situation, received the mission with more benignity than was expected. In the conference* which ensued, he consented to admit the Archbishop, and to reinstate the banished and dispossessed Clergy in their Churches and property; but the Legate further insisted upon an indemnity to them for their losses; which the King peremptorily refused to allow. Pandulfo, therefore, returned to France, whence he transmitted to the Pope an account of the failure of his negotiation. Innocent now determined to resort to the last extremity of Papal warfare. The King had been before excommunicated; he was now, by formal sentence, deposed from his throne; and his subjects were not merely absolved from their allegiance, but positively forbidden to obey or to hold any communication with him. Philippe Auguste, King of France, was charged with the execution of the sentence, and the Crown of England was promised to him and his successors, as the reward of his success in performing it. At the same time a Crusade was published by the Papal Nuncios throughout Europe, by which all persons were encouraged to assist the French King in his expedition against the King of England, by a promise of Indulgences and privileges similar to those which were offered to soldiers who had taken the Cross for the delivery of the Holy Sepulchre. The result of the transaction is well known to every reader of English History. John, finding himself on the brink of ruin, was fain at length to make terms with the Pope, by the total abandonment, not merely of all the existing matters of controversy, but even of the independence of his Crown itself, which he thenceforth consented to hold in avowed Vassalage to the Roman See. This concession was formally made on the 15th of May, 1213; on that day the King publicly took the Crown off his head, and delivered it to the Pope's representative, who did not return it until five days had elapsed.

The most extravagant visions of Papal ambition seem to have been realized in this transaction, in which a Prince, who, by the extent of his territories, might be considered as among the mightiest in Europe, was brought into avowed subjection to the See of Rome. But though powerful in dominion, John at the same time was weak in that which alone could have made his territorial sovereignty available, the affection of his subjects. To them he was almost universally an object both of contempt and hatred; a circumstance of which Innocent was perfectly aware; and to which, aided as he was by the ambitious views of the King of France, he was chiefly indebted for the success of his policy. At the same time, it was apparent that the cooperation and obedience of a Body so numerous and wealthy as the Clergy, possessing, as they did, all the Learning of the times, and exercising, through their functions, so positive an influence over the minds of the people, must afford Eccelesiastical History of the Thirteenth Century.

King John is formally deposed. A. D. 1212.

Total submission of the King of England, who becomes a Vassal of the See of Rome. A. D. 1213.

General remarks on these transactions.

* See Collier's Eccelesiastical History, book v. cent. xiii. for a very minute account of these transactions.

† Matthew Paris, ad ann. 1207, p. 222.

‡ Ibid. p. 223.

§ Ibid. p. 224.

|| Ibid. p. 226. See also Collier, Eccelesiastical History, book v. p. 415. It does not appear that the Interdict was universally observed by the Clergy. The Bishops of Durham, Winchester, and Norwich were among those who supported the King, and continued to officiate in their Dioceses.

* See Collier, Eccelesiastical History, book v. for a curious and detailed account of this conference, as extracted from the Annals, Monast. Burton. Matt. Paris's statement of the matter (p. 230.) is rather different.

History. a most formidable power to the Pope, in any instance in which they could be brought to concur strenuously and unanimously in his purposes.

IVth Lateran Council.
A. D.
1215.
Death of Innocent.
His character.

No Pontiff ever availed himself of these means of domination with more skill or boldness than he of whom we are now writing; and, accordingly, under none was the power of the Apostolical See ever carried to a greater height. The last transactions, which more particularly distinguished his Pontificate, were the deposition of the Count of Toulouse for his protection of the Albigensian Heretics, (1214), and the holding of the IVth Lateran Council. Innocent himself did not long survive the breaking up of the Council. He died on the 16th of January, 1216, in the nineteenth year of a reign distinguished, perhaps, beyond any other in the Papal Annals, for the success, as well as the audacity, of its undertakings. Whatever may be thought of the justice of these enterprises, in his private character Innocent appears irreproachable. Matthew Paris,* indeed, inveighs against his avarice, and instances the sums which he extorted from the Bishops who came to the Lateran Council, before he would give them permission to return to their Sees. But however questionable were these methods of levying money, in the use that he made of his revenues the Pontiff seems to have been perfectly disinterested. His contemporaries speak highly of his generosity; of the splendour of his charitable foundations, and of the liberality with which he yearly contributed a large portion of his income to the support and succour of the Churches of Palestine. They dwell, too, warmly on the integrity as well as the ability of his domestic administration; and they remark that he was not merely the most skillful politician and most able statesman of his time; but equally surpassed his contemporaries by his consummate accomplishment in all the studies appropriate to his own profession.

On the day following that of the death of Innocent, the Cardinals unanimously elected, as his successor, Centius, a native of Rome, of the family of Savelli, who took the name of Honorius III. The recent death of Otho had left the young King of Sicily, Frederic, in undisputed possession of the Empire; accordingly, he was crowned at Rome by the hands of the Pope, in November, 1220, at which time he entered into a solemn engagement to undertake, in person, an expedition for the relief of the Holy Land. The delays which he constantly interposed for the fulfilment of that promise, and some disputes which took place respecting the nomination to Sicilian Bishoprics, considerably disturbed the good understanding which was thus auspiciously begun between the Prince and Pontiff; but they did not come to an open rupture. Honorius died on the 18th of March, 1227; and was succeeded by Ugolino de' Segni, a near relation of Innocent III., who assumed the tiara under the name of Gregory IX. The whole reign of this Pontiff was embittered by his continual quarrels with the Emperor, and we find him at length sinking under the disasters, both public and private, which his violence had brought upon himself. He died in August, 1241. His successor, Celestin IV., did not survive his election more than eighteen days. An interval of nearly two years followed before the circumstances of the times allowed of a sufficient number of Cardinals to meet; when their choice fell upon Annibale de' Fieschi, a noble Genoese, of distinguished talent and learning, and who was reputed the best Canon Lawyer of the Age.* He took the name of Innocent IV. We need not repeat our narrative of his continued struggle with the Empire, of his retirement to France, and of his assembling of the 1st General Council of Lyon.

Innocent died at Naples in 1254; of grief, it is said, for the loss of the Battle of Nocera. He was succeeded by Alexander IV.: like his predecessor a man of virtue and of distinguished learning; but whose reign was IV. similarly cut short by the vexations and anxieties incident to the course of quarrel in which he was engaged with the House of Suabia. He died in May, 1261. One peculiarity in the administration of this Pope was his refusal to create a single Cardinal during the course of it; a system which he had adopted with the view, it is said, of lessening the chances of dissension among that Body. At the time of his death, therefore, the College consisted of only eight individuals. These, however, unable to agree in the election of one of their own Body as a successor, after more than a month of discussion, chose John, Patriarch of Jerusalem, a Frenchman of very humble parentage, but remarkable for his piety and virtue, who happened at that time to be at Viterbo. He reigned for little more than three years under the name of Urban IV.†

His successor, Clement IV., was also a Frenchman by birth, and equally with himself distinguished for his piety and disinterestedness.‡ Nevertheless, he followed up with unabated vigour the project so long and anxiously entertained by his predecessors for the final expulsion of the House of Suabia from Naples and Sicily; and it was during his Pontificate that Charles of Anjou made himself master of those Kingdoms. After the death of Clement, which happened in November, 1268, the Cardinals not being able to agree among themselves for the election of a successor, the See continued vacant for nearly three years. At length the Magistrates were compelled to shut up the electors, and starve them into a decision by the gradual diminution of their food. It was in this way that, on the 1st of September, 1271, they were brought to consent to choose Theobald of Placentia, Archdeacon of Liege, who was at that time in Palestine, in the train of the English Prince, Edward Longshanks.

He took the name of Gregory X. As he felt the strongest interest in the recovery of the Holy Land, and considered that the reunion of the Greek and Latin Churches was, more than any thing else, likely to facilitate the accomplishment of that object, one of his first measures was to summon a General Council, to which the Greek Emperor was invited to send Ambassadors.

* He is the author of the Aggestus in the Five Books of the Decretals; a Work which long continued to be classical in the Schools of Canon Law. He was also a marked patron of learned men; and it was at his request that our Countryman, Alexander Hale, surnamed the Irrefragable, wrote his celebrated Commentary upon Peter Lombard. See his Life by Nicolo de' Curcio, sub fine.

† It was during this Pontificate that the Festival of Corpus Christi was first established; but Historians differ as to the circumstances which more immediately suggested its celebration. See Bower, vol. vi. p. 269, and Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 109.

‡ His name was Le Gros. A letter which he wrote to his nephew upon his accession to the tiara, and in which he discourages in the strongest manner any expectations on the part of his relatives of advancement or favour from him, has been deservedly celebrated. Raynaldus, Annals, ad ann. 1265.

Ecclesiastical History of the XIIIth Century.
Innocent
IV.

A. D.
1243.
Alexander
IV.
A. D.
1254.

Urban IV.
A. D.
1261.

Clement IV.
A. D.
1265.

Gregory X.
A. D.
1271.

General Council of Lyon.
A. D.
1274.

History. This Council met at Lyon in May, 1274, comprehending a greater number of deputies from all parts of Europe than had ever before been assembled on a similar occasion.* Its proceedings will be given afterwards, but we must here mention one of the most remarkable; we mean the celebrated Constitution, by which, with a view to prevent a recurrence of the evils consequent on the delay which had taken place in the last election, it was enacted that on the death of the Sovereign Pontiff, the Cardinals should be shut up in Conclave, and cut off from all external communication, until two-thirds of their suffrages were combined in favour of some one of the candidates† This Constitution, which was extremely unpopular with the Cardinals, was suspended by the two immediate successors of Gregory; but it was revived by Celestin V., and with some slight modifications has continued in force ever since.

Innocent V.
Adrian V.
John XXI.
A. D.
1275.

Nicholas III.
A. D.
1277.
Martin IV.
A. D.
1281.

Honorius IV.
A. D.
1284.

Gregory died in January, 1275. Pietro di Taranto, his successor, reigned only five months, under the name of Innocent V. Ottoboni de' Fieschi, who took the name of Adrian V., was unanimously elected to succeed him; but the state of his health at the time hardly allowed him to hope for a longer reign than his predecessor had enjoyed; and when his relatives came to offer their congratulations on his exaltation, "I wish," said he, "you had found me a Cardinal in good health, instead of a dying Pope." Accordingly he filled the chair little more than five weeks. The Pontificate of his successor John XXI. (a Portuguese by birth) did not extend beyond eight months, when he was killed by the fall of a new building in his Palace at Vierbo. This Pope had formally abrogated the Constitution of Gregory respecting the Conclave; and in consequence, more than six months elapsed after his death before the College agreed to elect in his room the Cardinal Caietano Ursini, who took the name of Nicholas III.‡ He died in August, 1280; and another vacancy of half a year occurred before his place was filled by Simon de Brie, a Frenchman, who had for many years been attached to the Church of St. Martin at Tours, and thence took the name of Martin IV. It was during his Pontificate that the celebrated massacre took place which has retained the name of the Sicilian Vespers; and which Martin, as a Countryman and friend of Charles of Anjou, took every method of avenging. The King of Aragon, who had obtained possession of the Island of Sicily, was not merely excommunicated, but declared to have forfeited his hereditary Kingdoms in Spain. Little, however, had been done towards the execution of this sentence at the time of the death of its author, which took place in March, 1284. On the day following that of his decease, the College unanimously elected Cardinal Jacopo Sabelli, who ascended the Papal Throne under the name of Honorius IV.

The new Pontiff zealously espoused the cause of Charles of Anjou, and had formed a plan for a general league of all Christian Princes against the House of Aragon, when his purposes were cut short by death in April, 1287. He died in the new Palace which he had built on Mount Aventine, a part of the City which is commonly unhealthy in Summer; as was fatally experienced by the Cardinals, when, agreeably to the Constitution of Gregory, they assembled in the same place for the election of a successor; nearly all were taken seriously ill, and six or seven of them died. Upon this occurrence the College separated, and did not again meet till February in the ensuing year, 1288; when their choice fell upon the Cardinal Jeronimo of Ascoli, of the Franciscan Order, who, after thrice refusing the tiara, was at length brought to accept it, under the name of Nicholas IV. His Pontificate did not extend beyond four years; for his death took place in April, 1292, hastened, it was believed, by the recent loss of the City of Ptolemais, and the final expulsion of the Christians from the Holy Land, in consequence of that event. Short as was his reign, however, it enabled him to leave behind a distinguished reputation, as well for humility and disinterestedness, as for the zeal and munificence with which he promoted the improvement and decoration of Rome, and encouraged and rewarded the cultivation of every branch of Civil and Theological Literature. One of his successors, Sixtus V., while yet a Cardinal, erected a splendid monument to his memory in the Church of Sta. Maria Maggiore, on which, among other praises, it is said of him, "That men of Virtue and Learning were his only relations."

After the death of Nicholas, an interval of two years and three months occurred before the College could agree in their choice of a successor. At length (July, 1294) they determined to give their suffrages to Pietro di Morona, a poor Hermit of Calabria, of extraordinary sanctity and austerity of life; who after evincing the greatest reluctance, was in a manner compelled to accept the tiara, under the name of Celestin V. Of his short Pontificate and final abdication* we have already sufficiently spoken, and the only act in which he appears to deserve notice is the Institution of a Religious Order under the name of the Congregation of St. Damian: it was afterwards called the Order of Celestines, under which denomination, we believe, it still exists. Benedetto Gaetano, the turbulent Boniface VIII., succeeded him. His quarrel with France, which forms the leading event of his Pontificate, has been already so fully detailed, that nothing more need be added here. He died at Rome on the 11th of October, 1303.

Such is the series of the Bishops of Rome for the XIIIth Century; beginning with Innocent and closing with Boniface, it was not likely that either the power or the pretensions of the Papal See would abate any thing of its arrogance or violence in the hands of such a succession; and, in fact, in no other period of its History was the supremacy of the Popedom in temporal, almost as much as in spiritual, matters less questioned or resisted. The Pontiffs, indeed, would naturally find more or less difficulty in the practical assertion of that paramount authority, according to the circumstances of the particular case, or the temper or situation of stated History of the XIIIth Century.

Enri-

Nicholas IV.
A. D.
1288.

Celestin V.
A. D.
1294.

Boniface VIII.
A. D.
1294.

Remarks on the Pope's power in this Century.

* Raynaldus, Annales, ad ann. 1274.

† Cocchia, tom. xi. p. 355.

‡ It was this Pope who, in the first year of his Pontificate, obtained from the Emperor Rodolph of Hapsburg a grant, or, as it was called, a restitution of all the concessions of territory said to have been made by former Emperors to the Holy See, the demesne of which was thus augmented by the whole Exarchate of Ravenna and the Province of Romagna. Raynaldus, Annales, ad ann. 1278.

* In order to prevent all difficulty as to the legality of the step he was about to take, he previously issued a Constitution, which formally authorized a Pope to resign, and the College of Cardinals to accept his resignation,—a measure of which, it has been observed, he might have spared himself the trouble of, as no one of his successors has as yet thought fit to take advantage of it. See Fleury, (Hist. Eccles. tom. xviii. p. 589.) the whole of whose account of the rise, abdication, and subsequent death of Celestin is particularly interesting.

History. the Princes with whom they had to deal. But the principle itself of the inherent supremacy of the Holy See, seems to have been almost universally admitted. Some might consider that the authority of a General Council was superior in the last resort; yet, as we have seen, those Assemblies, called together at the pleasure of the Pope, and adopting without objection or discussion whatever enactments he chose to propose to them, were in fact become little other than instruments for the promotion and sanction of his usurpations. It is observable, that the assertors and possessors of this unparalleled sway were commonly decrepit old men, sprung frequently from the lowest ranks of the people, and unfurnished with fleets or armies, or any temporal or fleshly means whatever for the vindication of their extravagant pretensions. The History of Mankind, we apprehend, affords no second example of so complete a triumph of mind in the subjugation of the human will to its purposes; and we should sympathize more strongly with its triumph in this instance, were it not for the disgust with which we necessarily regard the perversion of Religious truth and principle to the purposes of temporal ambition.

the ruin of the Christian Cause in the East, must be considered as the chief external event by which the Church was affected during this Century. That the interest which those enterprises excited had been so long sustained, and that the enterprises themselves were so repeatedly renewed, is exclusively ascribable to the strong and predominant anxiety which, up to the very last, prevailed in the Papal Court for their success. This feeling on the part of the Pontiffs has been commonly attributed to interested motives, but, as it seems to us, without sufficient proof. In truth, the temporal advantage to be obtained by the Romish See by the accomplishment of the object in view, was altogether and utterly disproportionate to that intensity of solicitude which the Popes manifested for its accomplishment; and the continual disappointment of which is known to have so worked on the minds of some of them as to have accelerated their decease. It is certain, too, that to the charges and sacrifices which the undertaking demanded, the Pontiffs, so far as their means allowed, supplied their full proportion and share. We think it more probable that the declared motives of their interest on this subject were the true ones; that they really believed the honour of Religion and the glory of God to be concerned in the rescue of the Holy Sepulchre from the hands of Infidels; and, perhaps, considered that its conquest would be the first step for the re-establishment of Christianity in the East. If such were the hopes originally entertained by the Pontiffs, as to the probable result of these expeditions, the actual event should have early and completely undeceived them. The Kingdom of Jerusalem, as it was left by the first and only successful one of the Crusades, consisted merely of that city, and of a few neighbouring villages. Even of this little territory the population was made up either of Saracens, or of Christians who were hardly better disposed towards their Frankish brethren than the Muslims themselves; and the whole force which remained with Godfrey to secure his conquest did not exceed three hundred cavalry and two thousand foot soldiers. With such means it was hardly possible for the Christian cause to retain the footing it had regained in the East; and any purpose of extending its limits by arms was obviously hopeless.*

The conquest of Constantinople by the French and Venetians in the IVth Crusade, and the consequent establishment of a Latin Emperor and Patriarch in the Imperial city seemed at one time to promise a consummation not less flattering to Papal ambition than would have been afforded by the most complete success of the Christian armies in Palestine. It seems clear, however, that Innocent III. gave no encouragement whatever to this enterprise on the part of the Crusading army; and that, on the contrary, he did all that lay in his power to divert them from it; as manifestly inconsistent with the proper object and spirit of their undertaking. True it is, that Innocent could not have anticipated that the attempt would have been so easy of achievement as it afterwards proved: and it is also true that when in fact it had so unexpectedly succeeded, both Innocent and his successors readily availed themselves to the utmost of the means which it presented for extending the jurisdiction of the Romish Church. We mean only to impress the probable conclusion, that no such view entered into

Ecclesiastical History of the XIIIth Century.
General remarks upon the Crusades.

Their inadequate results.

Conquest of Constantinople by the Latins.

Abuses to which it tended. The power which the Papal See had thus singularly acquired was inevitably exposed to abuse. The instances which have most excited the indignation, and called forth the rebuke of Ecclesiastical Writers, have been the attempts, so often renewed by the Pontiffs, of interference with the sovereign rights of their contemporary Monarchs. We are far from approving of such encroachments; but considering what those Princes commonly were in respect to education and character, as well as the purposes for which they usually exercised their various prerogatives, we confess we are inclined to doubt whether it was in this respect that the usurpations of the Roman See were chiefly to be deprecated. A worse evil, we think, consisted in the system of corruption and simony, by which the power so generally assumed by the Pope of disposing, under various pretexts and pleas, of almost all the offices of the Church, was perverted to the gain of the Romish treasury.* Practices of a similar nature were too commonly resorted to by the Legates for their own individual profit; and, indeed, the corruptions and disturbances to which the presence of these representatives of the Pontiffs almost invariably gave rise in the various States to which they were despatched, constitute one of the most bitter subjects of complaint on the part of the Writers of that Age.†

Independently, however, of these less admitted resources of revenue and power, the Romish See, during the XIIIth Century, acquired a considerable and permanent accession of both. This was chiefly owing to the firmness and perseverance of Popes Innocent III. and Nicholas IV. who, as we have seen, succeeded in exacting from the Emperors an acknowledgment of their entire sovereignty, and in extending that jurisdiction over nearly the whole of the territory which at present constitutes the dominion of the Ecclesiastical State.

The unfavourable termination of the Crusades, and

* See, for instances of this and similar abuses, Anthony Wood's Antiq. Oxon. tom. i. p. 148, 201, 202.

† See, in particular, Matthew Paris, Historia Magna, passin, but particularly p. 659. See also Fleury, Discours II. sur l'Histoire Ecclesiastique, for some very able and impartial remarks on the inconsequences arising to the Metropolis and Diocesan administrations from the abuse of the Legatine power.

* See the Abbé Fleury's Vth Discourse, at the beginning of the XVIIIth volume of the Histoire Ecclesiastique, for a very satisfactory review of the origin and results of these expeditions.

History. the original scheme of the Crusaders themselves, though we know it was always suspected by the Byzantine Government.

Negotiations for the re-union of the two Churches.

The Greeks regained possession of Constantinople in the year 1261; and the temporary occupation of it by the Latins, in fact only sharpened the existing animosities of the two parties, and rendered the differences between them more irreconcilable than ever. The Emperor Michael Palæologus, indeed, dreading lest the Pope should instantly proclaim a new Crusade for the restoration of his jurisdiction in the East, was most anxious to prevent any such attack, by originating measures for reconciling the two Churches. Accordingly he early opened a communication with Rome, and with the view of facilitating the accomplishment of his object, persuaded the Patriarch Joseph to abdicate his office, and elevated the celebrated John Veccus, the Treasurer of the Church, in his place. Veccus was a man of distinguished ability and learning, who had been originally most averse to the proposed reconciliation, but who had been induced, by some unexplained motive, to change his opinion. Pope Clement IV. met the proposals of the Emperor with no disposition to relax in the least upon any one of the topics constituting the difference between the two Churches. He sent to Michael (1267) a profession of Faith* in which every disputed point, particularly those of the procession from the Son, the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, and the primacy of the Pope, were re-affirmed in the most distinct manner; and he added, (with reference to a suggestion which had been made by the Emperor,) that it was needless to call a Council for the purpose of examining those Articles, but that if the Greeks would admit them, he would convene such an Assembly, for the ratification, on that ground, of the union of the two Churches.

Council of Lyons.
A. D.
1274.

This accordingly was a principal reason for the assembling by Pope Gregory X. of the General Council of Lyons in 1274. At the fourth session of that Council, July 6th, the Deputies both of the Emperor Michael and of thirty-five of the chief Greek Metropolitans and Prelates, declared in their names, a full and entire acceptance of a Confession of Faith, substantially the same with that which Pope Clement had drawn up; stipulating merely that the Church might be allowed to repeat the Creed in public in the way that it had hitherto been accustomed to do; and that the usages previously existing, and which were contrary neither to Scripture nor to approved tradition, should be allowed to continue. Upon this basis the union was agreed and sworn to;† but practically a great part of the Greek Clergy paid little regard to it, notwithstanding the efforts of the new Patriarch, John Veccus, who laboured most earnestly for its completion. Some further negotiations for that purpose took place under Popes John XXI. and Nicholas III., but the effect of them was rather to complicate than to smooth away the existing difficulties, inasmuch that Martin IV. went so far as publicly to excommunicate Michael as a schismatic. (1280.) This sentence so enraged the Emperor that he was upon the point of coming to an open rupture in consequence; but he forbore, and contented himself with allowing an entire freedom to the Greek Clergy to attack the Pope, as well as their own Patriarch Veccus for his subserviency to the interests of Rome.

The union is ratified.

This state of things continued till the death of Michael Palæologus, which occurred in December, 1283. Almost the first act of his son and successor Andronicus was publicly to repeal the union between the two Churches; and indeed, so great was his hostility to the authors of that compact, that he withheld from his father's funeral the honours ordinarily belonging to the performance of the Imperial obsequies. Veccus was immediately deposed, and Joseph replaced in the Patriarchal chair. In the following year a Council was held at Constantinople in which Veccus was condemned, and the greater part of the Prelates who had adopted his party were deprived of their Sees. Veccus himself was relegated as a prisoner to the Castle of St. George in Bithynia, where he died soon after, maintaining to the last the opinions and principles to which he had become so late a convert.

This was the last attempt for the reunion of the Greek and Latin Churches which was attended with the slightest success. Even that success, partial and temporary as it proved to be, was, as we have seen, ascribable solely to the political position in which the Greek Emperor found himself upon the recovery of his European dominions. Accordingly, when the terror of the Crusading expeditions had ceased, the measures which had been adopted merely under the apprehension of their hostility, fell of themselves; and the schism between the two Churches became wider and more hopeless than ever.

The number of Provincial Councils held in the Western Churches in the course of this Century, was unusually great. They seem for the most part to have had in view, by their regulations, to effect three great objects: 1st, the reformation of the Church generally, by the suppression of abuses and the restoration and enforcement of discipline; 2dly, the improvement and explication of the Canon Law and the vindication of the rights and immunities of the Clergy; and 3dly, the condemnation of Heretical doctrines, and the punishment of those who promulgated or favoured them.

Of Councils called General, there were three. The first of these was the IVth Lateran Council, which met at Rome in November, 1215, under the summons of Pope Innocent III. No less than four hundred and twelve Bishops, and nearly eight hundred Abbots and Priors appeared in person at this Council, together with a great many proxies or deputies of absent Bishops and of Chapters; a Body of dignitaries which certainly might be considered as affording no inadequate representation of the sense of the Church at that period. Yet nothing can be more uncertain than any such construction of their proceedings. At the first full meeting of the Members, a series of seventy Canons or Capitularies was submitted to them by the Pope; all prepared and drawn up by himself.* These were read to the Assembly; no semblance of debate or deliberation followed; the Members of the Council preserved a respectful silence, which was taken for an intimation of assent, and in this way the Canons in question became laws of the Catholic Church. The Decrees of this Council, indeed, are considered as having, beyond any preceding one, effected and promoted the completion and perfection of the Canon Law, particularly as regards the regulation

Ecclesiastical History of the XIIIth Century.
Its origin by the Emperor Andronicus.

Provincial Councils in this Century; their objects.

General Councils.
I. The IVth Lateran.
A. D. 1215.

* Raynaldus, Annales, ad ann. 1267, n. 72.
† Council, tom. xi. p. 959, 967.

* See Matthew Paris, ad ann. 1215. His words are, Facto prius ab ipso Papa exhortationis sermone, recitata sunt in pleno Concilio capitula septuaginta, quæ alius placuissent, alius videbantur esse iusta.

History. of Ecclesiastical proceedings; and as such it became so much in esteem among Caonists, as to be commonly quoted in their writings under the name of the Great Council.

Doctrines of Transubstantiation and Auricular Confession.

The following are among some of the more important of these Canons.* The 1st chapter contains an ample confession of the Faith as held by the Catholic Church, including a specific statement of the doctrine of the Transubstantiation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist. and the 11th† appoints the methods to be taken for the suppression and punishment of all who should pervert or renounce the Catholic Faith as thus declared. These are as extreme and ample as the Inquisition itself could desire; and indeed they seem to have constituted the ground and justification of the forms of procedure which were shortly after adopted by that execrable tribunal. By this Canon it was ordained not merely that all Heretics should be delivered up to the Secular power after condemnation, but that all persons suspected of Heresy should at once be anathematized, unless they gave proof of their innocence; and after the lapse of a twelve-month should be condemned. All lords or superiors were to be obliged, under the penalty of Excommunication, and ultimately of Deposition, to extirpate all Heretics or excommunicated persons, within their territories. Moreover it was declared that all who entertained, protected, or supported Heretics, should be excommunicated; and if they did not within the year make satisfaction, that they should be declared infamous; should be deprived of every Civil right and of the use of the Sacraments; and after their death be refused Christian burial. The ferocity, so to speak, of these enactments sufficiently indicates the alarm with which the Heads of the Church already contemplated the progress of the new opinions in various parts of France and the Low Countries. The next eighteen Canons refer chiefly to the manners of the Clergy, and contain a number of very wholesome regulations for the correction of abuses and enforcement of discipline. The XX1st is the celebrated Chapter§ which enjoins that all the faithful of both sexes who have arrived at years of discretion, shall confess their sins at least once a year to their own Curate; that they shall fulfil the penance imposed on them, and receive the Sacrament at least every Easter; and this under pain of exclusion from the Church while they live, and the being deprived of Christian burial at their death.

This Council, numerous as it was, did not sit long. The Bishops, in fact, finding that they were convened merely to give sanction to whatever Canons it might please the Pope to suggest, asked leave one after another to depart; * so that within little more than a month it was almost entirely broken up.

A General Council was held at Lyon in 1245, by Pope Innocent IV., the immediate object of which was the Excommunication of the Emperor Frederic. The other matters transacted in this Assembly were likewise for the most part political: these were principally the succours to be afforded to the Latin Emperor of Constantinople against the Greeks; the defence of Germany against the Tartars; and the relief of the Holy Land. Several Canons also were decreed for the improvement of the rules and procedures of the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Another General Council took place, as we have seen, at Lyon in the year 1274† It was summoned by Pope Gregory X., who, in his Bull of Indiction, assigns three purposes as grounds for its convocation. 1. the reconciliation of the Greek to the Roman Church; 2. the assistance to be given to the Holy Land; 3. the reformation of the discipline of the Church and of the manners of the Clergy. The Latin Patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch, about five hundred Bishops, and more than a thousand Abbots and other inferior dignitaries, attended this Council, which was held under the presidency of the Pope himself. We have already described the transactions of this Assembly so far as they refer to the first of the above-mentioned objects of its assembling: with respect to the second, the Pope prevailed upon the Clergy to give up the tenth of their revenues for six years for the relief of the Holy Land; and for the furtherance of the third, viz. the reformation of Ecclesiastical discipline, thirty new Canons were decreed, none of which, however, appear to contain any thing particularly deserving of remark.

The Sects or Heresies which prevailed in this Century for the most part took their rise in the one preceding; under our account of which period the origin and nature of them have been described. Of these the Waldensian and Albigensian Churches form by far the most considerable. We have already given a general statement of the opinions and tenets of these singular and oppressed people, who seem indisputably to have anticipated the promulgation of the greater part of those truths, the assertion of which constitutes the chief glory of the Reformation of Luther.§ The accounts which we have of them, are derived almost wholly from their adversaries; as such, of course, we can place but a very qualified confidence in their statements; but it is clear, even from these alone, that it was the opposition they offered to the corruptions of doctrine and practice prevailing in the Church and Clergy of that Age, which formed the distinguishing character of the Sects in question. Among the specific objects of their reprobation are to be found almost all the superstitions and mummeries which,

Ecclesiastical History of the XIIIth Century.

II. General Council of Lyon.
A. D. 1245.

III. Second General Council of Lyon.
A. D. 1274.

Sects and Heresies of this Age.
Waldensian and Albigensian.

* Concil. tom. xi. p. 142.

† The first that had been thus distinctly and authoritatively declared. Previously a certain degree of latitude had been allowed to opinions on this mysterious subject; and the doctrine of Berenger was still held and avowed by many without any necessary impeachment of their orthodoxy.

‡ The second Canon of this Council especially condemns the doctrine of Joachim, the famous Abbot of Fiore, in Calabria, on the subject of the Trinity; viz. that the three Persons, though of one nature and substance, are not the same thing; which he had so explained as to seem to reduce the consubstantiality of the three Persons to a mere specific unity. This Abbot Joachim died at an advanced age in the first or second year of the XIIIth Century, and was generally revered as an inspired person, on account of the kind of prophecies with which he strewed his publications, and many of which, referring to the political transactions of his times, proved afterwards to be true. His Works, which are numerous and consist chiefly of Commentaries on the Bible, were printed at Venice, in fol. 1516.

§ Omnia utraque veritas, &c. See Concil. ib. The duty of Auricular Confession thus imposed may likewise be considered as a new doctrine of the Church; though it had been before very generally considered as a wholesome rule and practice to be observed by the Faithful.

* A permission which, we are assured by Matt. Paris, they obtained only by the payment to the Pope of considerable sums, which they were obliged to take up, upon sufficiently hard terms, of the money-changers at Rome. Matt. Paris, Hist. ad ann. 1216.

† Concil. tom. xi. p. 955. Raynald. ad ann. 1274, n. 1.

‡ Concil. ibid.

§ See the writings of Allix and Milner upon this interesting subject.

History.

during the last six Centuries, had overgrown the fabric of the Romish Church. On the other hand, it may easily be believed that in their war against these abuses, they should in some instances have extended their hostility to parts of the existing system which were better warranted either by Scripture or sound tradition; such excess being nothing more than the ordinary result of human impetuosity under similar circumstances of excitement and zeal.

Doctrines of these Sects.

The principle of separation on the part of these Sectaries, as we have before had occasion to observe, was a strict and literal interpretation of the doctrine and precepts of the Gospel. Upon this ground they were early and readily led to reject the greater portion of the rites and practices of the Romish Church; together with the invocation of Saints, the worshipping of relics, and the doctrines of commutable penance, transubstantiation, and purgatory. Together with these, however, they are accused of annulling all the Sacraments, including even Baptism and the Eucharist; but this imputation is hardly supported on sufficient grounds. There seems, indeed, reason to believe that they objected to infant baptism; and in the Lord's Supper they held that the consecration might be effected by any one of clean heart and hands as well as by a Priest; but, however erroneous might be their tenets on these points, the inference from them is not a necessary one, that they deemed lightly or irreverently of the sacramental rites themselves. A more serious error is that of which they are accused, and apparently with foundation, of rejecting the necessity of any established succession of Priesthood at all; an error into which they were evidently misled by the spectacle of the irregularities and disorders into which the abuse of the true doctrine had impelled the Clergy of that Age. Some of them even denounced all worldly possessions in the hands of Ministers; and contended that since the time of Sylvester, when "the poison of temporalities" first entered the Hierarchy, the Church of Rome had ceased to be the Church of Christ, and therefore was wholly destitute of proper authority over his followers.

Crusade against the Albigenses.

It is easily conceivable that the Court of Rome would lose no time, and omit no means, in effecting the extirpation of opinions like these. Among the very first acts of Pope Innocent III. (1198) was the mission of two Legates to the South of France, armed with authority to use every means, whether spiritual or fleshly, for the speedy suppression of them.* This mission was shortly followed by the declaration of a formal Crusade against their partisans, and more particularly Raymond, Count of Toulouse, who had made himself remarkable, if not as the follower of the new teachers, at least as their protector and friend. Of the progress and events of this war a more particular account will be found under our head of French History. After a long and obstinate struggle, the Papal cause, backed as it was by the arms of the King of France, obtained a complete triumph; Raymond VII., Earl of Toulouse, was compelled to purchase Peace by giving his daughter and the reversion of his States to the French King's brother; and by authorizing the formal establishment of the Tribunal of Inquisition throughout his territories.

Origin of the Inquisition.

It is from that period that we are to date the regular establishment of this formidable Tribunal. Originally, the term of Inquisitors was ascribed to certain Missionaries despatched by the Holy See to the districts reported to be infected with Heresy, for the purpose of preaching to the people and recalling them to the Faith by the ordinary methods of exhortation; upon the failure of which, however, they were not merely empowered to resort to the artillery of anathema and excommunication, but had further authority to call upon the Secular arm to assist in carrying such sentence into execution. This is obvious from several Letters which Innocent III., in the first year of his Pontificate, (1198,) addressed to the Bishops of Languedoc and of Gascony. In one of these he especially recommends to their care the two Cistercian Brothers Guy and Rayner, whom he begs them to assist in their labours for the conversion of the Heretics, and to observe inviolably whatsoever they should ordain for the punishment of the obstinate and refractory. His words are, "We command all the Princes, Counts, and Noblemen of your Province to assist them strenuously in the same cause; so that after Brother Rayner shall have pronounced sentence of excommunication against them, the Lords should confiscate their lands, banish them from their territories, and punish severely such as should dare to remain." And Rayner was authorized to call upon them to do this under penalty of Excommunication and Interdict to be levelled against themselves.†

It is upon the ground of his having instituted these missions of research, and of the power with which he armed them, by the IIIrd Canon of the Lateran Council, of calling upon the Secular force to execute any sentence they might pronounce, that Innocent III. is generally considered as the founder of the Inquisition. We must observe, however, that it was not until somewhat later that the Tribunal, properly so called, was regularly and permanently established. This part of the institution dates strictly from the time of Gregory IX., who in the year 1233‡ discharged the Bishops of France from the task of detecting and punishing Heresy, and intrusted that duty to the Dominican Friarsalone. In every City in which these Monks possessed a Convent, certain assessors were appointed, under the title of Inquisitors of Heretical Pravity, who proceeded to take judicial cognizance (if that term may be applied to a system so completely contradictory to every ordinary principle of criminal procedure) not only of all who were accused, but who were even suspected of Heresy. Not without pain must it be added, that Louis IX. of France, far from checking the tyranny of these proceedings against his unoffending subjects, supported and countenanced them to the utmost of his power, and his Ministers of Justice were expressly authorized to commit to torture and the stake whatever persons these Inquisitors should deliver up to them for that purpose.‡ Louis has been revered as a Saint, and by much of his character was less undeserving of that distinction than many with whom he has shared it. It is perhaps less remarkable that his contemporary, the Emperor Frederic II., who was commonly believed not merely to entertain, but to have published,‡ the most

Eccenial History of the XIIIth Century.

Letter of Pope Innocent III.

Institution of the Tribunal.

Supported by St. Louis and I re-nc II.

* Epist. Inn. lib. i. ep. 94. 165.

† See Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 117. who has sufficiently cleared up this point.

‡ The Decree by which St. Louis gave sanction to this extremity of tyranny, is well known in French Jurisprudence under the name of "Cepentes," from the word with which it begins. It was issued in the year 1229. See Mosheim, as before.

§ We allude to his alleged concern in the composition of the

* See Epist. Inn. lib. i. epist. 81. 94.

History. impious opinions, and who spent his life in an incessant quarrel with the See of Rome, made no difficulty in authorizing the adoption of measures of similar, or, if possible, of greater atrocity, against such of his subjects as were brought under the suspicion of Heresy.

Other doctrines there were prevailing in this Century, and denounced as heretical by the Church, but which were not rendered of sufficient importance, either by the number or credit of the followers of them, to detain us long. One Sect among others began to spread itself in France, Italy, and Germany, under the name of Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit. They took their name from the words made use of by St. Paul in the first part of the VIIIth Chapter of his Epistle to the Romans: upon their misconstruction of which passage they in part founded that claim to entire freedom and immunity from all secular or ecclesiastical jurisdiction which formed the distinguishing doctrine of their party; and their abuse of which practically led many of them, if contemporary writers may be believed, into the most disgusting disorder of life and conduct. Moreover they held certain fanatical opinions, approaching, so far as they have any meaning at all, to a kind of mystical Pantheism. Rejecting the ordinary observances and sacraments of the Church, they resolved all moral virtue as well as religious worship, into the cultivation of that habit of perfect abstraction from every object of sense, through which it was contended to be possible for a man to reunite himself to that universal Deity which, as they held, pervaded all things, and of which all human souls were but so many dissipated portions.*

Tradings. We read, too, in the writers of those times, of the Sect of the Stadings as having spread itself among the lower class of people, in several parts of Germany. What were the peculiar opinions of these people is known only from the accounts of the adversaries who tortured and burned them;† and whose testimony upon such a matter is evidently to be suspected. The famous Inquisitor, Conrad of Marpurg, particularly distinguished himself in the detection and punishment of these Heretics; of whom he is said to have sent a great many, and of all ranks, in the most summary manner to the stake. The severity and precipitation of his proceedings seem to have shocked even his own party; for when a Body of these alleged heretics, driven to despair, set upon and put him to death, (July, 1233,) the authorities, both ecclesiastical and secular, of the Country sufficiently evinced their sense of his ill-desert, by the lightness of the penance which they imposed on the authors of the deed.*

Somewhat later (about 1250) the party of Flagellants, or Whippers, made its appearance in Italy. These fanatics, however, cannot strictly be reckoned as a Sect, as their peculiarity consisted for the most part in the constant self-infliction of the punishment to which their name alludes, and which might so far be considered merely as an harmless excess of superstition; but the manner of their indulgence of it in public led to considerable disorders, and it was at last thought necessary to put a stop to it by Papal authority.†

The most remarkable circumstance in the internal History of the Church in the XIIIth Century is the foundation of the Mendicant Orders. Although at no period was the ascendancy of the Clergy more complete or more undisputed than at the present one, yet that very circumstance naturally tended to relax all the nerves of Ecclesiastical discipline. In proportion as the wealth, power, and immunities of the Clergy increased, in the same degree were all the motives and habits by which they were attached and restricted to the performance of their specific duties, in danger of corruption and disturbance. This was peculiarly the case with the regular Clergy; an institution vicious in its principle; and the several communities of which, by the acquisition of great riches and privileges, almost necessarily and immediately degenerated into the merest hotbeds of sloth and luxury. The Popes in general appear to have been fully awakened to the fact of this general dissolution of order and discipline on the part of the clerical body; and wherever their own interests or power were not immediately interested in the abuses, they commonly manifested a sufficient zeal for the correction of them. The enforcement of some reformation on these points formed, indeed, the principal object of most of the Canons decreed by the Councils, whether General or Provincial, which were assembled in the course of the present Century. But the evil was one which it was difficult either to remedy or to check by the effect of laws and regulations, however severe or searching. It resulted in a great degree from the very position itself of the Clergy; and the natural consequences of the disorder could be averted or palliated only by the introduction into the Body politic of the Church of a new principle of life and action, which might invigorate or revive its languid constitution.

That succour was seasonably found in the establishment of the Mendicant or Begging Orders. The Catholic writers themselves; appear to admit that the original hint of these institutions was derived from the practices and professions of the very Heretics whom they made it their first business to counteract and suppress. The Waldensian and Albigensian Sects, as we have seen, had adopted as their rule of life a strict and literal adherence to the precepts of the Gospel. With this view they professed to abandon all worldly possessions, and to lead a life of poverty, mortification, and incessant devotion. The impression which was in this way made upon the multitude, and the contrast which the heretical

Ecclesiastical History of the XIIIth Century.
Flagellants.

Origin of the Mendicant Orders.

famous book De Tribus Impostoribus: which Work, however, is now believed never to have existed at all.

* See Mosheim, Ecc. Hist. cent. xiii. ch. v. for a curious and detailed account of the opinions and conduct of the several subdivisions of this fanatical Sect; who were variously denominated Beghards by the populace in Flanders and Germany, and Beghines and Turlupins in France. It would seem that the doctrines taught by the famous Amalric of Bene, a student of Paris, who died at the beginning of this Century, were substantially the same with those we have just described. They were refuted by the University, and condemned by Pope Innocent; and Amalric was obliged to recant a short while before his death. Soon afterwards, several persons, calling themselves his disciples, published errors still more dangerous; as they persisted in spreading them, they were condemned in a Council held in 1209, and fourteen of them were sentenced to be burned. Amalric's bones were at the same time dug up, and thrown into the common sewer. See Dupin, tom. xi. ch. viii.

† See Raynaldus, Annales, ad ann. 1233, for a curious letter of Pope Gregory IX, addressed to Conrad of Marpurg and others, and containing the received opinion concerning the tenets and practices of these wretched people. The excess of horror and absurdity there imported to them is such, as, by its own internal improbability, to deprive the testimony of all belief.

* Fleury, Hist. Eccles. tom. xvii. p. 55.

† Dupin, vol. xi. ch. ix.

1 See in particular Dupin, Eccles. Hist. vol. xi. ch. x. Also Helyot, Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tom. iii. ch. iv.

History. leaders thus exhibited to the manners of that Hierarchy, whose corruption and luxury they impugned, was soon felt by the Catholics themselves; and whether from the contagion of example, from an ambition of similar distinction, or from the suggestion and contrivance of the higher powers, an order of men soon came forward in the Church, pretending to exemplify the perfection of the Christian life, on the strength of nearly the same austerities with those which were practised by the obnoxious sectaries themselves. It was, as might be expected, on the same scene, the borders of France and Spain, that these new performers first made their appearance.

Order of Poor Catholics.
Order of Preaching Friars, or Dominicans.

One of the earliest Orders of this kind which assumed the guidance of any common Rule, was that of the Poor Catholics, which was approved and confirmed as such by Innocent III.* In the year 1215 Dominic de Guzman, a Spaniard of noble birth, who had for some time past devoted himself with the utmost ardour to the suppression or conversion of Heretics, established, with the assistance of nine friends, an Order of Preaching Friars,† which was approved of in the following year by Pope Honorius III. In the first instance Dominic adopted for his Society the Rule of the Augustin Canons, aggravated with certain additional austerities; but in 1220, at a Chapter held at Bologna, he entirely altered the Constitution of his Order, and obliged the members of it to abandon all their possessions, and to take a vow of strict and unconditional poverty. Dominic died in the following year; but his Order soon spread itself throughout Europe; and as public preaching had been from the beginning a principal object of the institution, its members were long distinguished as well by their learning and eloquence, as by the zeal and austerity of their lives. Another and more formidable means of importance was afforded to them in the monopoly, so to speak, of the Inquisition. We have seen that the conduct and service of that odious tribunal was wholly committed to their charge. The founder was canonized by Pope Gregory IX. in the year 1235.

Order of Friars Minor, or Franciscans.

It was about the same time that the memorable Order of Friars Minor, or Franciscans, took its rise in Italy. John, otherwise called François, or Frenchman, from his early proficiency in the French language, was the son of Peter Bernardini, a merchant of the town of Assisi in Umbria, where he was born in the year 1182. His early inclination for a life of austerity and devotion was strongly opposed by his father, and it was not until his twenty-fifth year that he finally renounced all secular prospects and possessions, and determined to devote himself thenceforth to what he conceived to be the service of God. This purpose he fulfilled with unbroken constancy and consistency for the rest of his life, which was not prolonged beyond his forty-fifth year, when his constitution sank under the rigour of his incessant austerities; and however little we may approve of the particular direction which the superstition of the Age necessarily gave to his devotional propensities, it is impossible to mistake in the man himself, the witness of a spirit of the most heroic fortitude and self-denial.*

Francis had acquired only eleven disciples when he drew up for them a short Rule, the simplicity of which consisted in the total abnegation of every thing beyond the barest necessary for existence; and with this Rule, in the year 1210, he made a journey to Rome, in order to obtain the approbation and confirmation of the Pope. Innocent gave it, but by word of mouth only; and Francis now charged his followers to go and preach repentance in every city, throwing themselves wholly on the charity of strangers for their support. Such was the origin of this celebrated Order, which soon came to surpass every other both in its numbers and its importance; and which, together with the Dominicans, constituted for a very long period the chief stay and support of the Church of Rome.

It is plain that the circumstance which gave its peculiar efficiency to this new militia was the vow which the members took of absolute and unqualified poverty. By this, they were secured from all those temptations and distractions which had proved so fatal to the energies and the regularity of the other Religious Orders; at the same time they maintained their hold on the attachment and reverence of the people by the show of disinterestedness and mortification which such self-denial supposed; while the necessity they were under of continually going about for alms, brought them in incessant contact and converse with all ranks and classes of men. The Popes easily perceived how admirably such institutions were available for the extension and confirmation of their authority and influence. Accordingly the Mendicant Orders, particularly the Franciscans, were from the beginning the peculiar objects of their favour and encouragement. Privileges and immunities of every kind, and often most inconsistent with the rights of the more legitimate Orders of the Church, were unsparingly heaped upon them; their vow of humility and poverty was not considered any obstacle to their frequent attainment to the highest offices and preferments in the Church; and in every mission of a confidential or delicate nature their services seem to have been accepted preferably to those of any other class of candidates. The multiplication of these Friars accordingly was as rapid as it was extensive; before the middle of the Century they had spread over all Europe, and had established themselves with more or less predominance in almost every Capital or University.†

* See Helyot, tom. vii. for a full account of St. Francis; and of the various Orders which sprang from his institute. But the great authority in all matters relating to the Franciscan Order is the Annales Fratrum Minorum, 17 vols. in folio, by Luke Wadding, an Irish brother of the same rule, who died at Rome in 1655. He also published a Bibliotheca Ordinis Minorum, being a Catalogue Raisonné of the Franciscan writers.

† So early as the year 1228 the litigation began between the Dominicans and the University of Paris, concerning the exam which was made by the former to one of the theological chairs in that school, and which was resisted for nearly thirty years by the University, till decided in favour of the Mendicants by the imperial edict of Pope Alexander IV. It was in this dispute that the famous William de St. Amour, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, distinguished himself as the foremost advocate for the rights of the University, and

* Helyot, Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tom. iii. ch. iv.

† Id. tom. ii. ch. xxiv.

† It is admitted that Dominic borrowed this part of his institution from the Friars Minor of St. Francis; having assisted the founder at Assisi, where he is said to have beheld with admiration an assembly of above five thousand brethren, who, notwithstanding their vow and practice of absolute poverty, were yet in want of nothing. Id. tom. iii. p. 287.

§ Some writers (for example Mosheim) speak of him as having led a debauched and dissolute life in his youth; but this assertion is not confirmed by those who have more directly treated of his biography. See Wadding, and Helyot.

Historical History of the XIIIth Century.

Encouraged by the Popes.

History.
Controversies among the Mendicant Orders.

The services, however, which these two Orders afforded to the Church and the Pontiffs were not without their drawback. Much disturbance was occasioned by their quarrels with each other, and still more by the disgust which their interference naturally gave rise to on the part of all the other Orders of Ecclesiastical administration. But the circumstance which occasioned the most trouble and perplexity to the Popes was a division that broke out among the Franciscans themselves, concerning the precise interpretation of that part of the founder's Rule* which made a total abandonment of all worldly possessions absolutely obligatory upon all his followers. Some were in favour of a mitigation of this injunction; in which construction they were supported by Pope Gregory IX., who, in 1231, authorized by a formal Bull a considerable evasion of its rigour. Another Bull of Innocent IV., in 1245, allowed the Friars Minor to possess certain houses, furniture, utensils, books, &c.; and it was endeavoured to reconcile this permission with the Rule of the founder by declaring that the use only of these articles should belong to the Friars, but that the property of them should be vested solely in the sovereign Pontiff. A large number of the Order, who took to themselves the distinctive name of "Zealots" and "Spiritual," indignantly rejected this evasion of the founder's injunction, as well as the society of those of their brethren who consented to take advantage of it. The controversy was maintained with singular vehemence and bitterness throughout the rest of the Century. In 1279 Pope Nicholas III. attempted to put an end to it by a Bull† which was intended to be favourable to the spiritual party; but as it still allowed the use of certain necessary accommodations and chattels, it was far from giving satisfaction to those gloomy ascetics. On the accession of Pope Celestin V. they obtained from him a permission to form themselves into a separate community; but this act, like every other of the short Pontificate of Celestin, was annulled by his successor Boniface; when the singular obstinacy of these men in adhering to their own views of mortification and poverty, subjected them to a long course of the most unrelenting and sanguinary persecution. But the story of those sufferings belongs to the following Century.

Number of Mendicant Orders instituted.

Notwithstanding the services of the Mendicant Orders, the multiplication of them which took place in the present Century was so great, that the Court of Rome found it necessary to put a stop to their further increase. Accordingly in the General Council of Lyons held under Gregory X. in 1272, it was decreed by the XXIIId Canon that the number of such Orders or Societies should be restrained to the four following denominations: viz. the Dominicans; the Franciscans; the Carmelites, who had been transplanted from Syria, and were confirmed by Pope Honorius III. in 1226; and the Hermits of St. Augustin, an Order which had been formed in 1256, published his celebrated book "Concerning the Perils of the Last Times," in which he applied the prophecy of St. Paul here alluded to (2 Timothy, ch. iii. ver. 1) to the establishment of the Mendicant Orders. See Dupin, Eccles. Hist. vol. xi. ch. vii. for an ample account of the whole of this controversy.

* The following are the words of the Rule of St. Francis himself as extracted by Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 63. Ch. vi. Fraternitas vobis nihil appropriet, nec domum, nec locum nec aliquam rem; sed sicut peregrini et advenae in hoc seculo, in pauperitate et humilitate famulantes Domino, evadant pro eternam salutem. Another article of the Rule forbade the accepting of money in alms.

† Called Exalt qui seminat. For an abstract of it, see Fleury, Hist. Eccles. tom. xviii. p. 326.

by Alexander IV., by a combination of the several Societies of Hermits previously existing.

Besides these, several other Religious congregations took their rise in this Century. The more remarkable are the Order of the Holy Trinity, or of the Redemption of Captives, (such being the original purpose of the institution,) which was founded in 1211 by John de Matha and Felix de Valois; the Order of Sylvestrians, founded in Italy, in 1231, by Sylvester Guzzolini, and which adopted the rule of St. Benedict; and the Order of Celestines, which, as we have already seen, owed its origin to Peter of Morrhone, afterwards Pope Celestin V.*

Ecclesiastical History of the XIIIth Century.
Other Orders.

The general state of the doctrine or discipline of the General Church in this Century presents little that calls for particular remark, beyond what may be gathered from the facts already given in the former part of this Chapter. It can hardly be said that any new article of Faith was imposed on the public credulity during this period; though, as we have seen, by the first chapter of the IVth Lateran Council (1215) the doctrine as well as the name of Transubstantiation were more formally intruded into the substance of the public belief of the Church than hitherto they had been. By the XXId Canon of the same Council, Auricular Confession to a Priest, at least once in a year, was, for the first time, made universally obligatory upon the Faithful. After the establishment of the Mendicant Orders, a long and angry controversy took place as to how far it was allowable to make this confession to any other than the Parochial Curate of the Penitent; the Popes were evidently anxious to extend this privilege to the Monks, while the Bishops and Universities resisted such intrusion as altogether unwarrantable, and contended that it was unlawful to confess even to the Pope himself, without the consent of one's Parish Minister. Several Bulls or Decretals were issued by the Pontiffs on this subject, most of them leaning to the side of the Mendicants; the last was that of Pope Boniface VIII., which ordained, "that the Superiors of Religious Houses should apply to the Bishops for leave for such Friars as they should point out to administer the sacrament of Penance; and that in case of refusal, application should be made to the Pope, who, if he thought fit, might grant it by the plenitude of his power."

General remarks.
Doctrine and discipline.

It remains to add a few remarks respecting the state and progress of Theological Learning during the XIIIth Century. The Scholastic system of exposition and disputation which had its origin in the preceding Age, may be said to have attained its highest honours in the present one. The Writers who principally contributed to this result were Alexander Hales, Albert the Great, Bonaventure, and St. Thomas of Aquino; all of them men of undoubted genius and learning, and who are justly considered as the greatest lights of their school. More particular accounts of the writings of these Doctors will be given separately; and we shall here merely observe of them, that as great as was the expenditure of subtlety and acuteness which they wasted in their systems of didactic and exegetical Divinity, we believe that the Theological student would with difficulty find in the whole of them, a single sound, and at the same time new principle of Biblical Interpretation or exposition. The Book of Sentences of Peter Lombard continued to

State of Learning.
Progress of Scholastic Theology.

* See Helyot, under these several heads, for an ample account of these Orders.

History. be the standard and, in fact, the exclusive text-book of Divinity in the schools. The greater part of the Writers of that Age made it their business to comment upon and illustrate it; commonly, however, taking the liberty to deviate very widely as well from the meaning as the manner of their master; and seeking to establish or explain upon metaphysical or argumentative principles, the conclusions which he had grounded upon the authority of the Fathers alone. In time, however, this method of Theological exposition and disquisition became exhausted; and we find some of the most eminent of the schoolmen throwing aside the Master of Sentences, and framing Sums or systems of Theology of their own. In these, they profess to examine almost every assignable question upon principles of strict and impartial dialectic research; setting forth the reasonings to be alleged on both sides; and adding, so far as their ignorance of Greek would enable them, the opinions whether of Aristotle or of the Fathers.

New methods of exposition.

The adoption of the dry Scholastic method of division and distinction, was yet more misplaced, and has a still worse effect in their Sermons and devotional Treatises.

Discouraged by the Popes.

This new or logical method of treating Divinity did not make its way without considerable opposition on the part of the Divines of the older school, who, as still adhering to the plain text of the Scriptures and the Fathers, were distinguished under the name of Biblicists. We find the Popes themselves reprobating this system of "adulterating the word of God with the figments of Philosophers,"* and endeavouring to recall the Writers and Professors of the day to the sounder and plainer methods of exposition of former times; nevertheless the new system hourly became more prevalent, in consequence of the superior talent and subtlety of many of the Doctors who adopted it.

Universities.

A remarkable feature of the literary history of this Age, was the establishment of Universities on the footing on which they at present exist. It was then, indeed, that they first assumed their distinguishing denomination; although several seminaries of the kind already existed under the name of Schools. The University of Paris naturally took the lead in this change, and continued to preserve that preeminent credit as a place of Theological institution, which the talents and learning of her Professors had already acquired for her, in the course of the two preceding Centuries. A system of strict regularity and discipline was now introduced into these Bodies, to which both teachers and scholars were uniformly subjected. No one was allowed to lecture until he had taken certain degrees in the Faculty which he followed, and these were given, after a rigorous examination, to those only who had attained the prescribed age, and devoted a given number of years to their appropriate studies. It was now, too, that Colleges were first founded in connection with the Universities. These owe their origin to the Dominican and Franciscan Friars, who, upon their aggregation to the Universities, found it convenient to establish certain houses or hostels for the separate use of their brethren among the students. The example was soon followed by other Religious Societies; and was adopted afterwards by various munificent individuals, who were anxious to afford to the poorer order of scholars the means of accommodation and support during their attendance at the Universities. The celebrated House of Sorbonne was founded by Robert of Sorbonne, in the year 1251, for the Secular Clergy; and is believed to have been the first instance in Europe of any community in which seculars lived and taught in common. As such, its constitution has generally served as a model for the institutions of the same kind which have since been established in the different Academical Schools of Europe.

Foundation of Colleges.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the XIIIth Century.

GREEK ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE XIIIth CENTURY.

NICETAS ACOMINATUS.
 GEORGIUS ACROPOLITA LOGOTHETES.
 GERMANUS NAUPLIUS.
 NICEPHORUS BLEMIMIDAS.
 THEODORUS LASCARIS.
 GEORGIUS PACHYMERES.
 JOHANNES VECCUS.
 GEORGIUS METOCHITA.
 CONSTANTINUS MELITENIOTA.
 GREGORIUS ARUPHARAGIUS.
 ARSENIUS AUTORIANUS.

These are the principal names afforded us by the records of Grecian literature and learning in this period of their decay; and the very obscurity into which the greater number of them have fallen sufficiently betrays the rank to which they belong. The first of these whom we have enumerated,

NICETAS ACOMINATUS,

surnamed Chonistes from the place of his birth, Chone, a village of Phrygia, is the author of a Treatise entitled Thesaurus Orthodoxæ Fidei, and as such may claim a place among the Divines of his time; otherwise he is best and chiefly known by his Byzantine History from the year 1118 to 1205. It is valuable for its facts, although written in a wretched style. Nicetas himself filled the highest offices of the State under the Emperor Alexius and his successors. On the capture of Constantinople by the Latins he retired with his family to Nice in Bithynia, and died there shortly after, in the year 1206. His Work has been printed several times, and forms a part of the Corpus Hist. Byzant. His brother Michael was Archbishop of Athens, and author of various tracts which are still extant in manuscript.

GEORGIUS ACROPOLITA LOGOTHETES

was also a layman, high in office under the Emperors John Ducas, Theodore Lascaris, and Michael Palæologus, and the author of a continuation of the Byzantine History till the recapture of Constantinople in 1261. He possessed the highest reputation among his Countrymen for talents and learning, and was deputed by the Emperor Michael Palæologus as his representative at the Council of Lyons, to treat respecting the reconciliation of the Greek and Latin Churches. He died in 1282. He is also the author of sundry Theological Treatises; among others, of a Commentary upon St. Gregory Nazianzen.

* See the Epistle of Gregory IX. to the Professors of the University of Paris. Du Boulay, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. An extract from it is given in Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 98.

History.

GERMANUS NAUPLIUS

was titular Patriarch of Constantinople, from the year 1226 to 1243, when he died. He wrote a great many Sermons and Tracts, which are mentioned by Allatius; but none of them appear to merit specific notice.

NICEPHORUS BLEMMIDAS

was a Priest and Monk of the Monastery of Mount Atlas. He was favourable to the project so often agitated of a union of the Eastern and Western Churches, and made himself remarkable by the inclination which he betrays in his writings to the cause of the Latins. This leaning is very evident in his two Treatises concerning the Procession of the Holy Ghost; in which, if he does not directly justify the expressions of the Latin Symbol upon that point, he endeavours at least to show that it is not inadmissible. One of these Treatises is dedicated to the Emperor Theodore Lascaris, in whose reign he flourished, but the time of his death does not appear.

THEODORUS LASCARIS,

the second Emperor of that name, who succeeded his Father John Ducas in the Empire, at Nice, in the year 1255, was a Theological Writer; and, indeed, so addicted to those studies, that after a reign of only four years he retired to a Monastery in order that he might indulge in them uninterrupted. But none of his writings have been printed.

ARSENIUS AUTORIANUS,

originally a Monk of Mount Athos, was in 1257 promoted to the Patriarchal Chair of Constantinople. But a quarrel* with the Emperor Michael Palaeologus led to his deposition in the year 1268; and he was driven to exile, in which he died some years after. His principal Work is an able Nomocanon, or Abridgement of the Canons, extracted from the Fathers and the Councils, and divided into CXLI heads. It is published in the Bibliotheca of Justel.

GEORGIUS PACHYMERES

was contemporary with Arsenius, and intimately connected with him in all the public affairs of his time. He was born at Nice in 1242, and entered into Orders; a circumstance that did not prevent his filling several important Civil employments under the Emperors Michael Palaeologus and his son. He survived to the following Century, although the year of his death is uncertain. The chief Work of Pachymeres is his History of Affairs under the Emperors Michael and Andronicus, from the year 1258 to 1308; a Work the more valuable from the author's own intimate concern in the matters related; but written in the corrupt, inflated style too common to the later Byzantine Historians. It has been published (Rome, 1666) in two volumes, folio. Pachymeres is also the author of a Commentary on the Works of Dio-

* A quarrel in the highest degree honourable to the firmness and integrity of Arsenius; he has given a full account of the grounds of it in his last Will and Testament, which has been published by Cotelierus in the 114 volume of his Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae. An ample and interesting narrative of this transaction will be found in Gibbon vol. xi. ch. li.

nyrius, and of an Abridgement of Aristotle's Logic, both in print; and of a little Treatise on the Procession of the Holy Ghost, which is included in the Græcia Orthodoxa of Allatius. Of the next name in our list, Ecclesiastical Writers of the XIIIth Century.

JOHANNES VECCUS,

sometime Patriarch of Constantinople, considerable mention has already been made in a former part of this Chapter. He had by far the highest reputation of any Greek of his time for genius and eloquence. His conversion to the Latin doctrine concerning the Procession of the Holy Ghost, is ascribed to an attentive perusal of the Works of Nicephorus Blemmidas, which the Emperor had put into his hands; but as Michael at the same time shut him up in a dungeon in order to give him fuller leisure for the appreciation of the controversy, the motives and nature of his conversion must always remain somewhat equivocal. The consistency and firmness, however, with which he afterwards adhered to his new opinions, ought to gain him credit for the sincerity with which he had embraced them. He was deposed, as we have seen, in 1263, and died in exile in 1298. His various Treatises, which relate almost exclusively to the Latin controversy, were collected by Allatius, and published at Rome in 1652.

GEORGIUS METOCHITA,
CONSTANTINUS MELITENIOTA,

are two dignitaries of the Church of Constantinople, who attached themselves to the opinions and fortunes of the Patriarch Vecess, and who on his fall were similarly driven into banishment. Of their writings, all which relate to the same controversies with those in which their patron was engaged, several have been printed in the Græcia Orthodoxa of Allatius.

We ought not here to omit a notice of some of the many able Polemics who distinguished themselves on the other side in this debate. Among these we should first mention Georgius of Cyprus, surnamed Gregorius, who was raised to the Patriarchate of Constantinople upon the death of Josephus in 1284, and died about five years after; Georgius Moschamper, Register of the Patriarchal Church; and Constantinus Logothetes Acropolita; all of whom published various Treatises in refutation of the doctrines and principles supported by Vecess.*

Nothing can more strongly mark the point of decay and exhaustion to which Grecian Literature and Theology had at this time fallen, than the simple inspection of a catalogue such as we have here drawn up; a few Chroni- cles of contemporary History, and a crowd of disputants upon the prevailing controversy of the day, form the only contributors to Byzantine Letters. A similar review of the Writers of Western Europe in this Century, affords us a spectacle of greater animation, in respect at least of the number, talents, and industry of the Writers; and in framing our catalogue, our difficulty will be the reverse of that which we felt in making out

* We might add to this list of Christian Oriental Writers Gregorius Abulpharagius, an Arabian author of the Sect of the Jacobites and Melchites, whose Universal History from the Creation to his own time (viz. in the year of Hegira 683, a. m. 1284) is greatly esteemed, particularly that part which relates to Asiatic History. He died Bishop of Aleppo and Primate of the Jacobites in 1256.

History. an enumeration of the Grecian Writers; the only embarrassment is that of choice among so many. We shall, however, confine our notice to the leading names, taking for the most part as the best indication of their comparative merit, the degree of celebrity which they respectively acquired in their own Age.

Wickham Writers of the XIIIth Century.

LATIN ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE XIIIth CENTURY.

ALEXANDER OF HALES.
ALBERT THE GREAT.
ST. THOMAS OF AQUINO.
ST. BONAVENTURA.
ROGER BACON.
ALAN OF LILLE.
RICHARD MIDDLETON.
STEPHEN LANGTON.
ST. EDMUND OF CANTERBURY.
JOHN PECKHAM.
ROBERT GROSTESTE.
PETER THE CHANTER.
PETER OF CORBELL.
WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE.
VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS.
HUGH OF ST. CHER.
THOMAS OF CANTIMPRE.
RAYMOND DE PENNAPORTE.
RAYMOND OF MARRAS.

ALEXANDER OF HALES

(the place of his birth in Gloucestershire) may be considered as the earliest of the distinguished Schoolmen of this Century. After completing the usual course of humanities at home, he studied Theology and Canon Law at Paris, and quickly gained so high a reputation in that University, that he was distinguished by the title of the Irrefragable Doctor. The book which put the seal to his reputation was his Sum of Theology, the largest Work of its kind that had yet been produced. It is in the form of a voluminous comment on the Master of Sentences, the plan and order of whose Treatise he follows throughout; though with a considerable latitude of difference as to the manner and principle of reasoning. Alexander embraced the Franciscan institute in 1222, and continued for many years to preside over the Theological school of that Order at Paris, where he died in August 1245. His Sum has been several times printed; of his other Works many remain in manuscript; and of some of those which are ascribed to him it is doubtful whether he was in fact the author.

A Schoolman of yet higher reputation was

ALBERT, SURNAMED THE GREAT,

who was born at Lawingen, in Suabia, about the beginning of the present Century. He joined, in 1221, the order of Preaching Friars, or Dominicans, of which he became Provincial in Germany, and fixed his residence at Cologne, where he taught Divinity with the highest reputation. In 1260, Pope Alexander IV. gave him the Bishopric of Ratisbon, but he soon resigned it, and returned to his former studies at Cologne. He was one of the distinguished Doctors invited to assist at the General Council at Lyon in 1274. He died at Cologne in 1280. His Works are of enormous volume; they have been printed (Lyon, 1651) in no less than twenty-one volumes folio. The reader may be curious to know of what so immense a mass can consist. The six first are devoted to Logic, Physics, Metaphysics, Morals, and Politics, in all which subjects Aristotle is followed implicitly; the next five consist of Commentaries on the Scripture; the twelfth of a series of Sermons for all the year; the thirteenth of Commentaries upon the Books ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite. Then follow three volumes of Commentaries on the Master of Sentences; a Sum of Divinity occupies two more; and the nineteenth is entitled Summa Creaturarum, treating of the natural world and of man. Of the pieces contained in the two last volumes, it is doubtful whether the greater number really belong to him. The very high reputation acquired by Albert in his own Age, is the best proof of his merit; of which perhaps it would not be fair to judge by the estimate of what, at the present day, might seem really valuable in his Works.

A yet greater name in scholastic science is that of

ST. THOMAS OF AQUINO,

to whom, in order that we may fully explain the doctrine of the Schoolmen, we have devoted a separate Chapter.

After the Angelical, the next place in the constellation of scholastic worthies of this Century is due to the Seraphic Doctor, who was born at Bagnarea, in Tuscany, in the year 1221, and having entered into the Franciscan Order at the age of twenty-two, proceeded to study at Paris. There he attracted admiration not more by his eloquence and genius, than by the sweetness of his temper, and the piety and purity of his life; inasmuch that his master, Alexander of Hales, used to say of him, In fratre Bonaventurâ Adam peccâsse non videtur. In 1256, he was chosen General of his Order, ten years after, like his illustrious contemporary, Thomas of Aquino, he refused an Archbishopric, that of York, which was urged upon him by Pope Urban IV. Like him, too, he was summoned to attend at the Council of Lyon in 1274, and by a further coincidence, died in the same year, on the 15th of July, in the course of his attendance on that Synod. He had just before accepted a Cardinal's hat from Pope Gregory X., to whose election he was supposed to have principally contributed. He was canonized by Sixtus IV. in 1482. The turn of Bonaventura's genius was devotional and mystic rather than philosophical or dialectic. His Works, therefore, are distinguishable from those of most of the contemporary Schoolmen, as well by the matter, which for the most part refers little to Logic or Physics, as by the peculiar unction and spirit of devotion which uniformly pervades the style. They have been printed in six volumes folio, (Rome, 1588,) and consist (together with the usual Commentaries upon the Master of Sentences) almost wholly either of Commentaries on Scripture, or of Sermons and Tracts of a spiritual nature.

ST. BONAVENTURA,

We have now enumerated the four great lights of the School in this Century. A man, probably of superior genius to any of them, was the famous

History.

ROGER BACON,

who by the universality of his acquirements obtained the name of the Admirable Doctor; but though a Franciscan Monk by profession, he applied himself so exclusively to subjects of Mathematical and Chemical Science, that he can scarcely be reckoned among the Theological Writers of the Age. His success in these pursuits is known to have brought him under the imputation of cultivating the magical arts; on which ground he was condemned by the General of his Order in 1278, and punished by imprisonment. He died at Oxford six years afterwards, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. His Opus Majus has been several times printed.

ALAN OF LILLE,

flourished as a distinguished Professor throughout nearly the whole of this Century in the University of Paris, where, from the equal extent of his attainments in Philosophy and Poetry as well as in Divinity, he was styled the Universal Doctor. He died in a. d. 1204.

RICHARD MIDDLETON,

or Ricardus de Media Villâ, as he wrote himself, was a Franciscan Monk, and a Professor of Theology, and as such acquired the title of the Solid and Copious Doctor. He died in 1304. Like most of his brethren of the School, he wrote a Commentary upon Peter Lombard; a duty which seems to have been undertaken as a matter of course in that Age by all who sought to distinguish themselves in Divinity.

Few men of his time have better deserved of their Country and of posterity, than sometime Archbishop of Canterbury; but it was in his Political and Episcopal character, rather than in that of a Theological Writer; although his services in this last respect were far from contemptible. The story of his life, and of the consistent firmness with which he successively resisted the tyranny of the King and the encroachments of the Pope, belongs to English History. Previously to his elevation to the See of Canterbury (a. d. 1206) he professed Divinity at Paris, and with so much reputation, that, although a foreigner, he was elected Chancellor of the University. He died in 1228. Of his Works, consisting chiefly of Commentaries on the Scripture, none is in print. He is said to have been the first who divided the Bible into Chapters.

STEPHEN LANGTON,

Another ornament of the Metropolitan See of England during this Century was

ST. EDMUND OF CANTERBURY.

He was the son of Edward Rich, a merchant of Abingdon, and from his earliest years manifested the seeds of the most humble and devout frame of mind; a disposition which he did not belie, when, much against his own will, (a. d. 1234,) at the special recommendation of Pope Gregory, he was elected to the Primacy. In this high office, however, he found nothing but cares; and the shameless conduct, on the part as well of the Court of Rome as of the Crown and the Clergy, of which he was compelled to be the witness, and sometimes the Instrument, so disgusted him, that at length (a. d. 1249) he voluntarily retired to the Monastery of Pontigny in France; the same which had before afforded an asylum to his predecessor, St. Thomas à Becket. He died there within the same year, in the odour of sanctity. His merits were acknowledged by an act of canonization on the part of Pope Innocent IV. in 1249; and still better by the singular veneration in which his memory was held, up to a recent period, in the neighbourhood of the place of his decease. He was the author of a Work of piety, entitled Speculum Ecclesie, which has been printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

Another Archbishop of Canterbury in this Century, and who finds a place here rather from his rank as such, than from the importance or worth of his writings, is a native of Sussex, and a Franciscan, who, during a residence he made at Rome, so acquired the favour of the Pope, that by his interest he was elected to the Primacy on the resignation of Robert Killwarby in 1278. He died in 1291, after holding the See for thirteen years, during which time he had not only greatly enriched his patron kindred, but accumulated a fortune of five thousand pounds, (in those days considered an enormous sum,) besides, as it was believed, having largely recompensed the Pope for his promotion. He compiled a Work called Collectorium Bibliorum, which has been twice printed, (Paris, 1514, Cologne, 1541,) besides various Tracts of Divinity, which still remain in manuscript.

JOHN PECKHAM,

The Prelacy of England during this Century could boast of a very different character from the last mentioned in or Groshead, (in Latin styled Robertus Capito), Bishop of Lincoln; a man distinguished not more by the depth of his learning and the vivacity of his genius, than by the purity, simplicity, and disinterestedness of his life: and who shone among all his contemporaries by the firmness with which he not merely opposed the encroachments and practices of the Court of Rome, but openly and indignantly stigmatized them as utterly subversive both of the doctrines of the Gospel and the discipline of the Church. Some striking instances of this conduct on his part are related in Matthew Paris.* He was born in Suffolk, and studied at Oxford and Paris, and was promoted to the See of Lincoln in 1235. He died in 1253, leaving behind a considerable number of writings both in Philosophy and Divinity. Some of these have been printed, and sufficiently confirm the testimony of his contemporaries, both as to his integrity of principle, and the extent of his learning.

ROBERT GROSTESTE,

PETER THE CHANTER

(so called from the office which he held in the Church of Paris) is the author of a Work entitled Verbum Abbreviatum, which is frequently cited with praise by the Divines of the following Centuries. It has been printed, (Mons, 1637, 4to.) He became a Monk in the Abbey of Longpont, where he died about the beginning of this Century. Contemporary with him as a Doctor and Professor in the University of Paris was

* Hist. ad ann. 1255, p. 754.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the XIIIth Century.

History.

PETER OF CORBEIL;

he had been tutor to Pope Innocent III., who in one of his letters expresses the highest opinion of him, and successively procured him the preferments of Archdeacon of York, Bishop of Cambrai, and Archbishop of Sens. He was the author of a Sum of Theology and of various Commentaries upon Scripture, none of which have been printed, although they procured to him a very high reputation among his contemporaries. He died in 1222.

WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE

became Bishop of Paris in 1228, and held that See till his death, in 1249. His Works (which have been printed in two volumes folio) are especially remarkable for the force and severity with which he stigmatizes the abuses of discipline prevailing at that time in the Church.*

VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS

was a Dominican Friar, and Reader and Chaplain to the King St. Louis. It was at the order and expense of that Prince that he undertook to compose a great Work, entitled Speculum Majus, divided into four heads of Natural, Doctrinal, Historical, and Moral Science, and as such forming a kind of universal Dictionary of the knowledge of that Age. The Work is, for the most part, a professed compilation from other authors; but some difficulty has arisen from the fact of the last part, or the Speculum Morale, being nearly verbatim the same with the second division of the second part of the Sum of St. Thomas Aquinas. Vincent is said to have died in 1258, nearly twenty years before St. Thomas, of whom his Sum is known to have been the latest production. The most probable supposition is that this portion of St. Thomas's Sum was interpolated in or added to the Speculum of Vincent by some of the earlier transcribers of the latter Work.

HUGH OF ST. CHER.

near Vienne, in Dauphiné, was a Brother of the Order of Dominicans, of which he became Provincial, and was afterwards (1245) made Cardinal by Pope Innocent IV.; by whom, as by his predecessor, Gregory IX., he was employed in several important missions. He died at Orvieto, in March, 1263. Notwithstanding his success in the public and political situations which he filled, his prevailing taste was for a life of retirement and literature; and he is said to have expressed to the last his regret that he had suffered himself, by the acceptance of the Cardinalship, to be drawn into busier scenes. The Work by which he is most honourably remembered is his Concordance of the Bible: a contrivance of which he was the inventor, and which he completed by the assistance of some of his Monks, who wrote under his direction.

* See Dupin, Hist. Ecclési. vol. xi. ch. iii. for an abstract of a Treatise of this William concerning the Collation of Benefices.

THOMAS OF CANTINPRE,

a Flemish Divine, also of the Dominican Order, claims a place here, on account of the celebrity which attached to his Work entitled Bonum Universale, seu de Apibus, in which, under the form of a "Fable of the Bees," he illustrates and enforces the duties of the different ranks of Society in their carriage towards each other. He died in 1263.† His book, has been several times printed.‡

Among the most distinguished members of the Dominican Order at this time, we must not omit the mention of

RAYMOND DE PENNAFORTE,

of whom it has been said, that he was one of the first among the Latins who undertook to vanquish the Jews and Saracens by reason and argument, rather than by terror and force;§ was born at Barcelona about the year 1177, and studied and afterwards professed the Canon Law with great distinction at Bologna. On his return to his Country in 1222, he found the Dominican Order just established. He immediately took the habit himself, and in 1238 was elected General; but this dignity he soon resigned, and uniformly refused every other that was offered to him, passing the rest of his life, which was prolonged to nearly a century, in his Convent at Barcelona. He died in January, 1275, and three Centuries after was canonized by Pope Clement VIII. Besides a compilation of the Decretals, which he made at the desire of Pope Gregory IX., Raymond composed an excellent Summa of Cases of Conscience for the use of confessors, which was probably the earliest Work of its kind that has appeared.¶

Of the same city, and of the same Religious Order, was

RAYMOND OF MARTINS,

who similarly distinguished himself by his controversies with the Jews and Saracens; to qualify himself for which service, by the recommendation of Raymond of Pennafort, he acquired, what was very rare at that time, a knowledge of the Hebrew and Arabic Languages. Thus accomplished, he produced his celebrated book, the Pugio Fidei; a Work which is still considered one of the most conclusive of its kind, and which has been more than once reprinted with the annotations of the learned.||

* According to Lipsius, though other Writers place the date of his death nine years later. See Dupin, XIIIth Century, ch. iv.

† At Douay, in 1597, 1607, and 1627.

‡ Mosheim, cent. xiii. ch. iii. If this be true of the method which he employed towards Infidels, it can hardly apply to his mode of dealing with Heretics, as it is known that he was most immediately and actively concerned in the original establishment of the Inquisition both in Aragon and in Languedoc.

§ The best edition is that of P. Laget, Lyon, 1718, in folio: the date of which is a sufficient indication that, notwithstanding the many imitations of its plan, the Work up to a late period retained its value.

|| Particularly by Joseph Voisin, Paris, 1651, and by Benedict Carpovius, Leipsic, 1687.

Revised Edition of the XIIIth Century.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

PROGRESS OF THE CRUSADES; AND ANNALS OF THE EAST;

FROM A. D. 1099 TO A. D. 1204.

History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Reign of Godfrey de Bouillon at Jerusalem.
A. D.
1099.

Battle of Ascalon.

Great victory of the Crusaders.

WITHIN a short month after his election to fill the throne of Jerusalem, the pious and gallant Godfrey of Bouillon was summoned into the field to sustain that arduous office of Defender of the Holy Sepulchre, which his modesty had preferred to the Regal title. The Khalif of Egypt, roused to equal indignation and alarm by the intelligence of the fall of Jerusalem, had immediately despatched a great army into Palestine; and the influence of a common Religion and cause attracted numerous hordes of Turks and Saracens to the Fatimite standard. The usual exaggeration of the Latin Chroniclers has swollen the Infidel host into countless myriads: their more authentic record of the Christian force shows that the banals of the Crusaders had already dwindled, since the capture of the Holy City, to five thousand horse and fifteen thousand foot soldiers. But the champions of the Cross, however inferior in numbers, were flushed with recent victory, and animated by the unconquerable energy of religious and martial enthusiasm. The armies met at Ascalon; and the organized and mail-clad chivalry of Europe once more triumphed over the disorderly multitudes of Egypt, Syria, and Arabia. The Fatimites fled at the first charge of Godfrey and Tancred; and the only resistance which the Crusaders encountered was from a band of five thousand black Africans; who, after the discharge of a galling flight of arrows from an ambush, astonished the Latins by a novel mode of close combat with balls of iron fastened to leathern thongs, which they swung with terrific effect. But after the first moment of surprise, the desperate courage and rude weapons of these Barbarians were vainly opposed to the sharp lances and physical weight of the Christian gens-d'armes; and their destruction or flight completed the easy and merciless victory of the Crusaders. Of the Infidel host, the incredible numbers of thirty thousand in the battle, and sixty thousand in the pursuit, are declared to have been slaughtered: while of the Latins scarcely a man had been killed. An immense booty, the spoils of the Egyptian camp, fell into the hands of the victors; and the standard and sword of the Khalif, being alone reserved from the division of the plunder, were piously suspended by Godfrey over the altar of the Sepulchre at Jerusalem.*

The victory of Ascalon was the last combined exploit of the heroes of the First Crusade. Having accomplished their vow, and bidden a farewell to their unanimous leader, most of the surviving Princes and Chieftains of the Holy War departed for Europe. Boemond was established at Antioch, and Baldwin at Edessa: but of all his compeers, Godfrey could induce only the devoted Tancred to share his fortunes; and no more than three hundred Knights and as many thousand foot soldiers remained for the defence of Palestine. But the terror of the Christian arms proved, for a season at least, a sufficient protection to the new State; the Mussulmans were easily expelled from the shores of Lake Genesareth; and the Emirs of Ascalon, Cesarea, and Acre, hastened to deprecate the hostility of the Crusading King by submission and tribute. The remainder of Godfrey's brief reign was disturbed only by the intrigues of Daimbert, Archbishop of Pisa, who had been appointed by Pope Paschal II.* to succeed Adhemar of Pay as Legate of the Holy See, and had now been invested with the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. As Chief, in this double capacity, of the Latin Church in the East, Daimbert audaciously claimed the disposal of those acquisitions, which the heroes of the Crusade had carved out with their own good swords; and both Godfrey and Boemond condescended to receive from his hands, as vassals of the Church, the Feudal investiture of the States of Jerusalem and Antioch. But even this submission did not satisfy the pride and cupidity of Daimbert; he claimed the entire possession of Jerusalem and Jaffa; and Godfrey, who shrank with superstitious horror from the idea of a contest with the Church, was glad to compound with the demand of the rapacious Prelate by the surrender of the whole of the latter city, and a portion, including the Sepulchre itself, of the sacred Capital. The Patriarch further extorted the monstrous condition, that the unreserved dominion of all Jerusalem should escheat to his See, in case Godfrey died without issue. That event occurred too shortly for the

Progress
of the Crusades.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Death of Godfrey.
A. D.
1100.

* According to the vulgar belief, Pope Urban II. died of joy on learning the conquest of Jerusalem; but, as Mr. Mills has observed, (Hist. of the Crusades, vol. i. p. 268.) the decease of that Pontiff occurred only fifteen days after the capture of the city, and therefore too soon to have been produced by the receipt of the glad intelligence in Italy.

† Even the Archbishop of Tyre, despite of the zeal for the supremacy of the Church which he may be supposed naturally to have felt, is disgusted by the audacious pretensions of the Patriarch, and relates the tale with indignant candour. Wül. Tyr. p. 771.

* Albertus Aqueensis, p. 290—294. Willermus Tyr. p. 763—773.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Reign of Baldwin I.
King of Jerusalem.

happiness of a people, whom the good Prince governed with paternal benevolence; and to the sorrow, not only of the Christian inhabitants of Palestine, but even of their Musulman tributaries, he breathed his last, at the early age of forty years, five days preceding the first anniversary of his reign.*

On the death of Godfrey, the Barons of the Latin Kingdom of Palestine indignantly refused to ratify the promised cession which the Patriarch demanded; and it was resolved that the unimpaired rights of the Crown over Jerusalem should be bestowed with its temporal sovereignty. Tancred desired that the election should fall on his relative Boemond, Prince of Antioch: but that Prince had, at this critical juncture, been made prisoner by an Armenian Chieftain, whose territories he had unjustly invaded; and a general feeling that some preference was due to the claims of the House of Bouillon decided the choice of the Barons in favour of Baldwin, Prince of Edessa. Resigning his Principality to his relative and namesake, Baldwin du Bourg, the brother of Godfrey hastened to the Holy City; and, after some fruitless opposition, the Patriarch solemnly crowned the new King of Jerusalem in the Church of Bethlehem. The memory of the wrongs which he had sustained from Baldwin, inspired Tancred with a more excusable and lasting repugnance to his pretensions; and refusing to swear allegiance to an enemy, the Italian Chieftain retired from Jerusalem to Antioch, of which he assumed the regency during the captivity of Boemond. But an accommodation was effected by the good offices of the Barons; and the King and the Regent of Antioch were left at leisure to provide for the security of their States against the common Musulman enemy.† The character of Baldwin rose with his elevation; and, on the throne of Jerusalem, he, who during the Crusade had disgusted his competers by a selfish and treacherous ambition, displayed a disinterested and magnanimous devotion to his Royal duties, which won the respect and love of his people, and proved him no unworthy successor of his brother. During a reign of eighteen years, he not only sustained with zeal and ability the arduous office of defending the Latin State from the assaults of the Infidels, but extended its limits and increased its security.

Supplement to the First
Crusade.

In these efforts he was much assisted by the remains of several armaments from Europe, which may be regarded as a supplement to the First Crusade. The spirit which had animated that enterprise still burned with undiminished intensity; and, in the course of a few years, Hugh of Vermandois, and Stephen of Chartres,—the same leaders who had retired with little honour from their first expedition,—the Dukes of Aquitaine and of Bavaria, the Counts of Burgundy, of Vendôme, of Nevers, and of Parma, and of other Princes, severally conducted into Asia whole armies of French, Gascon, Flemish, German, and Italian Crusaders, whose aggregate has been computed by a modern Writer at the astonishing number of little less than half a million of men.‡ These successive hosts took the same route, and encountered the same sufferings and disasters, from the dubious faith of the Byzantine Court, the incessant attacks of the Turks, and the triple scourge of the sword, famine, and pestilence, which had swept off the myriads of their precursors.⁴ But a very small proportion, of those who had reached the Bosphorus, survived the horrors of the passage through Asia Minor: yet the remnant which entered Syria still fed the Christian cause in Palestine with a constant supply of veteran warriors; and by their aid, and more especially by that of some maritime expeditions from the European shores, many Musulman invasions were repelled, and many conquests achieved. In the third year of his reign, Baldwin I.,† after reducing Azotus, was enabled to form the siege of Acre; and by the opportune arrival of an armament of seventy Genoese galleys, filled with Crusaders, in the following Spring, that valuable conquest was completed after a protracted resistance. Beritus and Sarepta were also reduced and converted into Christian lordships; and Sidon became the next object of assault. With an interval of four years, two fleets of Scandinavian Crusaders, who had performed the long voyage from the Baltic through the Straits of Gibraltar to the Syrian shores, cooperated with the Christian forces of Palestine in the siege of that City; and although the first attempt was repulsed, the second proved successful.‡

All these acquisitions were incorporated into the Kingdom of Jerusalem. But a more important extension of the Christian territories in Syria had meanwhile been effected, and added to the number of distinct Principalities. The veteran Count of Thoulouse prevailed upon some of the French Princes whom, in the supplemental Crusade, he had guided with the remains of their forces through Asia Minor, to subjugate Tortosa on the coast of Syria for his benefit. The nucleus of a new State was thus formed, which Raymond employed his Provençal troops in extending; but he died before he could accomplish the reduction of the city of Tripoli, the object of his ambition and the destined Capital of his

Princes
of the Crusade.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

A. D.
1104.

A. D.
1113.

Affair of the other Latin States of the East

* Both the Counts of Vermandois and of Chartres, who found themselves compelled by the public contempt of a Chivalrous Age to return to Palestine, perished in the attempt to redeem the same which they had lost by the former abandonment of their Crusading vows. The great Count of Vermandois died at Tarsus of wounds received in battle with the Turks of Cilicia; and the Count of Chartres only survived his second march into Palestine to be taken prisoner and murdered in the frontier warfare by the Egyptian Musulmans. He had been driven to engage in the supplementary Crusade by the high-spirited reproaches of his Countess Adela, daughter of our Norman Conqueror, who had sworn to allow him no peace until he should repair his dishonour. He was father to Stephen, our English Usurper. Orderic. Vital. p. 790—793. Will. Tyr. p. 781—787. Albert. p. 315—325. Anna Commena, lib. ix. p. 331.

† In the preceding year, the King of Jerusalem had narrowly escaped captivity or death, through a rash assault which he ventured upon the Egyptian invaders of Palestine with a vanguard of only a few hundred horse. His followers were overwhelmed by superior numbers and almost all cut to pieces; and it was on this occasion that the Count of Chartres was taken and murdered. The story of Baldwin's escape presents one of the few gleams of generous sentiment which relieve the dark picture of a fanatical and savage warfare. Upon some former occasion, Baldwin had captured a noble Saracen woman, whose flight was arrested by the pangs of childbirth, and, after humanely rendering her every attention, had released her and her infant in safety. The husband was serving in the Musulman ranks, when Baldwin, after the slaughter of his followers, with difficulty reached a castle whither the victors immediately pursued him. The place was surrounded, and the capture of the King would have been inevitable, if the grateful Kaim had not secretly approached the walls at midnight, announced his design of delivering the prisoner of his wife and child, and, at the hazard of his own life, conveyed him in safety from the castle, which Baldwin had secretly quitted when it was stormed, and the whole garrison put to the sword. Will. Tyr. p. 787, 788.

‡ Albert. p. 345—365. Will. Tyr. p. 791—806.

* Albert. p. 294—299. Guibert. p. 537—554. Will. Tyr. p. 773—775.

† Albert. p. 300—308. Will. Tyr. p. 775, 776.

‡ Mills, Hist. of Crusades, vol. i. p. 290, note.

History. Oriental dominions. Some years afterwards, that conquest was effected for his eldest son Bertrand, by the King of Jerusalem, seconded by all the Latin Princes of the East, and a Pisan and Genoese fleet. Tripoli, with its surrounding district and dependencies, was then erected by Baldwin into a County for the House of Thoulouse; and this new State, which, although feudally subject to the Crown of Jerusalem, partook in extent and dignity rather of the character of a sovereign Principality than of a mere Fief, contributed much by its position between the territories of Antioch and Palestine to secure and cement the communication and strength of the Christian power.* But the affairs of Antioch were perpetually embroiled by the restless ambition of its Prince. During his captivity in Armenia, the government of that State was ably administered by Tancred; but after obtaining his release, Boemond, by his refusal to acknowledge the feudal superiority of the Eastern Emperor Alexius, involved himself in a new war, in which he was assisted by the Pisans. The Byzantine arms prevailing by land, Boemond sailed to Europe to plot a diversion against the Grecian territories of his ancient enemy; and having succeeded by his martial reputation in assembling a large army of Crusaders in France and Italy, he landed at Durazzo. Alexius was then glad to conclude an accommodation with him; and the Crusading forces pursuing the usual route through the Byzantine territories to Palestine, the Prince of Antioch returned to Italy, where he died in the following year. After his decease, the noble-minded Tancred continued to rule the Syrian Principality, until his Chivalrous career was appropriately terminated by a mortal wound which he had received in battle; and after some uninteresting revolutions in the government of Antioch, the eldest son of Boemond, who bore his name, finally arrived in Asia, and successfully claimed the Principality as his inheritance.† Meanwhile the isolated State of Edessa, surrounded on all sides by Armenian and Turkish enemies, was only preserved from destruction by the heroic valour of its Count, Baldwin du Bourg, and his relative, Joscelyn de Courtenay, a member of a noble French House which was rendered more illustrious by his exploits in the East, than by the subsequent alliance of a collateral branch with the Royal blood of France, and a succession of three Emperors to the Latin throne of Constantinople.‡

By the death of his kinsman Baldwin I. the Count of Edessa was called to receive the Crown of Jerusalem. On the junction of new bands of Crusaders from Europe, Baldwin I. had been encouraged to revenge the incessant attacks of the Fatimite Khalifs of Egypt, by an invasion of that Country; and his career of victory on this expedition was cut short only by the hand of death. Leaving no issue, he, with his last breath, recommended his cousin Baldwin du Bourg for his successor; and after the retreat of the Crusading host into Palestine, which was the immediate consequence of the defection produced by his death, the Latin Prelates and Barons were induced by respect for his memory and the claims of consanguinity, as well as by the advice of Joscelyn de Courtenay, to confirm his choice. Baldwin du Bourg was therefore elected without opposition to fill the vacant throne, and immediately recompensed the services of Courtenay by resigning to him the possession of the County of Edessa. The principal event in the reign of Baldwin II. was the reduction of Tyre. The Doge of Venice, Ordelaffo Falieri, who had led the navy of his Republic on a martial pilgrimage to the coast of Palestine, was induced, after bargaining for the possession and sovereignty of one-third of that city,* to cooperate in the undertaking; and by a siege of five months the difficult conquest was achieved. Tyre was erected into an Archbishopric under the Patriarchate of Jerusalem; and by the capture of a City, which, though fallen from its ancient grandeur, was still the most opulent port on the Syrian coast, and had formed the last strong-hold of the Mussulmans in Palestine, the Latin power may be said to have attained its greatest consolidation and security.†

When the Kingdom of Jerusalem had thus acquired its utmost extent, it embraced all the Country of Palestine between the sea-coast and the Deserts of Arabia, from the City of Beritus on the North to the frontiers of Egypt on the South: forming a territory about sixty leagues in length and thirty in breadth; and exclusive of the County of Tripoli, which stretched Northward from Beritus to the borders of the Antiochian Principality. The whole territory both of the Kingdom and County was occupied by the warriors of the Cross, as we have

Progress of the Crusades.
From A. D. 1099. to A. D. 1204. Baldwin II. King of Jerusalem. A. D. 1118.

A. D. 1124.

Extent and state of the Latin Kingdom.

* Will. Tyr. p. 791—796.

† Radulphus Cad. p. 327—330. Fulcher. p. 419, 420. Albert. p. 340—354. Will. Tyr. p. 792—807. Anna Comnena, lib. xiv. p. 329—419.

‡ The adventures and vicissitudes of fortune which Joscelyn de Courtenay underwent in the East, as well as his Chivalrous deeds, might form the groundwork of a tale of Romance. He had originally accompanied the Count of Chartres from Europe in the supplementary Crusade, and settled at Edessa with his relation Baldwin, together with whom he was taken prisoner in a defeat which the Crusaders sustained from the Emir of Aleppo. After five years' captivity, the friends were released by the stratagem of some Armenian partisans, who, entering the fortress in which they were confined, in the disguise of monks and traders, surprised and slew the Turkish garrison. Baldwin then bestowed a portion of the Edessine territories in sovereignty upon Courtenay. But upon some jealousy, Joscelyn was treacherously lured to Edessa by his benefactor, put to the torture, and compelled to resign his domains. Indignant at this treatment, Courtenay withdrew to Jerusalem, where his services against the Infidels were rewarded by Baldwin I. with the Tiberiad for a Fief. Notwithstanding the wrongs by which his patron had cancelled former benefits, Joscelyn generously promoted his elevation to the throne of Jerusalem, and received the County of Edessa from his gratitude.

Baldwin, a second time falling into the hands of the Infidels after he had become King, Joscelyn obtained his liberation among the consequences of the fall of Tyre. The death of the hero at an advanced age was a worthy termination of his exploits. Being unable to sit on horseback, he was carried in a litter to the field; the Mussulmans fled at the very report of his presence; and he died giving thanks to Heaven that the mere fame of his ancient prowess sufficed to scatter the enemies of God. Will. Tyr. p. 853.

* All the maritime Republics of Italy, with their characteristic mercantile cupidity, extorted great commercial advantages as the price of their services to the Crusaders. At Acre, the Genoese obtained a street and many privileges in return for the aid of their fleet in the siege; (Will. Tyr. p. 791.) the Pisans, by treaty with Tancred, were rewarded in like manner for their services to the State of Antioch, with the property of a street both in that Capital and in Lodioca; (Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Med. Ævi, Diss. 30.) the Venetians, in addition to their settlement at Tyre, received by stipulation a church and street in Jerusalem; and throughout the Christian possessions in Palestine and Syria generally, the three Republics contended, often with bloodshed, for the right of establishing places of exchange, and enjoying the common or exclusive privileges of trade. Sabalicus, Hist. Jenei, dec. i. lib. vi. Marini, Storia Civ. e Pol. del Commercio del Veneziano, vol. iii. lib. i. cap. 4—6, &c.

† Albert. p. 365—377. Fulcher. p. 423—440. Will. Tyr. p. 805—846, passim.

History. shown in a former part of this Volume,* upon the strictest principles of a Feudal settlement, with all the subdivisions and conditions of tenure which belonged to that martial Policy. Its adoption was suggested not more by every feeling and custom of the Age which the conquerors had brought with them from Europe, than by the obvious necessity of such a state of perpetual preparation for the public defence against the incessant assaults of their Infidel enemies; and it is almost needless to repeat that under no other form of settlement, probably, could the Latin conquests have been preserved by the scanty array of their resident defenders in so unremitting a warfare with the myriads of Turkish and Egyptian Mussulmans. At its highest computation, indeed, the Feudal force of the Kingdom of Jerusalem would appear very inadequate to its protection. The four great Fiefs of Jaffa, Galilee, Cæsarea, and Tripoli, with the Royal Cities of Jerusalem, Tyre, Acre, and Naplousa, and the other Lordships in chief of inferior extent, which composed the whole Kingdom, owed and could furnish the services of no more than two thousand five hundred Knights or mounted men-at-arms; and their followers with the contingent of the Ecclesiastical and Commercial Communities, all of which were bound to render aid to the King on lower Feudal tenures than the Knights' fees, constituted a militia, for the greater part probably of archers on foot, not exceeding twelve thousand in number.† It may be inferred that the whole population of martial colonists from Europe could scarcely supply even this provision, scanty as it was, for the public defence; and the policy or the domestic wants of the conquerors encouraged the settlement in Palestine of the native Christians of Syria and Armenia, and even of Mussulman tributaries for the cultivation of the soil and the supply of mechanical labour. From the commingling of blood between the Crusaders and all these people in the enfeebling climate of the East, was produced a spurious and effeminate race, contemptuously designated by the Writers of their Age as Pullani, or Poulains, who had so utterly degenerated from the valour of their European fathers, as to fill the land without contributing to the strength of the State.*

But the Feudal army of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and the casual reinforcement of new Crusaders from Europe, formed not the only defences of Palestine. The union of fanatical and martial ardour gave birth to two famous Orders of Religious Chivalry, which were specially enrolled under the banners of the Cross; and the Christian cause in the East was long sustained by the emulous valour, though not infrequently injured by the less worthy rivalry, of the Knights of the Hospital of St. John and of the Temple of Solomon. The origin of both these remarkable institutions, which rose to celebrity by martial achievement, may be traced to purposes simply of pious and practical benevolence. Long before the era of the Crusades, some Italian merchants pursued a license from the Mussulman rulers of Jerusalem to found in that City an Hospital, together with a Chapel, which they dedicated to St. John the Eleemosynary—a canonized Patriarch of Alexandria—for the relief and wayfaring entertainment of sick and poor pilgrims. By the alms of the wealthier Christian visitors of the Sepulchre, and by charitable contributions which the merchants of Amalfi zealously collected in Italy, and as religiously transmitted to Jerusalem, the establishment was supported; and its duties were performed by a few Benedictine Monks, with the aid of such lay brethren among the European pilgrims as were induced to extend their penitential vows to a protracted residence in the Holy Land.† Perhaps through the habitual respect of the Mohammedan mind for charitable foundations, the Hospital of St. John might escape, but certainly it was suffered to outlive, the storms of Egyptian and Turkish persecution; and when Jerusalem fell into the hands of the Crusaders, the House was joyfully opened for the reception and cure of the wounded warriors. The pious Godfrey and his companions were edified by the active and self-denying benevolence of the brethren of the Hospital, who not only devoted themselves to the care of the suffering, but were contented with the coarsest fare, while their patients were supplied with bread of the purest flour. By the grateful munificence of Godfrey himself, the Hospital was endowed with an estate in Brabant, its first foreign possession; many of the Crusaders from religious motives embraced its charitable service; and the Society speedily acquired so much respect and importance, that the lay members, separating from the Monks of the Chapel of St. John the Almoner, formed themselves into a distinct community, assumed a religious habit—a long black mantle with a white cross of eight points on the left breast—and placed their Hospital under the higher patronage of St. John the Baptist. By the Patriarch of Jerusalem, their triple monastic vows of obedience, chastity, and poverty were accepted; and a Bull of Pope Paschal II., fourteen years after the conquest of Jerusalem, confirmed the institution, received the fraternity under the special

* For some particulars of the Constitution of the Kingdom of Palestine, see the Essay on the Feudal System in this Volume, p. 457, 458.

† The institution of the Feudal Code of Jerusalem dates from the first year of the Latin Conquest, and its compilation was directed by Godfrey de Bouillon himself; who, with the advice of the Patriarch and Barons, appointed several Commissioners among the Crusaders most learned in the Feudal statutes and customs of Europe to frame a body of similar Laws for the new Kingdom. Their digest was solemnly accepted in a general assembly of Prelates and Barons; and under the title of the Assises de Jérusalem became thereforth the recognised Code of the Latin State. The original Instrument which was deposited in the Holy Sepulchre, and revised and considerably enlarged by the legislation of succeeding reigns, is said to have been lost at the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin; but during the last agony of the expiring State, the provisions of the Code, which had been preserved by traditionary and customary authority, were again collected in a written form, A. D. 1250, by Jean d'Ibelin, Count of Jaffa, one of the four great Barons of the Kingdom; and a second and final revision was prepared in Cyprus, A. D. 1369, by sixteen Commissioners for the use of the Latin Kingdom in that Island. From a MS. of this Cypriot version, in the Vatican Library, was published at Paris, A. D. 1690, by Thaumassière, the edition of the Assises de Jérusalem, to which we are indebted for our acquaintance with this "precious monument," as a great Writer has justly termed it, "of Feudal Jurisprudence." But for the history of the Code, see Assises de Jérusalem against Thaumassière, Preface.

† Gibbon (ch. lviii.) has fallen into an error in estimating the number of Knights' fees in the whole Kingdom of Jerusalem, exclusive of Tripoli, as six hundred and sixty-six, and appears to have confounded the contingent of the four Royal Cities, which alone, according to the Assises, furnished that number, with the total Knightly array of the Realm. He cites Samutius, indeed, (Secreta Fidei, lib. iii.) as stating the number of Knights' fees in each of the great Baronies of Jaffa, Galilee, and Cæsarea, at one hundred only, but the very superior authority of the Assises takes them expressly at five hundred each. Assises, c. 324–331.

* Vide Du Cange, Gloss. v. Pullani.
† Will. Tyr. p. 934, 935.

Progress of the Crusades.
From A. D. 1099, to A. D. 1204.
Rise of the Orders of Religious Chivalry.
The Hospital of St. John the Eleemosynary.
The Temple of Solomon.
The origin of the Hospital of St. John and of the Temple of Solomon.
The union of fanatical and martial ardour gave birth to two famous Orders of Religious Chivalry.
The Christian cause in the East was long sustained by the emulous valour, though not infrequently injured by the less worthy rivalry, of the Knights of the Hospital of St. John and of the Temple of Solomon.
The origin of both these remarkable institutions, which rose to celebrity by martial achievement, may be traced to purposes simply of pious and practical benevolence.
Long before the era of the Crusades, some Italian merchants pursued a license from the Mussulman rulers of Jerusalem to found in that City an Hospital, together with a Chapel, which they dedicated to St. John the Eleemosynary—a canonized Patriarch of Alexandria—for the relief and wayfaring entertainment of sick and poor pilgrims.
By the alms of the wealthier Christian visitors of the Sepulchre, and by charitable contributions which the merchants of Amalfi zealously collected in Italy, and as religiously transmitted to Jerusalem, the establishment was supported; and its duties were performed by a few Benedictine Monks, with the aid of such lay brethren among the European pilgrims as were induced to extend their penitential vows to a protracted residence in the Holy Land.
Perhaps through the habitual respect of the Mohammedan mind for charitable foundations, the Hospital of St. John might escape, but certainly it was suffered to outlive, the storms of Egyptian and Turkish persecution; and when Jerusalem fell into the hands of the Crusaders, the House was joyfully opened for the reception and cure of the wounded warriors.
The pious Godfrey and his companions were edified by the active and self-denying benevolence of the brethren of the Hospital, who not only devoted themselves to the care of the suffering, but were contented with the coarsest fare, while their patients were supplied with bread of the purest flour.
By the grateful munificence of Godfrey himself, the Hospital was endowed with an estate in Brabant, its first foreign possession; many of the Crusaders from religious motives embraced its charitable service; and the Society speedily acquired so much respect and importance, that the lay members, separating from the Monks of the Chapel of St. John the Almoner, formed themselves into a distinct community, assumed a religious habit—a long black mantle with a white cross of eight points on the left breast—and placed their Hospital under the higher patronage of St. John the Baptist.
By the Patriarch of Jerusalem, their triple monastic vows of obedience, chastity, and poverty were accepted; and a Bull of Pope Paschal II., fourteen years after the conquest of Jerusalem, confirmed the institution, received the fraternity under the special History. protection of the Holy See, and invested it with many valuable privileges.*

From A. D. 1099. to A. D. 1204. Assump- tion of a martial char- acter by its brother- hood.

The next transition of the Order to a military character is less accurately recorded; but the change may be referred in general terms to the reign of Baldwin II.: since the services in arms of its brethren under that Prince are acknowledged in a Papal Bull.† In fact, the constant jeopardy in which the Latin State was placed by the assaults of the Infidels admitted, as we have seen, of no exemption to any community in the Kingdom, whether Lay or Ecclesiastical, from actively contributing to the public defence; and the martial habits and feelings of the Crusaders of Knightly rank who had enrolled themselves in the fraternity of the Hospital, would naturally suggest the honourable preference of a personal to a deputed service. The revenues of the Order, by the increase of its endowments, were already far more than sufficient to supply the charitable uses of the Hospital; and it was magnanimously resolved to devote the surplus to the defence of the State. The former soldiers of the Cross resumed their military, without discarding their religious garb and profession; the union of Chivalric and Religious sentiment, however discordant in modern ideas, was equally congenial to the spirit of the Age, and proper to the great cause of the Crusades; and thenceforth the banner and the battle-cry of the Knights of St. John were seen and heard foremost and loudest in every encounter with the Paynim enemy. The government of the Order was vested in the Grand Master and General Council of the Knights, all of whom were required to be of noble birth; a distinct Body of regular Clergy was provided for the offices of Religion; and a third and inferior class of Sergeants, or serving brethren, both swelled the martial array of the Knightly Fraternity and discharged the Civil duties of the Hospital.‡ The renown which the Order acquired in the fields of Palestine soon attracted the nobility from all parts of Europe to its standard; admiration of both its pious and Chivalric purposes multiplied, throughout the West, endowments of land and donations of money; and the rents of nineteen thousand farms, administered by Preceptories or Commanderies, as the principal Houses were termed which the Knights established in every Christian Country, supplied a perpetual revenue to their Hospital in Palestine, and served to maintain its regular military force.§

The institution of the Order of the Temple of Solomon was of later date than the adoption of a military character by the Friars of St. John; and the Templars in their pristine state of humility and poverty owed more obligations to the Hospitallers, by whom they were originally fed and clothed, than their successors, in the days of their pride and power, cared to acknowledge or strive to repay. The original design of their association differed from that of the Hospital in having united from the outset the martial with a charitable profession. Even after the conquest of the Holy Land by the Crusaders, the roads to Jerusalem from the ports and Northern frontiers of Palestine continued to be infested by bands of Turks who indulged at once their thirst of plunder and their hatred of the Christian name, by the robbery and murder of the numerous defenceless pilgrims from Europe. The dangers which beset these poor votaries to the shrine of the Holy Sepulchre from the cruelty of the Infidels, roused the pious compassion and Chivalric indignation of Geoffroy de St. Aldemar, Hugh de Payens, and other French Knights in Palestine, who bound themselves mutually by oath to devote their lives to the relief and safe conduct of all pilgrims. As their association partook of a religious character, they followed the example of the fraternity of the Hospital by assuming the Monastic vows and garb; and when Baldwin I. marked his approval of their purpose by assigning them part of his own Palace for a residence at Jerusalem, the title which they adopted of the poor soldiery of Christ and of the Temple of Solomon, was suggested by the contiguity of their quarters to the site of that sacred edifice. The maintenance which they at first received from the charity of the Hospital of St. John was soon more independently provided by the respect which was won for their Order throughout Christendom through the grateful report of the pilgrims; with the increase of their means and numbers they aspired to extend their humbler service of guarding the roads of Palestine to the more glorious adventure of offensive warfare against the Infidels; and, thenceforth, in wealth, privileges, and power, and in heroic enterprise, the History of their rise differs little from that of the Hospitallers. The constitution of the two Orders was similar; and the number of Preceptories and estates possessed by the Templars in every Kingdom of Europe,* were immense sources of influence and opulence, second only in degree to those of the elder fraternity.† But in honourable estimation and martial renown, no superiority could with justice be claimed by either Order; and admission into the ranks of both was sought with equal avidity by the flower of the European Chivalry. In externals, the Knights of the Temple were distinguished from their rivals by their use of a long white cloak or mantle, with a straight red cross on the left breast. The banner and seal of the Order in the maturity of its splendour also bore a cross gules in a field argent: for its earlier and well-known device, presenting the singular emblem of two men on one horse, although intended by the pious humility of its founders to commemorate the original poverty of the brotherhood, was not long permitted to survive the condition which it had expressed;‡

During the reign of Baldwin II. the safety and extension of the Kingdom of Palestine were largely indebted to the prowess of the Knights of the Hospital and Temple; and before the decease of that Monarch the two Orders had become the most powerful champions of the Latin power. As Baldwin II. had no sons, he obtained the consent of his Nobles and Prelates to nominate as his successor, Foulques Count of Anjou, whom he had married to his eldest daughter Progress of the Crusades.

From A. D. 1099. to A. D. 1204. A. D. 1127.

and rapid elevation of their fraternity.

Grandeur of the Order.

The Templars.

Original design, A. D. 1118.

Reign of Foulques of Anjou, King of Jerusalem.

A. D. 1181.

* See the Statutes of the Order in Vertot, Hist. des Chevaliers de St. Jean de Jerusalem. Appendix.

† Bud.

‡ Vertot, ubi supra.

§ Matthew Paris, Hist. Major. p. 544.

* In England both Orders early acquired large possessions. The principal Preceptory of each was established in London: that of the Hospitallers at Clerkenwell, and of the Templars in Holborn, whence it was removed into Fleet-street. Stow, lib. iv. p. 62. Dugdale, Origines Jurid. c. 57.

† Both Hospitallers and Templars were prohibited from possessing any private property; but their renunciation of poverty, by a convenient interpretation, was only personal, and did not extend to their enjoying in common the enormous wealth of their Orders.

‡ For the rise of the Order of Templars see, passim, the XIIIth book of William of Tyre. Also Knighton, p. 2382, Brompton, p. 1008, and Matt. Paris, (Hist. Minor) p. 419, &c.

History.

From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

Melissinda. In his youth, Foulques had visited Palestine as a Crusader, at the head of one hundred Knights and men-at-arms, and had left so favourable an opinion of his Chivalric qualities on the mind of Baldwin that, nine years afterwards, when he had become a widower, the King invited him from France to receive the hand of the Princess. Dazzled by the prospect of a Royal alliance and a matrimonial Crown, the Count abandoned his extensive French Fiefs to his son;^{*} and on his arrival in the Holy Land, his nuptials with Melissinda were solemnized, and he was immediately acknowledged as the heir to the Throne. The death of Baldwin, which shortly ensued, gave him the undisputed possession of the Crown; and during a reign of thirteen years Foulques, without performing any brilliant achievement, sufficiently emulated the courage and virtues of his predecessors in the defence and government of the Kingdom. His decease left the State in the hands of his widow Melissinda and their son Baldwin III., then only thirteen years old, who were crowned together; and it was soon after the martial sceptre of the House of Bouillon had thus devolved upon a woman and a minor, that the Christian power in the East received the first disastrous shock from the Musulman arms. Since the death of Joscelyn de Courtenay, the defence of the Principality of Edessa had been feebly sustained by his son, who inherited neither his valour nor ability. But its safety was more fatally compromised by the selfish indifference or still more criminal treachery of the Princes of Antioch; who coolly witnessed the danger of a State which, by its position beyond the Euphrates, formed the great advanced post of the Latin settlements in Syria; and which therefore every motive of honour and policy should have impelled them to succour. Profiting by the disunion of the Christians, Zenghi, the Turkish Emir of Mosul or Aleppo, whose martial activity and skill had already rendered his power formidable during the life of Joscelyn de Courtenay, suddenly entered the State of Edessa with an overwhelming force; laid siege to its Capital; and before the levies of the Kingdom of Jerusalem could march to its relief, took the City by storm.[†]

Accession of Baldwin III.

A. D.
1144.

Fall of Edessa to the Turks.

A. D.
1145.

Universal indignation of Christendom at this loss.

The intelligence of the fall of Edessa startled the Christian residents in Palestine from lethargic indifference to an alarming discovery of the renovation of the Turkish power on that frontier; and the first burst of shame and consternation excited among the guardians of the Holy Land by the disgraceful loss and impending danger, was naturally followed by earnest solicitations for succour from Europe. Throughout every Country of Western Christendom, the appeal was received with a general enthusiasm little inferior to that which, half a century before, had stimulated the great design of the First Crusade. The martial and religious feelings of Europe were provoked to indignation by the report of the triumph of the Infidels; and this universal spirit was already prepared for a second mighty effort of fanaticism, when it was roused into action by the master mind of the Age. Of the station and character of St. Bernard, a Biographical sketch has already been given in a former Chapter;[‡] and our business in this place is only to record his principal share in promoting the Second Crusade. The report of the calamity which had befallen, and of the increasing perils which threatened, the Christian cause in Palestine affected his ardent temper with powerful emotions of religious zeal; and his resolution to preach a new Crusade was supported by the private friendship and the public wishes of Pope Eugenius III., as well as by the respect and influence which his virtues and talents had deservedly acquired throughout Europe. Not less than the distinguished part which he had already filled in Ecclesiastical affairs, do the nobility of his birth, the uniform sanctity of his life, and the really great attainments of his genius and learning, place him at an immeasurable height of personal dignity above the obscure and ignorant fanatic, who had first lighted up the flame which he now rekindled. But St. Bernard could only emulate the successful mission, though he might slight the memory,† of the Hermit Peter; the impassioned oratory of the profound Theologian could not produce more astonishing results than the rude eloquence of the Solitary of Amiens; and in the relation of its effects, the preaching of the Second Crusade forms but a copy of that of the First.

In our abstract of the reign of Louis VII. of France, will be found; an enumeration of the causes which rendered the aspect of affairs in that Country at the juncture before us peculiarly favourable to the design of St. Bernard. By his firmness in repressing the rebellious feuds of his turbulent Vassals, Louis had securely established the Royal authority; and the tranquil condition of his Kingdom left him at liberty to gratify, in a foreign and sacred enterprise, the thirst of glorious adventure natural to a young and successful Monarch. But even the strong desire of Chivalrous achievement was secondary in the mind of this religious Prince to motives of piety, however mistaken; and feelings of deeply cherished remorse for his involuntary share in the horrible catastrophe at Vitry, and of less reasonable compunction for a long disregard of the Papal anathemas, powerfully impelled Louis to offer that atonement, which a false superstition deemed most acceptable to Heaven, by embarking in the great warfare against the Infidel assailants of the Holy Land. When, therefore, St. Bernard announced his mission, it was eagerly promoted as we have seen by the French King; and in the great assembly of his Nobles and People which he convoked at Vezelay, the same spectacle was repeated, which had been witnessed at the Council of Clermont before the First Crusade. From the innumerable multitudes

Progress
of the Crusades.
From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

The Second Crusade preached by St. Bernard.

and extended by Louis VII. of France and the Emperor Conrad III.

A. D.
1146.

* That son was Geoffroy Plantagenet, the husband of the Empress Matilda, and father of our Henry II. It is strange that William of Tyre, the eulogist of Foulques, should represent him as sixty years of age when he arrived in Palestine for the second time to celebrate his nuptials with Melissinda; for the learned Benedictine Authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates (Article Comtes d'Anjou) prove that he was born only A. D. 1092; and his reign in Palestine commenced A. D. 1131. His family had long been famous for their passion of making pilgrimages to the Holy Land; and one of them, who travelled thither before the era of the Crusades, having bound his servants by oath to do whatsoever he should require, compelled them publicly to scourge his naked back before the Altar of the Sepulchre, while in penitential cries he implored the pardon of Heaven for his sins. Malmesbury, p. 307.

† Will. Tyr. p. 844—893. For the exploits of Zenghi, see also De Guignes, Hist. Gén. des Huns, vol. ii. lib. xiii., and the Arabic Writers therein abridged.

• See ch. lxxiv. of our Historical Division, p. 655, 656.

‡ In one of his extant epistles St. Bernard speaks contemptuously of his predecessor the Hermit, as vir quidam, Petrus nomine, cuius et vos (si fallor) sepe mentionem audistis, &c.; and attributes to his misconduct the destruction of the people in the First Crusade. Opera Sancti Bernardi, Ep. 363. Ed. Mabillon, Venet. A. D. 1758.

† See ch. lxxiii. p. 617.

History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Virtues of St. Bernard.

which filled the plain and covered the neighbouring heights of Veselay to their summit, cries of "the Cross, the Cross! It is the Will of God!" rent the air and interrupted the vehement appeal of the preacher; and before the assembly broke up, Louis himself, with his Queen, the too famous Eleanor of Aquitaine, and a host of the Nobility and Knighthood of his Realm, had been signed with the sacred emblem of their vows. From France, St. Bernard with indefatigable zeal proceeded into Germany; and his course from the Rhine to the Danube, and from the recesses of the Swiss mountains to the plains of Northern Italy, was everywhere signalized by the same successful exertions of his fervid zeal and impetuous eloquence. At his soul-stirring exhortations, the great Feudatory Princes of Bavaria, Bohemia, Carinthia, Piedmont, and Styria, with a crowd of inferior Chieftains, assumed the Cross; and the conversion of the Emperor Conrad III., after some struggle between the sense of political interest and of religious duty, completed the triumph of the pious orator.*

The personal motives of St. Bernard were disinterested, pure, and elevated: his zeal was equally free from all alloy of gross fanaticism, selfish ambition, or worldly vanity; and its mistaken direction was the only error which he shared with the most virtuous and devout of his contemporaries. But the intrinsic greatness of his mind is not the less perceptible through this fatal delusion; and in nothing is his superiority to the spirit of the Age in which he lived more conspicuous, than in the wisdom and humanity which tempered his enthusiasm. The first of these qualities was signally displayed in his refusal to accept the command of the intended expedition to the Holy Land, as a station which he felt and confessed his own infirmity to fill from want of martial experience and bodily health. His humane exertions to avert from the Jews in France a repetition of the horrid persecution which their fathers had suffered from the fanaticism of the first Crusaders, have already been recorded, and were extended to the protection of that unhappy people, with earnest and consistent benevolence, in Germany and other Countries. He sternly silenced, by the exertion of his delegated authority from the Pope, the preaching of a fanatical German Monk, who had endeavoured to provoke a general massacre of the Jews; and his injunctions in circular letters to the Crusaders to abstain equally from the murder and spoliation of an unoffending people, breathe the genuine Christian precepts of mercy and justice. The doctrines thus inculcated indeed were so new to his Age, that fully to appreciate the virtuous and truly pious efforts of St. Bernard in this labour of charity, they must be contrasted with the monstrous opinion then prevalent among all orders of society, that to shed the blood and despoil the wealth of Infidels was an allowable vengeance, and even a positive duty, against the enemies of God. The practical application of this inhuman and impious belief to the plunder and slaughter of a rich, usurious, and defenceless race, offered too tempting a prey to the cupidity of the bigoted populace and the yet more malignant instigation of numerous debtors, to be wholly averted even by the eloquent and powerful denunciations of the preacher whose voice had awakened all Europe to arms. Notwithstanding the anathemas of St. Bernard, the Jews were in many places robbed and murdered; and in Germany especially they were saved from extermination only by the Imperial protection.†

The presence of Louis VII. and of the Emperor Conrad III.—the first great Monarchs of the West who had assumed the Cross—seemed to invest the great enterprise in which they had engaged with a dignity superior even to that of the former Crusade. The armies which the two Sovereigns prepared to lead to the relief of Palestine comprised the national Chivalry of France and Germany, with numerous auxiliaries from England‡ and Italy; and if the statements of contemporary Writers may be credited, these united forces equalled in number the prodigious hosts of the first Holy War. The Emperor and the King were each at the head of seventy thousand mailed cavalry; their heavily armed infantry exceeded two hundred and fifty thousand; and the Clergy, other defenceless pilgrims, camp followers, women, and children, might swell the aggregate of the Crusading multitudes to nearly a million of souls.‡ From Ratisbon and Mayence, their places of rendezvous, both the German and French armies successively pursued the same route through Hungary and Bulgaria to Constantinople, which had been traversed by their predecessors in the First Crusade. Manuel Comnenus, grandson of Alexius, was now on the Byzantine throne: but the timid and treacherous policy of that Court was unchangeable; and in the apparent friendship and secret hostility, with which the Greek Emperor alternately assisted and harassed the march of the Crusaders, he faithfully copied the example of his ancestor. He engaged by Treaty that they should be received hospitably and supplied with provisions upon equitable terms: yet, in the bread which his subjects sold to them, poisonous ingredients were frequently mingled; base coin was issued expressly from the Imperial Mint to defraud the strangers in the interchange of trade; the sick whom the Crusading hosts were obliged to leave behind on their march were often murdered; their stragglers were cut off; the bridges on their route were broken down; their columns were galled with flights of arrows from ambush in every forest; and all the impediments of a desultory though unavowed warfare were cowardly opposed to their progress. When therefore the German army thus harassed arrived before the walls of Constantinople, Conrad, though he abstained from hostile retaliation, indignantly refused an interview with the Greek Emperor, and crossing the Bosphorus pursued his march through Asia Minor. But the French King, on his arrival at the Byzantine Capital, accepted the apologies and entertainment of Manuel, and suffered himself to be beguiled by the blandishments of his perfidious host, until he was roused from inaction by the

Progress
of the Crusades.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Numbers and march of the Crusading hosts.
A. D.
1147.

* Odo de Diagolo, (apud Bouquet, Recueil des Hist. Français), vol. xii. p. 91.—83. Otto Frisingensis (apud Muratori, Script. Her. Ital.) vol. vi. c. 37. These two Writers, the first a Frenchman, and the latter a German, who himself accompanied the Emperor Conrad to Palestine, form—together with the anonymous Author of the Gesta Ludovici Regis VII. (in Duchesne, vol. iv.)—our chief contemporary authorities for the transactions of their respective countrymen in the Second Crusade.

† Pfeffel, Hist. d'Allemagne, vol. i. p. 309.

‡ The recent cessation of the Civil wars of Stephen's reign induced many of the English nobility to assume the Cross, and among them Roger de Mowbray and William de Warenne. Richard Hagenot, p. 275, 276. Huntingdon, p. 394, also says that multitudo de gente Anglorum accompanied the French host; and his account is curiously confirmed by the Byzantine Chronicler Cinnamus, p. 29.

§ Will. Tyr. p. 902. Cinnamus, p. 31 and the authorities cited in Du Cange, (ad Cinnamum).

History. appalling intelligence of the destruction of the German army.*

From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.
Disastrous passage through Asia Minor.

In the march through Asia Minor, the Emperor Conrad was betrayed by his Greek guides into the hands of the Sultan of Iconium, who had assembled immense hordes of Turcomans to oppose his passage. While purposely misled into the most dangerous mountain passes of Lycaonia, the Germans were suddenly attacked on all sides; and the heavily armed Chivalry were unable either to reach their more lightly equipped assailants on the heights, or to protect the defenceless crowd of footmen from the Turkish arrows. By a desperate effort, Conrad succeeded, indeed, with a portion of his horse, in cutting a retreat through the Musliman hordes: but he was compelled to abandon the infantry and unarmed pilgrims to their fate; and nine-tenths of the whole German host are computed to have been destroyed by the shafts and scimitars of the Infidels, or to have perished of hunger and thirst in this calamitous expedition. When Conrad, with the remnant of his followers, had effected his retreat to Nice, where the French King after crossing the Bosphorus had established his camp, no doubt was left of the foul treachery of Manuel, who had not only delayed the advance of Louis by false reports of the success of his German confederates, but was also found to have maintained an intelligence with the Sultan of Iconium. As the Greek Emperor is charged with this guilt, not merely by the Latin Writers, but on the contemporary testimony of one of his own subjects,† some praise is due to the magnanimous or prudent forbearance, which induced the Crusading Monarchs to sacrifice every natural impulse of vengeance to the fulfilment of the sacred objects of their enterprise. Now advancing in concert through Asia Minor, but turning aside from the former route of the Crusaders to the sea-coast of Lydia, Conrad and Louis reached Ephesus with their forces: but there the destitution of equipments for a longer march, to which his Germans had been reduced by their defeat, obliged Conrad to transport them by sea to Palestine; and the French army alone resumed its route by land. On the banks of the Meander, Louis and his Chivalry encountered and overthrew the Turkish hosts with so tremendous a slaughter, that piles of Musliman bones in the next Age still whitened the scene of destruction. But the confidence inspired by this victory served only to lure on the negligent Crusaders to their ruin. In their continued march, the vanguard had already passed the mountains between Pisidia and Phrygia, when the rearward commanded by Louis in person, while entangled in the defiles, was suddenly assailed by innumerable swarms of Turks, who covering the surrounding precipices from thence with fragments of rock crushed and hurled whole squadrons of the French gens-d'armes into the yawning gulfs below. The surprise was so complete and dreadful, that the whole rearguard was routed and destroyed before order could be restored; and the King himself, after performing prodigies of valour, was saved only, under favour of the darkness, by climbing a tree, and with difficulty escaped almost unattended to the camp of the vanguard. After this disaster, the hope of penetrating into Syria by land was abandoned; the sea-coast was again sought; and the army reached the port of Attalia in Pamphylia. There, after incurring new horrors and losses from famine and disease, the King succeeded in procuring some Greek vessels to transport his hands of Nobles and Knights to Antioch: but he was reluctantly compelled, by the want of sufficient shipping, to abandon the inferior crowd of infantry and pilgrims on the shore. After his departure, the guard which he had left for their protection proved insufficient to resist the incessant attacks of the Turks; the people of Attalia not only shut the gates of the city against them, but massacred the defenceless sick and wounded; and the whole wretched multitude perished either by the swords of the Infidels or the more unnatural cruelty of the perfidious Greeks.*

A. D.
1148.

When the German Emperor and the French King had at last reached the shores of Palestine by sea, even the shattered remnants of their hosts supplied so considerable a reinforcement to the Christian power in Palestine, that in a general Council at Acre, whither the two Monarchs repaired to meet the King of Jerusalem and his Barons, it was resolved to undertake some enterprise worthy of the Imperial and Royal dignity. But though the recovery of the Principality of Edessa had formed the original design of the Crusade, that object was now either abandoned from conviction of the difficulties attending so distant an expedition, or postponed to more pressing considerations of immediate danger or local interest. The vicinity of Damascus rendered the continued possession of that important place by the Infidels more perilous to the safety of the Latin Kingdom than the loss of the remote city of Edessa; and the three Sovereigns of Germany, France, and Jerusalem, led their national Chivalry and the Knights of St. John and the Temple to the siege of that great strong-hold of the Turkish power in Syria. But Damascus was strongly fortified and skilfully defended; the valour of the Christians was misdirected by ignorance or paralyzed by discord and treason; and after a miserable failure, variously attributed to all these causes, the Crusading army withdrew from the walls, and retreated in shame and dishonour to Jerusalem. Thence, in despair of the efficacy of further exertions, Conrad and Louis, with an interval of a year between their several departures, both returned to Europe with the broken army of the Chivalry; and the Christian cause in Palestine was again deserted, save by the scanty bands but enduring courage of its habitual defenders.†

Such was the abortive issue of the Second Crusade. The mightiest efforts of the congregated force of Europe had been exhausted in Asia Minor; and the presence of the greatest Monarchs of Christendom in Palestine had served only to expose the weakness of their vaunted power to the eyes of the triumphant Infidels. The sacrifice of the myriads of their followers had absolutely failed to achieve a single advantage for the cause in which two great armies had perished; and after the fruitless hopes of succour which had been excited by their approach and disappointed by their failure, the guardians of the Holy Sepulchre were abandoned to sustain the tempest of Musliman warfare with diminished confidence and increasing danger. Meanwhile, from the distant banks of the Euphrates, the gathering power which had already swept away the Christian

Progress
of the Crusades
From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

Arrival of the remnant of the Crusading hosts in Palestine.

Frontier siege of Damascus.

Abortive outcome of the Second Crusade.

A. D.
1148.

Rise and progress of Musliman power in the Turks.

* Will. Tyr. p. 901—903. Cinnamus, p. 30—32.
† Nicetas, p. 33.

* Will. Tyr. p. 903—906. Gesta Ludovici, p. 395—400. Nicetas, p. 33—37.
† Will. Tyr. p. 906—914. Gesta Ludovici, p. 401—409. Otto Fris. c. 40—47. &c.

History.

From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

Reign of Baldwin
III. in Palestine.

A. D.
1153

Succession of Almeric
of the throne.
A. D.
1162.

late of Egypt.

bulwark of Edessa and was destined eventually to overwhelm the Latin Kingdom of Palestine, was continually enlarged with portentous vigour. Before the death of Zenghi, the victorious Emir or Atabec* of Aleppo, his dominions had already swelled into a considerable Empire; and, by its still further extension under his son, the great Nouredin, who added the sovereignty of Damascus to that of Aleppo, and consolidated the Musulman power in Syria under a single ruler, the frontiers of the Latin States became completely enveloped by the conquests of this formidable enemy.†

Notwithstanding, however, the failure of the Second Crusade and the increasing power of the Turks, Baldwin III., supported by the Feudal array of his Kingdom and the Knights of the Military Orders, continued throughout the remainder of his reign to uphold the Christian cause in Palestine with courage and energy. In order to protect the Northern frontiers of the Latin States from the designs of Nouredin, the King stationed himself at Antioch; and though unable to save the remnant of the Edessene territory, he succeeded in rescuing the Christian garrisons and inhabitants under a safe escort from the impending horrors of Turkish slavery. Being recalled from Antioch to repel a new invasion, in which the troops of Nouredin from Damascus had penetrated to the gates of Jerusalem, he came up with the Infidels, who had already been compelled to retreat by the bravery of the Military Orders; and inflicted on them near Jericho so total a defeat, that the whole Turkish host was either slaughtered or drowned in the waters of the Jordan. On the Southern frontiers of Palestine, the arms of the Christian Prince were subsequently still more successful against the Egyptian Musulmans; and his reduction of the important city of Ascalon, after an obstinate siege, added a new possession and bulwark to the Kingdom of Jerusalem. By these exploits and by the generous spirit with which he devoted his last years to the active defence of his people, Baldwin redeemed the reproach of some irregularities of personal conduct which had clouded his youth; without any high degree of ability, his character was graced by many noble and chivalric qualities; and he died respected even by his Infidel enemies and deeply lamented by his own subjects.‡ As he left no children, he was succeeded by his brother Almeric, whose equal mediocrity of talent was unrelieved by the same virtues, and whose temper presented an unpleasant contrast of avarice and overweening ambition. By these passions the new King, disregarding the pressure of nearer and more imminent danger from the power of Nouredin, was tempted to engage in repeated projects for the distant conquest of Egypt, which as fruitlessly exhausting the strength of the Christian Kingdom, may be numbered among the accelerating causes of its downfall.

Obeying the usual vicissitudes of the Saracen Dynasties, the Fatimite Khalifs of Egypt had for many generations sunk into abject slavery to their own Vizirs; and at the period before us the supreme authority in the Seraglio of Cairo was disputed between two powerful rivals, Shawer and Dargham. The latter prevailing, Shawer fled to the Court of Nouredin; and that Prince, glad of any occasion for extending his influence, openly protected the fugitive, and despatched a body of troops under Shiracouch, the most famous of his Turcoman Generals, into Egypt, to reinstate him in the Vizirship. The expedition was successful; Dargham was slain in battle; but Shawer, in nominally recovering his power over the helpless Khalif of Egypt, found that he was only himself a slave to the lieutenant of Nouredin. To rid himself of this new yoke, the Egyptian Vizir had recourse to the King of Jerusalem; and Almeric, who had already engaged in hostilities to exact a promised tribute from Egypt, eagerly received his overtures. The power of Nouredin was far superior to that of the Frankish Monarch: but the proximity of Palestine to Egypt enabled the Christian forces to reach Cairo by a direct march from their own frontiers; while from Damascus the interposition of the Latin States would oblige the Turkish cavalry to make a long circuit over the burning Deserts of Arabia. This advantage of situation made it easy for the King of Jerusalem, on the invitation of Shawer, to march an army into Egypt, and to besiege Shiracouch in Pelusium, before Nouredin was able to succour his lieutenant. After a long and gallant defence, the Turkish General was compelled to capitulate; but Nouredin meanwhile had made a formidable diversion by pouring his troops into the territory of Antioch; and Almeric, thus prevented from reaping the fruits of his victory, returned by rapid marches to the defence of the Latin State. At his approach, Nouredin made an artful demonstration of retreating; but his retreat was only the prelude to a sudden attack upon the exulting and negligent forces of Almeric; and the Christians, before they could recover from their surprise, were routed near Artesia with immense loss. After this ominous event, the severest defeat in the open field which the Christian forces in Palestine had sustained since their conquest of Jerusalem, Nouredin was at leisure to resume his designs upon Egypt; and the veteran Shiracouch was ordered to lead a second and more numerous army into that Country. But Almeric, stimulated by ambition and avarice, had made such vigorous efforts to repair the disaster of Artesia, that he again appeared on the Egyptian frontiers with a chosen body of the Christian Chivalry, before Shiracouch had reached the banks of the Nile. The Turkish army was exhausted by a calamitous march across the Desert; the Christian Knights were fresh and vigorous; and their valour and energy, though feebly supported by their Egyptian allies, triumphed over the superior military skill of Shiracouch. After a campaign in which the ability of the Turkish General was admirably displayed, he was a second time obliged to conclude a capitulation with Almeric and the Vizir Shawer, by which he engaged to evacuate Egypt; and both the Christian and Turkish armies returned to their own States.*

The cupidity of the King of Jerusalem was, however, after so successful an expedition, more than ever attracted by the wealth and defenceless condition of Egypt; and obtaining, through a family alliance which he had at this epoch concluded with the Greek Emperor, Manuel Comnenus, the promised aid of the Byzantine navy, he resolved to attempt the total subjugation of the Country which he had protected from the Turks. A pretence for this aggression was found or framed on the report of a secret negotiation between the Vizir Shawer

Progress
of the Crusades.

From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

War of the Christians and Turks for its possession.

A. D.
1163.

Conquest or deliverance of the Country by the former.

A. D.
1167.

Project of Almeric for the permanent subjugation of Egypt.

A. D.
1169.

* This title signifying father or protector of the Sovereign, seems to have been extorted by the Turkish Chieftains from their nominal lords, but real slaves, the Khalifs of Bagdad. D'Herbelot, Bib. Orientale. Art. Atabec.

† De Guignes, lib. xiii.

‡ Will. Tyr. p. 915—934. De Guignes, lib. xiii.

Vol. XI.

* Will. Tyr. p. 956—974. De Guignes, lib. xiii.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

and Nouredin; and Almeric, drawing together one of the most numerous and best appointed armies which had ever been assembled under the Christian banners in Palestine, suddenly crossed the Egyptian frontiers, attacked Petausim, sacked that city with horrible cruelty, and from thence advanced to the gates of Cairo. But his perfidy and the ferocious conduct of his followers roused the unwelcome Egyptians to desperation; and while the people of Cairo prepared for a vigorous defence, and implored the distant aid of their ancient Turkish enemies for their deliverance, the Vizir Shawer baid the avarice of the King of Jerusalem by the gift of an hundred thousand pieces of gold and the promise of nine times that amount as the price of peace. The greedy Almeric suffered himself to be amused by these negotiations, until Shiracouch with a large army appeared on the frontiers; and the crafty Vizir, then throwing off the mask, joined the Turks with his troops and recommenced hostilities. The Christian army was now unable to cope with the united forces of the Egyptian and Syrian Moslems; the Greek Emperor had failed in rendering the promised cooperation of his navy; and the King of Jerusalem cloncd his iniquitous scheme of conquest by a disgraceful retreat into Palestine. But the Egyptian Vizir immediately felt a victim to his own tortuous policy. For, now jealous of the influence which the victorious Turk had acquired over the feeble mind of the Khalif, he conspired against the life of so dangerous a rival; and Shiracouch, anticipating his treachery, caused him to be seized and put to death, and himself to be invested with the dignity of Vizir.*

Its failure.
A. D.
1169.

Rise of Saladin.

The new ruler of Egypt survived his elevation only two months; and his death prepared the rise of his nephew, the famous Sallah-u-deen or Saladin. This scourge of the Christian fortunes in Palestine had attended his uncle in all his expeditions into Egypt; and in the second of those campaigns had particularly distinguished himself by a skilful and resolute, though unsuccessful, defence of Alexandria. But the political genius and ambition of the young Curdish Chieftain had remained concealed from the world, and perhaps from himself, in the pursuit of licentious pleasures; and on the death of Shiracouch, when the haughty pretensions of elder leaders to the Vizirship alarmed the jealousy of the feeble Khalif of Egypt, the apparent weakness of Saladin induced that Sovereign to nominate him to the vacant dignity. If the disgust and disaffection of the disappointed Emirs at first rendered Saladin the powerless servant of the Khalif, his skilful use of the royal treasures soon purchased for him the return, and won the affections, of his former rivals; and the new Vizir from the minister easily became the master of the Khalif, and the real lord of Egypt. A single bold measure, favoured by the mortal illness of the Khalif Adhed, was now sufficient to complete the Turkish conquest of that country. One of the followers of Saladin, taking possession of the principal pulpit of Cairo, substituted the name of the Khalif of Bagdad for that of the Egyptian Sovereign in the public prayers, as the true Commander of the Faithful; the people from indifference or fear silently acquiesced in the change; and the green emblems of the sect of Ali were everywhere displaced by the black ensigns of the Abbasid tenets. The natural death of Adhed, who expired in ignorance of the event,

He completes the Turkish subjugation.

and extinguishes the Fatimid Dynasty of Egypt.
A. D.
1171.

in a few days completed this great political and religious revolution, by which the Fatimite Dynasty of Egypt was extinguished and that Country, after a schism of two Centuries, was restored to the orthodox communion of Islamism. The Abbasid Khalif of Bagdad, whose dignity as the spiritual chief of that faith was still revered, and whose nominal functions of temporal sovereignty were dictated by his Turkish masters, was made to sanctify the usurpation of Saladin, as the Vizir of the Sultan of Damascus in Egypt; and as long as Nouredin lived, the youthful conqueror was overawed by his power, and, though not without some symptoms of impatience, affected a dutiful submission to his will. But when the death of the Sultan* released him from the necessity of further dissimulation, Saladin threw off the mask; gradually extended his influence and dominion over Syria and parts of Arabia and Armenia; and deposing the young and helpless sons of Nouredin, finally united the Mussulman States from the Nile to the Tigris under his single Empire.†

By every motive of religion and policy, the new and puissant Lord of Syria and Egypt was urged to attempt the expulsion of the detested enemies of his faith from the intervening territory of Palestine; but he was long obliged to suspend his ultimate designs against the Christians, by the more immediate necessity of consolidating his dominion over his Mussulman opponents. Meanwhile, the Latin Kingdom, through its intestine disorders, was fast falling into a state of weakness, which promised to deliver it an easy prey to so vigorous an assailant. On the death of Almeric, which shortly followed that of Nouredin, the crown of Jerusalem devolved on his son, Baldwin IV.; but this Prince was afflicted with leprosy, and felt himself so unequal to the toils of government, that he committed the Regency of the Kingdom to his sister Sybilla and her second husband Guy de Lusignan, a French Knight;‡ to whom she had given her hand after the death of her first lord, a Count of Montferat. But Lusignan was destitute both of talent and courage; his despicable character and unmerited elevation provoked the scorn and insulted the

Progress
of the Crusade.

From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

Death of Nouredin.

Saladin crowned Egypt, &c. under his sceptre.
A. D.
1173.

Weakness, disorders, and danger of the Latin Kingdom.

Raise of Baldwin
IV.
A. D.
1173.

* The character of Nouredin is among the brightest in Mohammedan History; for political ability and valour were the least of his great qualities. A Mussulman Writer declares that the catalogue of his virtues would fill a volume; and among these, his justice, clemency, and piety extorted a still stronger testimony even from his Christian foes, who had sufficient reason to fear and dread so powerful and deadly an enemy. Thus William of Tyre, after numbering him among the bitterest persecutors of the Christian name and faith, adds, principis tamn justus, ceteris, proceribus, et secundum genus sua tradidit religionem. A trait of the frugal and rigid integrity with which he abstained from applying the public treasures to his domestic uses, has often been repeated from the pages of D'Herbelot. To some expensive request from the best beloved of his wives, this absolute lord of the gorgeous East would only reply, "Alas! I fear God and am no more than the treasurer of his people. Their wealth I cannot appropriate; but three shops in the city of Hems are yet my own, and those you may take, let those alone can I give." Bibliothèque Orientale, Art. Nouredin.

† Will. Tyr. p. 980—995. Ed. Orient. Art. Saladin. Also Bohadin, Vita Saladin, (Schultens), p. 1—40. Abulfeda, (in Excerpt, Schultens), p. 1—13. De Guignes, lib. xiii. (vol. ii. p. 201—211).

‡ Lusignan was a native, or at least a subject, of the French domains of our Henry II., who banished him for the treacherous murder of the Earl of Salisbury, on which he assumed the Crown, the natural resource of malefactors, and came to seek his fortune in Palestine. So contemptible was the estimation in which he was held even by his own kindred, that when his brother heard of his subsequent elevation to the throne of Jerusalem, he ironically exclaimed, "Surely, since the Barons of Palestine have made him a King, they would have made me a God if they had known me." Hoveden, p. 514.

* Will. Tyr. p. 974—980.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
and Baldwin V.
A. D.
1183.

Civil war on his death.

Guy de Lusignan, King of Jerusalem.
A. D.
1186.

Saladin attacks the Latin Kingdom.

pride of the Barons of Palestine; their disaffection was fomented by the intrigues of Raymond II., Count of Tripoli, a man himself capable of every perfidy; and the whole Kingdom was distracted by the selfish conflict of factions. To terminate their struggle the Royal leper was at length compelled to make a new settlement of his Realm, by which, abdicating the crown in favour of his infant nephew, Baldwin V., the son of Sybilla by her first husband, he committed the person of his young successor to the protection of his relative Joscelyn de Courtenay, titular Count of Edessa,* the custody of the fortresses of Palestine to the two Military Orders, and the general Regency of the Kingdom to the treacherous Count of Tripoli. Baldwin IV. survived this disposition only three years; his own decease was quickly followed by the suspicious death of his nephew; and Sybilla, supported by the Patriarch and the Grand Master of the Templars, who hated Raymond of Tripoli, obtained the joint coronation of her worthless husband and herself as King and Queen of Jerusalem. The proud and contemptuous refusal of many of the Barons to acknowledge Lusignan for their Sovereign produced a civil war, in which the Count of Tripoli, under pretence of supporting the rival claims of Isabella, sister of Sybilla, to a share in the succession, allied himself with Saladin; and these disorders were scarcely appeased by the address of Sybilla and the submission of most of the insurgent Nobles, when the fatal tempest of Musulman war burst upon the disunited and devoted State.†

As long as Saladin was occupied in establishing his authority over Egypt and Syria, the peace of the Latin Kingdom had not been much disturbed by the incursions of the Infidels; and some indecisive hostilities had been terminated by a truce. But just at the crisis when the Turkish conqueror was prepared to attempt the work of destruction which he had probably long meditated, the Christians themselves were the first to disturb the hollow pacification, which might alone have deferred the hour of their ruin; and a just occasion of war was afforded by the aggressions of a predatory Baron, Reginald de Chatillon, who surprised a frontier castle belonging to the Musulmans on the borders of the Arabian Desert, intercepted and plundered their caravans between Egypt and Mecca, and insolently defied the vengeance of the Sultan. Saladin demanded redress of the King of Jerusalem for these outrageous violations of the existing peace: but the government of Lusignan was either too feeble or too corrupt to punish the lawless marauder; and on a refusal of justice, Saladin invaded Palestine at the head of eighty thousand Turcoman horse and foot. The siege of the castle of Tiberias was the first signal operation of the Musulman host; and for the relief of so important a fortress the whole strength of the Christian States was hastily collected. But, including the army of the Military Orders, the King of Jerusalem could now assemble under his standard no more than twelve hundred Knights and twenty thousand foot; and the disproportion of his numerical force was aggravated by his own incapacity and cowardice, as well as by the discord and treason* which prevailed in his camp.

On the plain of Tiberias the hostile armies drew out for a conflict, of which the event was to decide the fate of the Christian Kingdom. Few intelligible particulars are related of the sanguinary battle which followed: but those few attest the superior skill of Saladin, who in the first day's encounter drove his opponents into a situation destitute of water; by setting fire during the night to some neighbouring woods increased their intolerable sufferings from the drought and heat of a Syrian summer's night; and on the following morning overwhelmed and massacred their exhausted and fainting host. Not only was the slaughter of the cavaliers and soldiery exterminating, but all the principal leaders of the Christian host were the victims or prizes of this fatal field: the Grand Master of the Hospitalers was mortally wounded and died in his flight; and the chief of the rival Order of the Temple, together with the Marquis of Montferrat, Reginald of Chatillon, the worthless Lusignan himself, and many of his Nobles and Knights, became the captives of Saladin. The scene which ensued is too characteristic of manners to be omitted in this place. When the trembling Lusignan, and Chatillon the guilty provoker of the war, were conducted to the tent of the conqueror, Saladin generously reassured the craven King of his safety by the proffer of a cup of iced water, the Eastern pledge of hospitality. Lusignan wished to pass the cup to Chatillon: but the Sultan sternly declared that the impious marauder, who had so often insulted the Prophet of Islam, must now either acknowledge his law, or die the death which his crimes had merited. With more virtue than his life had promised, Chatillon spurned the condition of apostasy; and a blow from the scimitar of the ferocious Sultan himself was the immediate signal for his murder. With less excusable cruelty, while he spared his other noble prisoners, Saladin in his fanatical hatred of the Religious Orders, or his dread of their prowess, offered the same alternative of apostasy or death to the Knights of St. John and of the Temple who had fallen into his hands. To a man, these devoted champions of the Cross, two hundred and thirty in number, proved the sincerity of their faith; and the victory of the Moslems was stained by the cold-blooded murder of the whole body.†

The disastrous effects of the battle of Tiberias were immediately felt throughout the Latin Kingdom: for all of the principal fortresses had been drained of their garrisons to swell the ranks of the army; and Tiberias itself, Caesarea, Acre, Jaffa, and Berituss, rapidly fell before the arms of the conqueror. Tyre was alone preserved through the heroic efforts to which the citizens were

* By some of the Latin writers, the destruction of the Christian army is ascribed to the treason of the Count of Tripoli, the enemy both of Lusignan and of the Grand Master of the Temple. Mr. Mills (Hist. of the Crusades, vol. i. note L.) considers the previous favourable mention of the Count by William of Tyre, and the silence of Ralph Crompton, whose Chronicle is contained in the fifth volume of Martene, and who was in Palestine at the time of the battle of Tiberias, as a satisfactory refutation of the charge. But the earlier silence of the Count of Tripoli with Saladin (Bernardus Thesaur. c. 140.) is undisputed; and his sacrifice of the Christian cause to party or personal hatred on that occasion is surely sufficient to warrant the worst inference from his subsequent conduct.

† Bernardus Thesaur. c. 147—151. Contin. Will. Tyr. p. 590—600. Jacobus a Vitrico, Hist. Hierosol. p. 1117, 1118. (in Græc. Dei per Francos) Hierosol. p. 636—637. D'Hierbiot, Art. Saladin (vol. iii. p. 176, 177. &c.) Bohadin, p. 40—68. Abulfeda, p. 32.

Progress
of the Crusades.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Battle of Tiberias.
A. D.
1187.
Victory of Saladin.

* This Joscelyn de Courtenay was the grandson of the hero, and the last of the three Counts of Edessa who bore the same name. After the loss of the Edessene territory, and the marriage of his sister with Almeric, the Royal favour had invested him with extensive Fiefs in the Kingdom of Palestine; but leaving no son, the male line of the Asiatic branch of the Courtenays became extinct on his death. Lignage d'Outremer, c. xvi.

† Will. Tyr. p. 593, ad fin. Flaggon, (continuator of William of Tyre, in Martene, Fr. Scriptorum Coll. vol. v.) p. 583—590. Bernardus Thesaurarius, (apud Munsteri Scip. Rer. Hist. vol. vii.) c. 140—147.

"History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

inspired by the firmness of a young cavalier, son to the captive Marquis of Montferrat. But Saladin would not suffer any secondary object to arrest his great design upon the Christian Capital; and turning aside from the walls of Tyre, he marched to the siege of the Holy City. Jerusalem was already crowded with fugitives from every quarter of Palestine: but the number of warriors within its gates was small, and their commander was a timid woman. Queen Sybilla, herself distracted with sorrow and apprehension, was more solicitous for her own safety and that of her captive consort, than for the public defence; and dismay and discord reigned within the place. The first summons of Saladin for its surrender was indeed rejected: but when the siege was formed, the resistance was feeble or ineffectual; and in fourteen days, the Turks, despite of the sallies and efforts of the garrison, had advanced their works and engines to the foot of the rampart and undermined the walls. A desire to capitulate was then expressed: but Saladin, in his fury at the refusal to accept his proffered terms, had sworn to execute a dreadful vengeance upon the Christians for the Moslem blood which their ancestors had shed at the capture of the City in the First Crusade. He now therefore received the proposal of a capitulation with bitter contempt; and he only listened to the suggestions of mercy, when his burst of passion was spent, and the suppliant Christians left him to dictate the terms of surrender. He then consented to spare the lives of the inhabitants, and promised a safe-conduct for the Queen, her Nobles, and soldiery to Tyre: but declared that the remaining population of Jerusalem should become slaves, unless they were ransomed at the rate of ten crowns of gold for each man, half that sum for each woman, and a single piece for every child.

Generosity of Saladin.

As soon as these terms had been accepted by the submission of the vanquished, Saladin exhibited traits of a generous humanity which might have been little anticipated from the cruelty with which he had recently stained the victory of Tiberias; and his conduct at Jerusalem well merits the eulogy of an enemy, that he was in nothing but in name a barbarian. He not only performed his promises with a religious fidelity, but exceeded their fulfilment by a full measure of benevolence. When the weeping female train of the Queen issued from the gates of Jerusalem, his spirit melted even unto tears at the spectacle of their misery: he advanced to meet the mourners; attempted to console the Princess with the courteous sympathy of a warrior of Chivalry; released the husbands and children of all her train without ransom; and even dismissed them laden with presents. Nor did his generosity end here: for he accepted a price very much beneath the stipulated sum for the freedom of the Christian poor; and even liberated so many of his other captives gratuitously, that the total number who remained in bondage did not much exceed ten thousand, out of a population which is said to have amounted to one hundred thousand. These better feelings of his nature achieved a more difficult triumph over even the fanaticism which was usually his master passion: for learning the humane attentions which the Knights of the Hospital bestowed upon the sick, he allowed several brethren of an Order, which he detested and found ever in arms against him, to remain in the city a sufficient time for the accomplishment of their pious and charitable offices.*

* Bernardus, c. 151—167. Cont. Wll. Tyr. p. 601—613. Hoveden, p. 637—645. D'Herbelot, ubi supra. Bohadin, p. 68—75. Abulbeda, p. 39—43.

When the Queen and her train had been safely dismissed, the magnanimous victor made his entry into Jerusalem in triumphant and splendid procession. The great Mosque of Omar, on the site of Solomon's Temple, which had been converted into a Christian Church, was immediately consecrated anew to the worship of Islam, after its pavement and walls had been washed with Damascene rose water; the golden cross which surmounted the dome of the Church of the Sepulchre was taken down and for two days dragged through the streets; and after a possession by the Christians of eighty-eight years, Jerusalem was again defiled by the religion and empire of the votaries of Mohammed. Nazareth, Bethlehem, Ascalon, Sidon, quickly followed the fate of the Capital; the Principality of Antioch was only spared on the ignominious condition of tribute to the Sultan; and of all the possessions of the Christians in Palestine, the seaport of Tyre was almost the only place of importance which was saved from the wreck of their fortunes. But to that city all the Christian garrisons which capitulated had been permitted to retire: the whole remaining strength of the Latin Chivalry of Palestine was contained within its walls; and when the Turkish army a second time appeared before the place, it was again so bravely defended under the guidance of Conrad of Montferrat, that the conqueror of Jerusalem was compelled to retire from a fruitless siege. The grateful people resolved to bestow the sovereignty of their city upon their brave leader; and when Guy of Lusignan, having obtained his liberation, attempted to enter the place, they refused to admit him within the walls, or to acknowledge further allegiance to the man, on whose incapacity and cowardice they laid the ruin of the Christian cause. Lusignan indeed had only obtained his release by a solemn renunciation of his crown to Saladin; and the Sultan, satisfied with this vain confirmation to the title of conquest, had returned to enjoy his glory at Damascus: when he was roused from a brief season of repose by the alarming report that the nations of Europe, burning with ardour to avenge the shame of the Christian defeat, and the loss of the Sepulchre of Christ, were again about to precipitate themselves upon the shores of Palestine.*

The news of the Fall of Jerusalem had filled all Western Christendom with horror and grief. By the superstitious piety of the Age, the apathetic indifference which had permitted the hallowed scenes of Human Redemption again to be profaned with the triumph of the enemies of God, was deeply felt as an offence, which merited and would provoke the wrathful judgments of Heaven. But after the first shock of the intelligence, the general consternation and despair were at once succeeded by a burst of enthusiasm, equally congenial to the fanatical and martial state of society. All the principal Sovereigns of Europe, except those of Spain, who * Bernardus, c. 167—177. Coggeshal, p. 811, 812. Hist. Hierosol. (in Gesta Dei, &c.) p. 1150—1169.

† Henry II. of England and Philippo-Auguste of France met and received the Cross together near Gisors; and the English King appears to have been earnest in his intention of undertaking the Crusade, until prevented by the second rebellion of his Sons. At a Great Council which he assembled at Gidington, in Northamptonshire, it was agreed that a tenth of all rents and moveables should be levied from the clergy and laity of the Realm for the service of the expedition; and by this means the King obtained seventy thousand pounds from his Christian subjects; while he extorted the enormous sum, for those days, of sixty thousand more from the Jews in his dominions, at the rate of a fourth of all their pos-

Progress
of the Crusades.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Fall of Jerusalem
by Saladin.
October 2.
A. D.
1197.

Effects of this event in Europe.

See Times Caravan.

History. found sufficient exercise for their zeal against the Musliman power in that Peninsula—immediately vowed to lead their National forces to the recovery of Jerusalem: but even their earnest preparations were too tardy for the popular impatience; and myriads of their subjects, thronging from every Country to the ports of the Mediterranean, took shipping at their private charge and hastened to the shores of Palestine. The chief means of transport were, as usual, supplied by the Maritime Republics of Italy; but numerous bands of pilgrims, embarking from the ports of the Baltic, the North Seas, and the British Channel, from thence accomplished the whole maritime passage to the Asiatic coast.*

Arrival of its first suc- By the arrival at Tyre, in quick succession, of all these Crusaders, led by many Noblemen and Prelates of distinction, the imbecile King of Jerusalem soon found himself at the head of a numerous army; and when he was encouraged or impelled by the renovated strength and ardent zeal of his followers to advance from Tyre and lay siege to Acre, the numbers of the Christian host before the walls of that important city rapidly swelled to one hundred thousand men. The danger of a fortress which, by its position between the sea and the great central valley of Palestine, may be regarded as the maritime key of the whole Country, roused Saladin from his inaction; and while the strength of the fortifications and the valour of a numerous Musliman garrison, defied all the efforts of the Crusaders, the Sultan himself, arriving in the adjacent plain at the head of a mighty host, enveloped their beleaguer and harassed them with perpetual though desultory assaults. The Christians, in their turn, were reduced to the necessity of standing on the defensive; their camp was diligently fortified; and such was the strength and completeness of the works with which they surrounded it, that in the hyperbolic language of the East, the Muslims declared not even a bird could penetrate the lines. By sea the contest was maintained with equal obstinacy; for the naval forces of the combatants were so nicely balanced, that, by each successive reinforcement, either party was enabled to relieve the garrison of Acre, or to refresh the wants of the besiegers. The latter indeed suffered so dreadfully from famine, disease, and the incessant vicissitudes of combat, that above three hundred thousand Crusaders are computed to have perished before the walls and in the plain of Acre; and the losses of the Muslims from the same causes were probably inferior only in degree. But, on both sides, this frightful consumption of human life was continually fed by new arrivals; and during nearly two years the strength of Christendom and Islam was concentrated and exhausted in an indecisive conflict before the single city of Acre.†

March of the Empe- Meanwhile, the great Monarchs of the West were rathror Frederic gathering their national powers for the Third Crusade.
Barbarossa Foremost in preparation, as in dignity among them, to the East.

was the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa, in whom age had no power either to quench the thirst of glory or to chill the fire of religious enthusiasm. But the Chivalrous devotion of Frederic was regulated by those prudent qualities of a great commander, which had been matured in forty years of warfare; and while he boldly resolved to take the same route through the East of Europe and Asia Minor, which had been found so disastrous to former hosts of Crusaders, his provident and skilful arrangements showed how attentively he had studied the tremendous lessons of their failure. No individual was permitted to join in the sacred enterprise who was unable to furnish the means of his own support for a whole year; and the march from the confines of Germany to the shores of the Hellespont was conducted with the strictest regularity and discipline. The numbers and composition of the host were worthy of the Imperial name and power. Besides his own son, the Duke of Swabia, Frederic was attended by the Dukes of Austria and Moravia, by above sixty other Princes and great Lords of the Empire, and by fifteen thousand Knights, the flower of the Teutonic Chivalry. Their mounted attendants swelled the total array of cavalry to sixty thousand; and the infantry, exclusive of unarmed pilgrims, numbered one hundred thousand men. Throughout their passage over the Greek dominions, the German host encountered a repetition of precisely the same course of treacherous hostility, under the hollow semblance of amity, which the Byzantine Court and people had pursued in the previous Crusades: but the vengeance of his troops was generally restrained by the magnanimous or prudent forbearance of Frederic; and though he resented the perfidy of the reigning Emperor of the East, Isaac Angelus, by refusing to visit Constantinople as a guest, he peaceably transported his formidable host across the Hellespont. The subsequent passage through Asia Minor was a yet severer trial of Frederic's patience and ability: but his genius surmounted every obstacle of climate and warfare; and the march of the Imperial army was effected with far superior order, success, and reputation, to that of any preceding host of Crusaders. The sufferings of a route through burning and waterless deserts admitted indeed of little mitigation; and thousands of the Germans sank under fatigue, agonizing thirst, and the perpetual assaults of the Turcoman hordes, which hung upon their flanks and rear. But the firmness of the Teutonic array repulsed every attack, and prevented any general disaster; and Frederic not only defeated the Sultan of Iconium, but stormed his Capital and compelled him to sue for peace. Having thus overborne all opposition, the aged hero pursued his way in unmolested rear, and triumphant ardour; until he lost his life in the little Cilician stream of the Calycadnus, either by a fall from his horse, or by imprudently bathing in the icy waters of that mountain torrent. The consequences of this event proved how largely his followers had been indebted for their success to the greatness of his personal qualities. The Infidels, recovering from the terror inspired by his name and actions, immediately renewed their hostilities on the report of his death; and thenceforth the German army was incessantly harassed by attacks, and nearly disorganized by famine, sickness, and the efforts of the enemy. Thus, although Frederic's son, the Duke of Swabia, who succeeded to the command, was neither deficient in courage nor ability, so dreadful were the losses of the Crusaders that, before they reached the Progress of the Crusades.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

His triumphant career, and death.
A. D.
1190.

missions. Gervase, p. 1529. Hoveden, p. 644. This tax of one-tenth, under the name of the Saladin tithe, was imposed by general consent throughout Europe; and though originally proposed to last only for one year, was perpetuated, by the cupidity of the Papal See, into a claim upon the tenth of all Ecclesiastical benefices.

* Bernardus Thesaur. c. 177, 178. Benedictus Abbas Petrobergensis, p. 495, 496. Hoveden, p. 636—640. Hist. Hierosol. p. 1170. † Bernardus Thesaur. c. 179. Hist. Hierosol. p. 1170—1172. Bohadin, (in vita Saladin.) p. 180. Vivesceti, ubi infra, p. 427.

History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Arrival of the German army before Acre.
Institution of the Order of Teutonic
Knights.

Syrian confines, their numbers were reduced to one-tenth of their original force. Their array was still, however, sufficiently formidable, on their arrival at Antioch, to deliver that Principality from the oppression of Saladin, whose troops retired at their approach; and from thence the gallant Duke of Swabia, with unbroken spirit, led the remains of the German army to reinforce the Crusaders before Acre: but it was only to perish himself of disease, with some thousands of his devoted and way-worn followers, under the walls of that city.*

The arrival of the German Chivalry before Acre was followed by the memorable institution of a martial Order of Religious Knighthood, which, emulating the design of the fraternities of St. John and of the Temple, and surviving the original object of its creation for the defence of Palestine, was fated to perform no inconsiderable part in the subsequent History of Northern Europe. Above half a Century before the loss of Jerusalem, a German Crusader and his lady had founded hospitals in that Capital for poor pilgrims of both sexes of their nation; and when subsequent endowments had enriched these houses, the male brethren were moved by the example of the two great Orders to devote themselves to military as well as charitable services. But their efforts had obtained little distinction; and their fraternity was dissolved by the expulsion of the Christians from Jerusalem. Its purposes were now recalled to the National attention by the private charity of some individuals among the German army, who supplied the want of regular hospitals by opening their tents before Acre for the reception of their sick and wounded countrymen; and a number of Knights joining their benevolent association, the Duke of Swabia seized the occasion to incorporate them for the National honour into a regular Order of Religious Chivalry, in avowed imitation of those of the Hospital and Temple. A Papal Authority approved the design, invested the new Order with the same privileges as its elder co-fraternities, and ordained the Rule of St. Augustin for its government. A white mantle with a black cross was appointed for the garb of the brotherhood, who were divided into three classes of noble cavaliers, priests, and sergeants, all exclusively of German race; and thenceforth under the title of the Teutonic Knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem, the Order worthily aspired to an equality in duties and honour with the two great martial fraternities of Palestine.†

Preparations and voyage, of Philippe-Auguste of France, and Richard I.
of England.

While the German army was still threading its toilsome march through the deserts and mountain passes of Asia Minor, the Sovereigns of France and England had availed themselves of the maritime position and resources of their States to escape the same dangers and fatigues by a naval passage to the Syrian shores. Both Philippe-Auguste and Richard Cœur de Lion were in the full pride of youthful ambition, impatient for Chivalric distinction, and actuated far more by the thirst of glory than by the religious spirit of the Age. Interchanging vows of eternal friendship, which were as passionately broken in the first moment of jealous excitement, they had agreed to combine their forces for the sacred expedition; and on the plain of Vezelay in France, they reviewed a gallant and well-equipped host, which amounted to one hundred thousand men of both Nations and of all arms. Conducting their march in concert as far as Lyons, the two Monarchs separated at that city, after naming the port of Messina in Sicily as the place of reunion for their combined armaments: Philippe leading the French forces to embark at Genoa; and Richard proceeding to Marseilles with his army, there to expect the arrival of his fleet* from England. But his impatience would brook no delay; and finding that his own navy had not reached that port, he immediately hired a few vessels for the conveyance of his suite, sailed for the Italian coast, and after rashly exposing himself to several dangerous adventures,† crossed into Sicily. Meanwhile the English fleet, after touching at Lisbon on its way and successfully assisting in the defence of Santarem against a Mussulman army, reached the Mediterranean in safety, received the land forces on board at Marseilles, and entered the port of Messina some days before the arrival either of Philippe or Richard himself.‡

In Sicily both Monarchs wintered with their forces; and here several circumstances arose to foment into hatred, those feelings of ambitious rivalry which naturally sprang from their conflicting pride and pretensions. Against Tancred, the reigning King of Sicily,§ Richard had several causes of resentment, for the detention in prison of his sister Joan, relict of William II., the late Sovereign of the Island, and a refusal either to restore her dower, or to pay legacies which her husband had bequeathed to the English Crown. To enforce redress for these injuries, Richard had recourse to very violent proceedings: seized a castle, on his sister's release, for her residence, took military possession of other posts, and allowed his troops to commit many excesses. While the French King was interposing as a mediator, the citizens of Messina were provoked to attack the English, and after a bloody engagement, in which the latter prevailed, Richard allowed them to sack the city, and planted his banners on its walls. Philippe was justly offended at an outrage, which in effect, as he resided in Messina, left him a prisoner in the hands of an ally who was also his Vassal; and Richard was at last induced to appease him by withdrawing his troops. The submission of Tancred to all the demands of the English Monarch restored the general peace; and

Preparation of
the Crown.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204

* Before his departure from Normandy, Richard promulgated a code of regulations for the government of his fleet, which, as illustrative of the rude principles of marine jurisprudence adopted in that Age, would be worthy of a place in our naval history. A murderer was to be tied to the corpse of his victim and cast with it into the sea; or if the crime were committed on shore, to be buried in the same grave with the dead body. A simple blow was to be punished by the immersion of the offender thrice in the sea; but if blood were drawn, by the loss of his right hand; abusive language by a fine. A thief was to have his head shaved, tarred and feathered; and in that state to be set on shore at the first opportunity. Hoveden, p. 666.

† On one occasion, when travelling in Southern Italy with a single attendant, he entered a cottage to seize a falcon which he heard was detained there: for it seems that no "base churl" might without offence possess a bird trained for the exclusive sport of the Chivalric Order. The peasants presumed to resist his violence; and in the scuffle, as he struck one of them, who had drawn a dagger upon him, with the flat of his sword, the weapon broke; and he was compelled to defend himself with stones until he effected his retreat to a neighbouring Monastery. Hoveden, p. 672.

‡ Hoveden, p. 664-673. Galfredi a Vinesauf, Itinerarium Regis Anglorum Richardi, &c. in Terram Hierosol. (apud Gale, Scriptores Hist. Anglican. vol. ii.) p. 247-308.

§ Vide p. 644 of this volume.

* Hist. Hierosol. p. 1156-1163. Godfridi Monachi Annales, p. 348-356. Tageno, p. 407-416. (Both in the second volume of Struve's edition of the Rerum German. Scriptores of Freher.)

† Jacobus a Vit. p. 1083.

History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Richard generously sent Philippe twenty thousand ounces of gold, as the moiety of the sum which he compelled the Sicilian Prince to pay in satisfaction of his claims. He also loaded both English and French Knights with presents; and on Christmas day feasted the whole Chivalry of the two Nations, and dismissed every individual with some largess apportioned to his rank. His prodigal dissipation by such means of the treasures which had been wrung from his subjects before his departure on the Crusade, exalted his popularity in both armies far above that of his more provident or less wealthy rival; and formed an additional source of jealousy to Philippe. A new ground of quarrel between the two Monarchs was soon created by the intelligence that Richard, disregarding his engagement to marry Alice or Adelaïs,* sister of Philippe, was about to espouse the Princess Berengaria, daughter of Sancho, King of Navarre, who, in effect, soon after arrived in Sicily, escorted by the Queen-mother, Eleanor of England. After much dispute, Philippe at last consented to release Richard from his contract upon his promise to pay ten thousand marks, and to restore Alice with the castles which had been assigned as her dower.†

Their fruds being thus terminated by a hollow reconciliation, Philippe, on the return of Spring, was the first to depart with his forces from the Sicilian shores, and arrived without accident at the Christian camp before Acre: but Richard was less fortunate or prudent. Off the coast of Crete, his fleet was dispersed by a storm; and at Rhodes his fiery temper was roused by intelligence that two of his vessels, which had been wrecked on the shores of Cyprus, were plundered and the crews detained in captivity. To revenge this injury he sailed for Cyprus; and having in vain demanded reparation of Isaac, a Prince of Comnenian race, who had revolted against the Byzantine throne and seized the government of the Island, the English Monarch disembarked his troops, took Lymesol, the tyrant's Capital, by storm, and being assisted by the defection of the Islanders, compelled him to surrender at discretion. The English Prince made an ungenerous use of his victory: for he threw the fallen usurper into chains, which, with a mockery of respect, were forged of silver; grievously taxed the Cypriots, who had welcomed him as their deliverer; and asserted the title of conquest to the lordship of their Island. After celebrating at Lymesol his nuptials with Berengaria, which had been deferred in Sicily on account of the season of Lent, Richard finally sailed for Acre. The numbers of his land forces have not been recorded; but the magnitude of the whole armament may be estimated by the enumeration of his fleet, which consisted of fifty galleys of war, thirteen large store-vessels, and above one hundred other transports filled with horses and men. On the short voyage from Cyprus to the Syrian shore, the English navy intercepted an enormous troop-ship of Saladin, having on board, according to the Latin Chroniclers, for the reinforcement of the garrison of Acre, the incredible number of fifteen hundred men, and well supplied with stores of the Greek fire. The great bulk and lofty sides of this vessel long defied the attacks of the light galleys of the Christians: but she was at length carried by boarding; her hull being either scuttled, during the conflict, by the desperation of her own crew, or pierced by the beaks of the English galleys, she sank with all her stores; and every soul of the Infidels, except thirty-five, was either massacred or drowned.*

A few days afterwards Richard disembarked his army before Acre; and his arrival was greeted in the Christian camp with enthusiastic rejoicings. Notwithstanding the previous junction of the King of France and his forces, the operations of the long protracted siege had continued to languish: but the English Monarch had no sooner landed his battering engines than, despite of an illness under which he was labouring, he caused the attack to be pressed with the utmost vigour; and as well by his personal example as by prodigal rewards, animated the whole Crusading host with a new spirit. Every effort of Saladin to rout the besiegers or relieve the place was repulsed; and at length, after an heroic resistance, finding their defences shattered on every side and their numbers daily diminished, the exhausted and despairing garrison obtained the reluctant permission of the Sultan to capitulate. Upon condition that Saladin should restore the wood of the true cross which he had taken in Jerusalem, release fifteen hundred chosen Christian captives, deliver up Acre, and ransom the garrison by the payment of two hundred thousand pieces of gold, the Monarchs of France and England agreed to spare the lives of all the Muslims in the place. Upon these terms the city was surrendered; and the banner of the Cross was again planted on its ruined walls. The garrison and inhabitants, with the exception of some thousand hostages, were permitted to depart unmolested; and the Sultan immediately broke up his camp and withdrew from the vicinity of the captured fortress. His subsequent failure, from reluctance or more probably from inability, to pay the ransom of the prisoners within the stipulated period, was the signal for a tragedy horribly characteristic of the barbarous and fanatical spirit of Crusading warfare. The Musliman hostages, to the number of above five thousand, being led out from the city to the French and English camps, were slaughtered in cold blood; and Richard himself, in a letter still extant, boasted of the massacre as an acceptable service to Heaven. The Sultan was not slow to revenge this cruelty in the blood of his Christian captives; and on both sides repeated butcheries continued to darken the mutual hatred of the combatants.†

Progress
of the Crusades.
From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.
Arrival of the two Monarchs before Acre.
A. D.
1191.

Surrender of that city.

* Hoveden, p. 698—692. Vinesauf, p. 316—329. Bohadin, p. 166. But the Musliman Historian rates the troops on board this great store-ship at only six hundred and fifty, still indicating in the vessel a bulk very unusual for the times.

† Hoveden, p. 692—698. Vinesauf, p. 329—346. Bohadin, p. 180—188. Hoveden, indeed, declares that the massacre of the Christian captives by Saladin preceded that of the Turkish hostages by Richard; but Bohadin says otherwise; and it is not probable that the Sultan would thus have provoked the destruction of his people, whom he had wished to save. The expressions in Richard's letter, as given in Hoveden, (p. 698) are, See, ut decuit, fecimus expirare; and no Writer in that fanatical age seems to have imagined that even the cold-blooded slaughter of Infidels could be otherwise than meritorious and acceptable to Heaven. The old Romance of Richard Cœur de Lion goes yet a step further: for it exaggerates the glorious deed into the murder of 60,000 Infidels; and the Author, imagining that the subject deserved to be associated with pleasurable emotions, thus prefaces the tale of the butchery with a poetical descant on the charms of the vernal season.

"Merry is, in time of May
When fowls sing in her lay Flowers on apple trees and perry Small fowls sing merry
Ladies strew her lovers

With red roses and lilly flowers," &c.
Ellis. Specimens of Metrical Romances, vol. ii. p. 273.

* Vide p. 624—684 of this volume.

† Hoveden, p. 673—688. Vinesauf, p. 306—316.

History.

From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204 Retirement of Philippe-Auguste
from the Crusade.

The capture of Acre was hailed by the Christians as a glad omen of the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre. But these sanguine anticipations were shortly chilled by the retirement of the King of France from the Crusade. The causes of this secession, for which severe illness afforded some plea, have been sought in feelings of jealousy at the superior glory won during the siege of Acre by the liberality and prowess of his Royal Associate. The eminent political abilities of Philippe-Auguste, indeed, though they placed him in sober estimation at an immeasurable distance above his irrational and fiery rival, were of little weight in the fields of Palestine; the martial qualities by which he was himself distinguished, would sustain no comparison with the transcendent personal heroism of the "Lion-hearted" Plantagenet; and he who, in the annals of Europe, figures as the ablest Monarch and most renowned Conqueror of his Age, is discerned only through the wild Romance of the Crusades as the envious or recreant deserter from a Holy War. But the withdrawal of Philippe was produced less by any inconsistency in his own character, than by the intemperate conduct of Richard. The reckless spirit with which the English King had already wasted so much of the season for action in Sicily and Cyprus, and the intolerable arrogance of pretensions that would brook no control, alike foreboded any but a happy issue to the confederacy of which he was so puissant a member; and unless the King of France had been prepared to submit unconditionally to his capricious and haughty dictation, their separation might alone avert an open rupture, and the total ruin of the Crusade. The real disgrace of Philippe was his subsequent perfidy in attacking the dominions of his absent rival, contrary to the solemn oath which Richard exacted from him on his departure: but the interests of the Crusade itself were promoted by his abandoning to his rival the undivided possession of the supreme command; and, as an evidence of his sincerity in the cause, he left with Richard ten thousand of his best troops under the conduct of the Duke of Burgundy.*

Exploits of Richard in Palestine.

After the retirement of the French King, Richard prepared to resume the design of the War,† and still found himself able to muster nearly thirty thousand English, French, and German warriors under the standard of the Cross. He conducted the advance of this combined force from Acre in a Southerly direction upon Jaffa along the sea-shore; and in the order of his march no inconsiderable share of military skill and discipline is observable. Nearest to the coast, and in communication with the English fleet, which attended the expedition with supplies of provisions and stores, were the camp train and followers; while the army itself, covering these accessories, moved in five divisions: the Templars in the van, the Hospitaliers closing up the rear; and the archers and other light armed foot on the left or outward flank to check with their missiles the desultory but galling onsets of the Turkish cavalry. By day, clouds of these horsemen hovered around the front, flank, and rear of the Christians, and harassed their march with incessant assaults: by night, Saladin encamped in their vicinity, and broke the repose of the wearied soldiery with frequent alarms. But the firm array, the unshaken valour, and the patient determination of the Europeans, exhausted all the artifices of Asiatic warfare. The daily march was accomplished in compact array, and with a slow but resolute advance; at sunset the army regularly halted; and thrice during the night the loud voices of the heralds, breaking the deep silence of the camp with solemn injunction to remember the Holy Sepulchre, roused the slumbering sentinels of the religious host to watchfulness and prayer. At length Saladin, reinforced by new swarms of the Moslems from all parts of his Empire, and finding every desultory attempt to arrest the progress of the Christians unavailing, resolved upon one mighty effort to accomplish their total destruction. On the morning of the sixteenth day after the advance of the Crusaders from Acre, the brazen kettle-drum of the Sultan sounded the attack; and the whole Infidel host was suddenly precipitated, in one tremendous charge, upon the Christian array. So rapid and furious was the onset, so vastly superior were the numbers of the assailants, and so overwhelming the force and weight of the shock, that the small squadrons of the Crusaders, enclosed within their own infantry, were for a time crushed together from all sides by the pressure. Galled by the Turkish arrows, the Chivalry impatiently demanded permission to extricate themselves by a charge: but the fiery Plantagenet, now alone calm, cool, and collected, and foreseeing a decisive victory, restrained the impetuosity of his Knights, until he observed that the quivers of the Infidels were emptied and their strength exhausted. Then, causing the infantry to open out, he led and let loose the Christian Chivalry in all directions upon the wavering enemy. The whole Turkish host, unable to resist the vigour and strength of these steel-clad squadrons, broke and fled to the adjacent hills. So successful and sanguinary were the charge and pursuit, that above twenty Emirs and seven thousand of the flower of the Turkish cavalry were slain on the field; and the result justified the boast of Richard that, in forty campaigns, the veteran Sultan had never sustained so severe a defeat;‡

Progress
of the Crusade.
From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

Victory over Saladin near Asotus.

Subsequent operations.

After this signal victory the Crusaders, without further molestation by the Infidels, pursued their triumphant march to Jaffa; and Saladin having wisely destroyed the works of fortresses which he was hopeless of preserving, they took possession both of that city and Casarea, with other dismantled castles in their vicinity. It is said that Richard desired at once to have followed up his success by advancing against Jerusalem, but was prevented by the factious opposition of the French Barons: who, seconded by the wish of the army to repose from their fatigues, insisted upon the necessity of first rebuilding

* Hoveden, p. 697. Vinesauf, p. 344. That Richard, however, was greatly incensed at his rival's desertion is evident from the intemperate expressions of his letter, already quoted in p. 625 of this Volume.

† He had some difficulty in inducing his army to quit the licentious pleasures of Acre: a city so abounding, according to Vinesauf, vino propinquo et pulcherrimis, that by deep potations the countenances of the gravest warriors in the host had contracted a disgraceful rubeumity.

* The heroic fortitude of the Crusaders is attested by the unsuspicious evidence of an enemy and an eye-witness. Many of them who had received several Turkish arrows at a time in their chain-mail, the thick cloth lining of which alone protected them from wounds, marched on, while these shafts bristled on their backs, with a firm step and calm demeanour. Bohadin, p. 189.

† Not the eleventh, as the exact Gibbon (c. lix.) with unusual inaccuracy has stated: for Richard commenced his march from Acre on the 22d of August, and the battle of Asotus was fought on the 7th of September. Hoveden and Vinesauf, in fectis.

‡ Hoveden, p. 698. Vinesauf, p. 346—368.

History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Advancers of the Crusaders towards Jerusalem.

the fortifications of Jaffa and its dependencies.* However this might have been, two months were consumed in restoring these works, and in vain negotiations with Saladin,† before the Crusaders again moved forward towards Jerusalem. They penetrated without serious opposition to Ramla within a short distance of the Holy City. But here the inclemency of the season, want of provisions, and the consequent and alarming increase of sickness, arrested their march; and Richard himself admitted the present hopelessness of success. The army, therefore, fell back to the coast; and the Winter was spent by the soldiery in repairing the walls of several of the conquered fortresses, and by their leaders in treacherous intrigues or violent dissensions. At length, on the return of Spring, Richard so far succeeded in restoring unanimity, as to assemble all the Christian forces in Palestine under his standard; and at their head again he advanced towards Jerusalem. The general enthusiasm of the army was kindled by the renovated hope of success; the Chieftains and soldiery joined in a solemn oath that they would not quit Palestine until the Sepulchre of Christ should be redeemed; and when the army reached the valley of Hebron and arrived even in sight of the Holy City, the accomplishment of their vows seemed at hand. The Moslems were filled with consternation; numbers fled from Jerusalem; and even Saladin despaired of preserving his proudest conquest.‡

But, at this critical juncture, the Sultan was delivered from his apprehensions by the unexpected retreat of the Crusading host. The causes of this failure are variously ascribed by the Christian Chroniclers to the contemplated difficulties of a siege, to the envious or treasonable defection of the Duke of Burgundy and his French followers, and to the indecision of Richard himself. But the best attested account is that which refers the abandonment of the enterprise to the act of the King.§ Whether he was swayed by his usual impulses of caprice, urged to hasten his return to Europe by repeated intelligence of the dangerous machinations of his faithless brother and rival, or secretly conscious that the resources of the Crusade were unequal to the capture of Jerusalem, it is vain to inquire. But he suddenly

* During this cessation of active hostilities, Richard, while pursuing the sport of falconry, with his usual imprudence, beyond the precincts of the Christian lines, was attacked by a party of Saracens; and only escaped captivity or death through the generous devotion of a Provençal Knight named Guillaume de Pratelles, who drew off the attention of the enemy by feigning to be the King, and as such surrendered himself. Richard proved not ungrateful; for his last care in Palestine was to ransom his preserver. Vineauf, p. 372.

† In the course of these negotiations, which were more than once interrupted and resumed, Richard and Saladin seem to have seriously entertained a singular project for an accommodation of the Christian and Muslim interests by means of a marriage between Saphadin, or Malec-al-Adel, the brother of the Sultan, and the widowed Queen of Sicily, sister of the English King, who had accompanied him to Palestine. With his Christian bride, the Muslim Prince was to receive from his brother the sovereignty of Jerusalem; but the whole design, according to Bohadin, though agreeable to both Saladin and Richard, was frustrated by the repugnance of both Asiatics and Europeans to so unnatural an alliance. Bohadin, p. 209. During the negotiations, however, the two armies mingled in constant and amicable intercourse; and frequent kindnesses were interchanged between their Sovereigns. When Richard was ill, Saladin sent him the choicest fruits, and the yet greater refreshment of snow during the burning heats of Summer. Hoveden, p. 653.

‡ Hoveden, p. 698-714. Vineauf, p. 360-409. Bohadin, p. 188-237. Abulfeda, p. 50-52.

§ Vineauf, p. 409. Bohadin, p. 237.

VOL. XI.

paused in his operations, and when its walls were within his view, proposed the appointment of a council, selected from among the Barons of Palestine and the Chiefs of the Military Orders, to decide upon oath if it were preferable to engage in the siege of the Holy City, or to make a diversion against Damascus or Cairo. To the general surprise and disappointment, the council decided upon the expediency of deferring the enterprise before them; and Richard, amidst the discontent of the whole army, commenced a second and final retreat to the sea-coast. Yet, whatever were the motives of necessity or inconstancy which dictated this resolve, he poignantly felt the mortification or shame of his failure; and when one of his followers led him to a height from whence he might take his last view of Jerusalem, he hid his face in his shield, exclaiming that he who was unable to rescue, was unworthy to look upon, the Sepulchre of Christ.*

Saladin was not slow to reap his advantage on the retreat of the Crusaders; and finding that Richard had continued his march from Jaffa to Acre, he poured down from the hills with his troops on the former city, and assaulted the place so unexpectedly, that numbers of the Christian garrison and inhabitants were slain in the streets, and the remainder only saved their lives by shutting themselves up in some of the towers. They had already been reduced to sue for a capitulation; when Richard arrived off the port to their succour. He had prepared to embark for Europe before he heard of their danger: but fired with indignation that Saladin should have renewed the offensive while his foot was still on the strand of Palestine, he threw himself into a galley, and followed only by a few Knights and archers in six other vessels, sailed for Jaffa, leaving his army to retrace their march after him along the coast. When his small squadron had approached the shore, finding that some of the garrison still held out, he plunged into the sea; his attendants, inspired by the heroic example, quickly followed; and the opposing Moslems on the beach were so dismayed by the fury of the attack, that they fled before this handful of assailants, and abandoned Jaffa to its deliverers. Though Richard, including the rescued garrison, had with him only fifty-five Knights, of whom but ten were mounted, and two thousand foot soldiers, he displayed his contempt for the Infidels by encamping without the gates; and in this situation, on the morrow of his arrival, the Turkish cavalry, recovering from their surprise and ascertaining the scantiness of his force, attacked him with overwhelming numbers. He not only sustained their repeated charges, but each time rushed into the thickest of their squadrons at the head of his ten Knights; and everywhere carried death and confusion into their ranks. Never had even he performed such prodigies of valour and personal strength; whole squadrons of the quailing Infidels fled before his single arm; and the Muslim Writers themselves are the most adoring witnesses and warmest eulogists of these incredible exploits.† Night

Progress
of the Crusades.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Heroism of Richard at Jaffa.

His last defeat of the Infidels.

* Hoveden, p. 715. Vineauf, ubi supra.

† This concurrent testimony of Christian and Mohammedan Writers compels History to ascribe to Richard feats of personal heroism, which might otherwise be dismissed as the dreams of Romance. Such was the admiration which he exerted from his enemies, that Saphadin, during his last action before Jaffa, observing him dismounted, sent him two Arabian horses, on one of which he continued the conflict until nightfall. Some time before, the same Turkish Prince had solicited and obtained, at the hands of the Christian hero, the honour of Knighthood for his son.

D H

History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
End of the Third
Crusade.

put an end to the unequal combat: but so hopeless was Saladin's prevailing against the hero, that he raised the siege of Jaffa without any further attempt.*

This was the last and most brilliant achievement of the Lion-Hearted King on the shores of Palestine; and with it ended the Third Crusade. The exertions of Richard brought on a fever which increased his longing desire to return to Europe; and the awe inspired by his prowess and victory facilitated his overtures for a renewal of former negotiations. Saladin himself was weary of fruitless hostilities, and languishing under a bodily decline, which in a few months bowed him to the grave. Richard consented to dismantle the fortifications of Ascalon, which as the key of Egypt from the Syrian frontiers, was in the hands of the Christians an object of jealous disquietude to the Sultan; and the latter on his part agreed to leave them in unmolested possession of Tyre, Acre, and Jaffa, with all the maritime territory between the first and last of those cities, to abstain also from attacking the territories of the Prince of Antioch and Count of Tripoli, and to grant all Christian pilgrims free access to the holy places of Jerusalem. Upon these terms the two Monarchs concluded a truce between the Nations of their respective faiths for three years and three months; and Richard, embarking at Acre, bade a last adieu to the scene of his glory, and commenced that homeward voyage, of which we are in another place to relate the calamitous issue.†

Treaty with Saladin.
Return of Richard to Europe.

Political state of Palestine during the Crusade.

Such was the termination of the Third Crusade. Its grand object in the recapture of Jerusalem had not been accomplished: but the total ruin with which the affairs of the Latin Kingdom were threatened by the fatal defeat at Tiberias had been averted; the tide of Musulman conquest was arrested; and a great part of the sea-coast of Palestine with its chain of fortresses remained in the hands of the Christians. The recovery or preservation of this territory, which for eighty years deferred the final triumph of the Moslems, was chiefly attributable to the heroic achievements of the English King; and but for his intemperance and caprice even greater advantages might have been reaped from his splendid exploits. Yet it may be doubted whether his want of complete success was not full as much produced by the political vices of the Latin States, as by the errors of his own conduct. The factions nursed in Palestine during the feeble reign of the leper Baldwin IV. had grown into uncontrollable strength and violence; their quarrels were embraced by the Crusaders from Europe; and even while the victories of Saladin threatened to involve all parties in a common ruin, the dissensions of the Christians were more dangerous to the general cause than the arms of their infidel enemies. The conflicting pretensions of aspirants to the Latin throne of Palestine supplied a constant subject of disunion. By the death of his consort Sybilla and her children, during the siege of Acre, the worthless Lusignan had lost his

Dissensions
of the Christians.

But the most striking proof of the reality of his astonishing prowess, is the enduring terror in which his very memory was held by the Moslems: for, above half a century after his fiery spirit had been quenched in the grave, "his tremendous name was employed by Syrian mothers to silence their infants; and if an horse suddenly started from his way, his rider was wont to exclaim, 'Dost thou think King Richard is in the bow?'" Quidam in que ce soit le roi Richard? Gibson, ch. lix. from Joinville.

* Vinesauf, p. 412—421. Bohadin, p. 238—249. Abulreda, p. 52.

† Vinesauf, p. 422. Bohadin, p. 260.

only title to a matrimonial crown; and he found a formidable competitor in Conrad, the gallant Prince of Tyre, who had espoused Isabella, or Melicent, sister of the late Queen. From their personal enmity, the King of England supported the cause of Lusignan, and the French Monarch that of Conrad and his consort. After the departure of Philippe, Richard, to suppress a civil war, found it necessary to recognise the royal title of Conrad, and consoled Lusignan with the Crown of Cyprus: but this accommodation was scarcely concluded, when Conrad was murdered in the streets of Tyre by two of the Hassassins, or followers of a fanatical Mohammedan Chieftain, whose systematic employment of the dagger against their enemies introduced a new term into the languages of Europe. By the partisans of Conrad, his murder was imputed to the instigation of Richard; and this charge was made the plea for new dissensions: but all evidence of the open and fearless impetuosity of Plantagenet's temper is opposed to the belief that, if he had sought the life of Conrad, he would have stooped to so perfidious and dastardly a mode of gratifying his enmity.* The widow of Conrad accepted the hand of Henry, Count of Champagne, who in right of this marriage was recognised, both by the public voice and the assent of Richard, as King of Jerusalem; and his undisputed assumption of the visionary title at length removed one of the means by which the factions of Palestine had aggravated the disasters of the Christian cause.†

But the Christians in Palestine were indebted for their safety after the Third Crusade far less to any union among themselves, than to the death of their formidable enemy. Saladin† only survived his treaty with Richard a few months; and on his decease the great Empire which he had consolidated was almost immediately dissolved. In its division, three of his numerous sons erected distinct thrones at Cairo, Damascus, and Aleppo: but most of his veteran soldiery preferred to range themselves under the standard of his brother Saphadin; and at their head that Prince carved out for himself, at the expense of his nephews, a considerable sovereignty in

Progress
of the Crusades.

From
A. D.
1099,
to
A. D.
1204.

Conrad of Montfort,
King of Jerusalem.
His murder.

Henry of Champagne,
King of Jerusalem.

Transactions in Palestine during its reign.
Death of Saladin and division of his Empire.
1193.

* Bohadin, indeed, (p. 225.) asserts that the murderers, who were taken and put to the torture, confessed that they were employed by the King of England: but both Vinesauf (p. 377.) and Hoveden (p. 717.) agree in reporting the declaration of the Hassassins, that they had killed Conrad in revenge for an injury which he had offered to their Chief; and this version of the tale has great internal probability. Richard, in fact, since his reconciliation, had nothing to gain by the crime; and Conrad himself so little suspected him as, on his death-bed, to desire his widow to commit the fortress of Tyre to the keeping of the English Prison. No conclusion, either of the innocence or guilt of Richard, is fairly to be drawn from the execratory letter from the Chief of the Hassassins, an evident forgery subsequently produced at his trial before the Imperial German Diet. Rytner, Foedera, vol. i. p. 71.

† For these political transactions in Palestine during the Third Crusade, see chiefly Vinesauf, p. 324. 377. 392.

‡ The really great qualities of Saladin have sometimes been too absolutely lauded: for, as Mr. Mills has well observed, (Hist. of Crusades, vol. ii. p. 82.) his character was but a "compound of dignity and baseness." He had established his throne over the Moslems by treachery and bloodshed; and his first successes against the Christians had been stained by atrocious cruelty. But his government of his own people, after his power was secure, was mild and equitable; as a Mussulman, in his latter years, he was eminently pious, just, and charitable; and we have seen that, even towards enemies, he was sometimes capable of the most magnanimous and generous conduct. He is perhaps the brightest exemplar in history of an Asiatic hero; and his virtues, like the dark traits which obscured them, exhibit the genuine lineaments of his clime and race.

History. Syria. At the expiration of the three years' truce which the English King had negotiated, the dissensions of the Infidels revived in the Christians the fond hope of reconquering Jerusalem; and at the instigation of the Military Orders a new Crusade* was proclaimed by Pope Celestin III. Throughout France and England, from whatever causes, the appeal was heard with indifference: but in Germany the design was promoted by some momentary schemes of ambition which the Emperor—the execrable Henry VI.—appears to have cherished of aggrandizing himself in the East; and, supported by his influence, the preaching of the Clergy in that Country was so successful, that the Cross was enthusiastically taken by many Princes and Prelates of the Empire, and by vast numbers of Nobles and persons of inferior rank. Thus composed, three great armaments, all from Germany, successively reached the port of Acre, and raised the most confident anticipations among the Latins in the East of a decisive triumph over their Infidel enemies. But the Mussulmans both of Egypt and Syria, forgetting their civil feuds in the common danger of their Religion and Empire, rallied around the standard of Saphadin; and though the combined Chivalry of Germany and Palestine gained some victories in the field, these successes were always either marred by their dissensions, or counterbalanced by the elastic spirit of Turkish hostility, which started into new and vigorous action, as often as misconduct or exhaustion relaxed the efforts of the Christians. By the death of the Emperor, the German Princes and Prelates were recalled through political interests to Europe; and at their departure they left the Latin possessions in Palestine only slightly enlarged by their aid. The general superiority, however, which their arms had asserted over the Mussulman power was useful in sustaining the dignity and safety of the Christian State; and though the nominal Capital of the Kingdom was still unrecovered, the German victories had given security to the throne of Henry of Champagne, whose real sovereignty extended over great part of the sea-coast of Syria. To these considerable fragments of the Latin Monarchy of Palestine, Cyprus was soon after added, on the death of Henry, by the union of his Queen, thus widowed for the third time, with Almeric of Lusignan, the successor of Guy in the sovereignty of that island; and on the solemnization of this marriage at Acre, Almeric and Isabella assumed the joint title of King and Queen of Jerusalem and Cyprus.†

The exhortations of Pope Celestin III. had failed to reanimate the religious zeal of the Chivalry of France: but a fresh impulse was given to their fanaticism when Innocent III., three years afterwards, ascended the Papal throne. The convenient precedent of the Saladin title might suggest to that celebrated Pontiff a tempting occasion for again taxing the Clergy of Europe under the pretext of a new Crusade: but perhaps the single motive of filling the Papal coffers by this disgraceful expedient has been too confidently attributed to Innocent, in whom the ambitious desire of extending the spiritual and temporal dominion of the Holy See was at least as strong as any mere cupidity of gold. But whatever were his objects, he entered on the design of again arming Europe against the Infidels with all the energy which distinguished his character. He wrote himself to the Sovereigns of Christendom, exhorting them severally, either to take the Cross in person, or at least to contribute their forces and treasures to the sacred enterprise; and his Legates were despatched throughout the Kingdoms of the West to levy on all Ecclesiastical bodies the fortieth part of their revenues, and to obtain the pecuniary subscription and personal services of the laity by the promises of indulgencies and pardon for their sins. So productive were these efforts, that the free offerings of the Princes and people exceeded the total amount imposed on the Clergy: but the most powerful auxiliary of the Papal design was a fanatical priest named Fouques, of Neuilly near Paris, who professed to atone for a life of sin by dedicating its remains to the service of Heaven; and who, without the rude originality of the Hermit Peter, or the learning and dignified virtues of St. Bernard, yet with a success little inferior to that of either, by the vehemence of his exhortations, and by his pretended revelations of the Divine Will, now kindled the flame of Religious enthusiasm throughout Flanders and France.*

When the fame of his preaching and his miracles had already prepared the public mind of those Countries for the sacred enterprise, the martial and fanatical zeal of the French Nobility was roused into action by the example which was offered to them at a great tournament in Champagne. There Thibaut, the youthful Count of that Province, and his cousin Louis, Earl of Blois, both of them nephews, by a common relationship, to the Monarchs of France and England, and the former brother to the late King Henry of Jerusalem, resolved to exchange the martial sports for the sterner duties of Chivalry, and solemnly devoted themselves and their fortunes to the service of the Cross. Their spirit was enthusiastically caught by the assembled Knighthood; their vows were embraced on the spot by Simon de Montfort, Lord of Mante, and a numerous band of the noblest Chevaliers of France; and when intelligence of the inspiring design reached the Court of Baldwin, Count of Flanders, brother-in-law of Thibaut, that Prince, with a great body of Flemish Knights, hastened to enrol himself in the holy cause. Meanwhile, in Italy and in Germany, the Papal exhortations and promises of spiritual rewards had not been without their desired effect. In the former Country, Boniface, Marquis of Montferrat, brother of the murdered Conrad of Tyre, and in the latter, the Bishop of Halberstadt, both seconded by great numbers of Knightly and plebeian warriors, assumed the Cross; and the King of Hungary, with his subjects, sealed the sincerity of their faith by the same test.†

Progress of the Crusades.
From A. D. 1099. to A. D. 1204. Projected by Pope Innocent III.

Preaching of Fouques of Neuilly.

Many French Barons and others take the Cross.
A. D. 1200.

New Crusade of the German Chivalry.
A. D. 1195.

Its indecisive result.

Almeric of Lusignan, King of Jerusalem.
A. D. 1197.
THE FOURTH CRUSADE.

* As the exhortation of the Pope to the nations of Europe to engage in this design was general, some Writers have dignified the abortive result with the title of the Fourth Crusade; and numbered the subsequent expedition, which was directed against the Byzantine Empire, as the Fifth of Nine. But the more usual, which seems also the more convenient division, restricts the term of distinct Crusades to Seven, or at most Eight, great efforts, which were either produced by some signal occasion, such as the loss of Edessa or Jerusalem, or else productive of some considerable event.

† For all these transactions in Palestine, see Bernardus Thesaur. p. 813—818. Chron. Schæferum, lib. iv. v. vi. (in Freher, Rerum Script. German. vol. ii.) Cont. Will. Tyr. lib. ii. Abulfeda, lib. iv. &c.

* Fouques did not live to contemplate the full consequences of his preaching. He died before the Crusading armament sailed from Venice. Du Cange on Villehardouin, No. xxxvii.

† Vita Innocent. III. (apud Muratori, Script. Hist. Ital. vol. iii.) p. 506—526. Histoire de la Prise de Constantinople, par Geoffroy de Villehardouin, Ed. Du Cange, Fœrsgræph No. 1.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Preparations of the French
Barons.

The French nobles did not suffer the ardour of their followers to cool by inaction. To forward the enterprise and arrange its details, the three Counts of Champagne, Blois, and Flanders, with their principal associates, met twice in deliberation at Soissons and at Compiègne; and the result of their counsels was a resolution to avoid the disasters which the fatal experience of former Crusades had shown were the inevitable attendants of a land expedition to Palestine, and to imitate the maritime passage of Philippe Auguste and Richard Plantagenet. But as the Barons of the inland Province of Champagne could not command the same means of naval transport as those Sovereigns, they determined upon attempting to purchase the aid of one of the maritime Republics of Italy, who throughout the Crusades had been wont to hire out their services both as the common carriers and allies of the Western pilgrims. Among these States, Venice had already attained a preponderance of power and resources; and to that city, with full powers to negotiate on their behalf, the French Barons despatched six chosen deputies, and in the number Geoffroy de Villehardouin, Marshal of Champagne, to whose pen or dictation we are indebted for a simple and expressive narration of the whole Crusade.

Their embassy to Venice to obtain her services.

The Ducal Crown of Venice was at this time worn by Enrico Dandolo, who at the extraordinary age of ninety-three years, and in almost total blindness, still preserved the vigorous talents, the active heroism, and the ambitious or patriotic spirit of his youth. He received the noble envoys with honour; and, after the purport of their embassy had been regularly submitted to the Councils of the State, invited them to meet the assembled citizens in the Place of St. Mark. There, before a multitude of more than ten thousand persons, the haughty Barons of France threw themselves upon their knees to implore the assistance of the commercial republicans in recovering the Sepulchre of Christ. Their tears* and eloquence prevailed; the price of the desired aid had been left by the envoys to the assessment of the Doge and his immediate council; and for the sum of eighty-five thousand silver marks—less than £200,000 of our modern English money, and therefore not an unreasonable demand—the Republic engaged to transport four thousand five hundred Knights, nine thousand Esquires and men at arms with their horses and equipments, and twenty thousand foot soldiers, to any part of the coasts of the East which the service of God might require, to provision them for nine months, and to escort and aid them with a fleet of fifty galleys; but only on condition that the money should be paid before embarkation, and that whatever conquests might be made should be equally divided between the Barons and the Venetian State.†

Subsequent duties.

On the return of the envoys to France, these terms received a joyful approval from their associates: but several untoward circumstances arose to obstruct the performance of the treaty. The young Count of Champagne, the ardent promoter and destined chief of the enterprise, was already stretched on a death-bed; and on his decease some time was lost before the mutual jealousy of the French Barons, which prevented their electing one of their own body to succeed him, was reconciled by the choice of a foreign leader in the person of the Marquis of Montferrat. Many of the Nobles and their followers had, meanwhile, in inconstancy or impatience, wholly deserted their engagements or found their own passage to Acre: so that when at length, nearly two years after the tournament in Champagne, the Marquis Boniface mustered the French, Italian, and Flemish confederates at Venice, their numbers fell short of expectation, notwithstanding the junction of some German Crusaders; and they were utterly unable to subscribe the stipulated cost of the enterprise. Though the Marquis and the Counts of Blois and Flanders made a generous sacrifice of all their valuables, above thirty thousand marks were yet wanting to complete the full payment; and as the Republic, with true mercantile caution, refused to permit the sailing of the fleet until the whole amount of the deficiency should be lodged in her treasury, the enterprise must have been abandoned, if the Doge had not suggested an equivalent. He proposed that, upon condition of the Crusaders assisting in the reduction of the strong city of Zara on the Dalmatian coast, which had revolted from the Republic, their payment of the remaining sum should be postponed until the conclusion of the Holy War; and despite of his years and infirmities,† he engaged on their assent himself to take the Cross, and to lead the naval forces of his Republic.

The confederate Barons gladly acceded to this expedient, when another obstacle was opposed to its adoption, which had nearly frustrated the whole enterprise: the people of Zara had placed themselves under the sovereignty of the King of Hungary; and the Pope, through his Legate, positively forbade the Crusaders to turn their arms against the subjects of a Prince who had himself taken the Cross. But the Venetians, who entertained little reverence for the authority of the Holy See, succeeded in persuading their more scrupulous allies to disregard the prohibition of Innocent; the desire of honourably discharging their obligations prevailed with the French Barons over their fear of the Papal displeasure; and, although the Marquis of Montferrat, their leader, abstained from accompanying them, they sailed to Zara with their followers in the Venetian fleet, which was commanded by the venerable Doge, as he had promised, in person. Zara was deemed in that Age one of the strongest cities in Europe: but the inhabitants, after a siege of only five days, were terrified or compelled into a surrender: and though their lives were spared, the city was pillaged with great cruelty, and both its houses and defences razed to the ground. In his first burst of indignation at their disobedience, Innocent excommunicated both the Crusaders and Venetians; and when the French Barons sent a deputation of their number to Rome to express their penitence, he assured them of pardon for their sins only upon condition of their making restoration of their booty to the people of Zara, and withdrawing from all alliance with the more stubborn Republicans, who still set his spiritual censures at defiance. The fanatic De Montfort alone, whose subsequent share in the Crusade against the Albigenes has given a horrible celebrity to his name, showed full obe-

Progress
of the Crusades.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Assembly of the Crusaders at Venice.

A. D.
1202.

Division of their area against Zara.

Capture of that city.

* These doughty champions of Chivalry were, as Gibbon has observed, by habit great weepers. Mult plarant, &c. is the phrase of Villehardouin on almost every occasion of excitement.

† Andrew Dandolo, Chron. Venet. (in Script. Hist. Ital. vol. xii.) p. 320—323, in which the original treaty is given. Villehardouin, No. xiii. xiv.

* Notwithstanding the expression of Villehardouin, that the venerable Doge had lost his sight by a wound, it may be doubted whether he was totally blind: for the statement of his descendant and Chronicler, much more probable in itself, is only that he was visu debilis. Dandolo, Chron. p. 322.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.Further change in the purpose of the Crusade.Retrospect to the affairs of the Eastern Empire.
Reigns of Alexius I.
(Comne-nus.)

dience to the Papal mandate by wholly abandoning his associates; but the rest of the French Nobles and their troops continued to winter with the Venetians at Zara, where, after its surrender, the Marquis of Montferrat joined them; and it was during this season of repose that an entirely new destination was given to the continued armament.*

To explain the occasion of a change of purpose in the Crusaders, which produced one of the most singular and memorable enterprises in History, it is now necessary to revert to the state of the Byzantine Empire: the Annals of which, during the XIIIth Century, have been purposely reserved for a brief and rapid notice in this place. Our retrospect will ascend to the reign of the first Alexius: down to whose accession the affairs of the East have been narrated in a distinct chapter;† and the subsequent crisis of whose fortunes was involved and has been described in the transactions of the earliest Crusade.‡ Following closely on the triumphant career of the Latins through the Lesser Asia, Alexius richly gathered the fruits of victories, which they were impatient to abandon for the ulterior objects of their great enterprise; and as the Turkish forces were successively withdrawn from the shores of the Propontis and Ægean Sea to the defence of the interior, the Emperor restored to the Byzantine dominion the whole circuit of the sea-coast from Nice to Tarsus, or from the Bosphorus to the Syrian gates. Even in the interior of Asia Minor, the Sultan of Nice, after the loss of that Capital, had been compelled to remove the seat of his throne from thence to Iconium, above three hundred miles from Constantinople; and amidst the exhaustion of the Turkish power in its struggle with the Crusading invaders, Alexius, by policy and arms, so diligently improved his advantage that, before his decease, the Greek Empire, which, at the outset of his reign, was straitened and shaken on all sides by hostile pressure and seemed to rock to its foundations, had not only assumed an aspect of renovated strength, but expanded with offensive force against its former assailants.§

In the succeeding reign of his son John, termed in derision the Handsome, or Calo Johannes, a Prince more honourably distinguished both for his pacific virtues and warlike qualities, internal concord and happiness were preserved by a mild and vigorous administration; while the dignity of the Empire was asserted, and its security increased, by twenty-five years of victorious contest with the Turks. From the Latin Princes of Syria, the Greek Emperor won equal respect by the powerful assistance which, in the interval between the First and Second Crusades, he rendered them in repelling the Infidels, and by the vigour with which he obliged Raymond, the reigning Prince of Antioch, to do homage to him for his possessions. Manuel, the second surviving son of John, who was preferred in the succession to an elder brother both by parental and popular favour, inherited his father's martial spirit with his throne: but did not emulate the worth of his private life and civil government. During an active reign of thirty-seven years, the ambition of Manuel, rather than the necessity of his position, involved his Empire in continual wars, not only with the Turks and Hungarians, its natural enemies on the Asiatic and European frontiers, but also with the ancient foes of his House, the Normans of the Two Sicilies. In the hostilities, indeed, which kindled anew the quarrel of the preceding Century, Manuel was not the first aggressor. Reviving the magnificent design of Robert Guiscard for the subjugation of the Byzantine Empire, Roger, King of Sicily, upon pretext of some slight shown to his Ambassadors at Constantinople, despatched a great armament into the Ionian and Ægean seas; and the Normans disembarking from their ships reduced Corfu and other islands, and overran the Continent of Greece. Manuel was at the time absent from his Capital: but his return and revengeful activity soon terminated the triumph of the invaders. With the powerful cooperation of the Venetians, his navy outnumbered that of the Normans, and swept the seas of their galleys; his troops, which he led in person, overpowered the garrisons which they had left in Greece; and a single campaign sufficed to clear the Empire of its audacious assailants. It was then that the ambitious hopes of Manuel rose with his success; and the glorious issue of a just and defensive war suggested dreams of aggrandizement, which embraced the sovereignty of Italy and the reunion on his brows of the Imperial Crowns of the East and West.¶

With the plea of punishing the Norman invaders of his States, a Byzantine army, under the command of his son, Palæologus, a leader of noble birth and approved valour, was landed upon the shores of Southern Italy; and favoured by the declining health and death of the Sicilian King, and by the affection of the people for the ancient community of language and faith which had bound them to the Greek Empire, the whole of Apulia and Calabria was rapidly re-annexed to the Byzantine dominion. From this epoch, throughout the subsequent contests between the Western Emperor, Frederic Barbarossa, on the one side, and the Papacy and Lombard Republics on the other, the intrigues, the blunders, and the gold of Manuel, were unsparingly employed to extend his influence in Italy, and to promote his visionary scheme of wresting the sovereignty of the whole Peninsula from the German usurper of the Roman title. To the Pope he threw out the lure of terminating the schism of the Latin and Greek Churches; to the Lombard Cities he was prodigal both of money and promises: but the intrinsic weakness of the Greek Empire was unequal to the prosecution of this ambitious design; its weight was severely felt in the balance of Italian politics; and when the Pope and the Lombard Republics had terminated their great struggle with Barbarossa, the subsidies and the negotiations of Manuel were alike disregarded. In Southern Italy fortune was equally capricious to the Eastern Empire; the death of his brave lieutenant Palæologus was followed by the loss of his transient conquests; and, in a truce concluded with William the Bad, the successor of Roger on the Sicilian throne, in which that Prince acknowledged himself the vassal of the Byzantine throne, the dignity and pretensions of Manuel were only saved by his abandonment of the Italian soil. In other quarters the warlike reign of Manuel was signalized by victories both over the Hungarians and Turks, though in his last years its splendour was clouded by a severe defeat which he sustained from the Infidels in the Pontian mountains. To his own subjects, even his more suc-

Annals of the East.

From
A. D.
1099;
to
A. D.
1204.His transient conquests in Southern Italy.A. D.
1156.

* Dandolo, Chron. ubi supra; Vita Innocent. III. p. 529—531. Villehardouin, No. xx.—liv.

† Vide ch. lxx. in this volume.

‡ Ibid. p. 587, 588, 591—600.

§ Anna Comnena, Alexiad. lib. xi.—xiv.

¶ Johannis Cinnami Historia, lib. ii. iii. Nicephorus Choniates, in Manuel Comnen. lib. i.—iii. ad c. 6. (Both in Scriptor. Byzant.)

John Comnenus, (or Calo Johanne,
A. D.
1118.Manuel (Comne-nus.)
A. D.
1143.

History.

From
A. D.
1099. to

A. D.
1204.

Alexius II.
(Comnenus)

A. D.
1180.

Andronicus (Comnenus)

A. D.
1183.

Isaac II.
(Angelus)

A. D.
1195.

Loss of Bulgaria.

A. D.
1186.

Alexius III.
(Angelus)

A. D.
1195.

Appeal of his nephew Alexius to the Crusaders against his usurpation.

A. D.
1202.

Motives of the Venetians for interference.

cessful wars were productive of heavy burthens; his private life was licentious; and his political character was stained, as we have seen, with the reproach of pretended friendship and treacherous hostility to the Latins in the Second Crusade.*

With the death of Manuel ended the greatness of the Comnenian race. His infant son and successor, Alexius II., was oppressed by a perfidious guardian and daring usurper of his own blood, Andronicus, himself a grandson of the first Alexius: who, after deposing and murdering his Imperial ward, himself terminated a tyrannical and bloody reign of less than three years, by an ignominious and cruel death. The popular insurrection in which he fell was headed by Isaac Angelus, another member, by descent in the female line, of the Comnenian family. The leader or tool of the insurgents was raised to the throne; and under his feeble reign of ten years, the Empire crumbled into ruin. A revolt of the Bulgarians was provoked by his tyranny in seizing their flocks and herds to supply the wasteful pomp of his nuptials; and his tame acquiescence in their assertion of independence severed their Country from the Byzantine Crown, after a possession of nearly two Centuries, and established the second Kingdom of Bulgaria under a race of their ancient Princes. The inglorious and indolent reign of Isaac was frequently, and perhaps justly, threatened by abortive conspiracies; but his worst and successful enemy was his own ungrateful brother, Alexius, whom he had redeemed from a Turkish prison, and who repaid the obligation by surprising his security, depriving him of his eyes, consigning him to a dungeon, and seating himself on his throne. The son of the deposed Prince, who was named also Alexius, a boy only twelve years of age, was spared by the pity or contempt of his uncle; and he had subsequently contrived to escape into Italy, when the news of the assembly of a great Crusading armament at Venice, inspired his youthful hopes that its leaders might be induced, by adequate offers, to defer the ultimate object of their enterprise for a season, and to direct their powerful arms to the restoration of his father. The entreaties of the young Prince for their aid were supported at Venice by Ambassadors from his protector, the Duke of Swabia, who had married his sister: but it was at Zara, during the inaction of Winter, that the friends of Alexius were permitted more successfully to negotiate a treaty with the Latin Barons and Venetian Republic, which was eventually to deliver the Imperial inheritance of his House into the detested hands of foreign and barbarous spoilers.†

To induce the Venetians to accept the overtures of the young Greek Prince, there were not wanting many motives both of passion and policy. The alliance between their State and the Emperor Manuel Comnenus in the last Age, had been converted, by his protection of Ancona, the commercial rival of the Republic, into deadly enmity; in revenge for a general confiscation of the property of the Venetians in his ports, to which Manuel was provoked by their insolence, their fleets had ravaged the Byzantine Islands and coasts; and though the Emperor, by a final submission to their demands, had appeased the haughty Republic, the hatred of the people of Constantinople, during the license of subsequent revolutions, had repeatedly exposed the Venetian merchants in that Capital to spoliation and massacre.* The arms of the Republic, or the dread of her vengeance, generally, indeed, obtained indemnification for these outrages: but repeated broils cherished mutual national antipathy; and when the Pisans availed themselves of the temper of the Greeks to supplant the Venetians in their commercial relations with the Empire, the exasperation of the latter people had reached its height. By assisting young Alexius, their Republic would therefore both revenge her wrongs and regain her commercial advantages in the East. The politic Dandolo was not slow to anticipate the benefits which would accrue to his Country from such an alliance; and he eagerly employed all his influence with the confederate Barons to engage them in the design.‡

For its adoption even as a means of advancing the ultimate object of the Crusade, some plausible arguments might be adduced. As the possession of Egypt was supposed to form the principal support of the Turkish arms in Palestine, the original design of the Crusaders had been to attack the Infidels at that source of their power. But it was now contended by the Venetians, that any loss of time in deferring the projected invasion of Egypt would be richly repaid to the profit of the Crusade, by the advantages likely to arise from the command of the Byzantine resources, which young Alexius offered as the price of his father's restoration. The proposals, indeed, of the Imperial exile, were of the most tempting nature: for he engaged not only to pay two hundred thousand marks among the Crusaders as soon as his parent should be reestablished on the throne; but also to put an end to the schism of the Greek and Latin Churches by submitting his Empire to the spiritual dominion of the Roman See; and either to combine personally with the Crusaders, at the head of the Byzantine forces, in the subsequent expedition against Egypt, or in default of his own presence, to send ten thousand men at his charge for one year, and to maintain five hundred Knights during his life for the defence of Palestine.§ These promised benefits to the cause of the Church and the Crusade might at first have a powerful influence in winning assent even among the more devout leaders of the war; but it must be doubted whether the motives of their subsequent conduct were equally pure and disinterested; and since the diversion of their arms against Zara had familiarized the minds of the Crusading host to the postponement of their vows, it may be suspected that the successful siege and sack of that city had but awakened their appetite for a more splendid achievement and a richer booty.

The influence of such feelings is detected in their second and more deliberate contempt of the prohibition, which Innocent III. now fulminated against their design. The Byzantine usurper, anticipating the proposal of young Alexius, had, by a solemn embassy to Rome, offered to place the religious affairs of his Empire under the government of the Latin Papacy, and requested the presence of a Legate from Rome; and the ambitious Innocent, hoping thus to secure the submission of the Greek Church, as the price of keeping the reigning

Annals of the East.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Advantage proposed to the Crusaders.

Papal prohibition disapproved.

* Cinnamus, lib. iv.—vi. Nicetas, ad fin. Manuel.

† Nicetas, in Andron. Comnen., in Isaac Angel., in Alex. Angel., ad lib. iii. &c.

* Cinnamus, lib. vi. c. 10. Nicetas, in Manuel. lib. ii. c. 5. in Alex. Mon. Fulv. c. 11. in Isaac. lib. ii. c. 10.

† Nicetas, in Alex. lib. iii. c. 9. expressly accuses the Doge and Venetians as the instigators of the French Crusaders.

‡ Villehardouin, No. xlv. Chron. Dandolo, lib. x. c. 2.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

tyrant on the Byzantine throne, promised him protection against his enemies. The Pontiff, therefore, proceeded positively to interdict the Crusaders from espousing the cause of the Imperial exile, or arrogating to themselves any authority for the redress of wrongs among Christians, or the suppression of schism, for which it was the province of the Holy See alone to provide. But, by the Venetians, the commands of the Pope were immediately treated with such open disregard, that the Cardinal-Legates, whom he had despatched to Zara to enforce them, hopelessly quitted the place and sailed direct for Palestine; and their example was followed by a number of Barons and other Crusaders, including many most renowned for their devout and warlike spirit, who conscientiously dreaded to incur the Papal censures, by turning their arms against the Eastern Empire: while not a few disguised, under the same pretext, their secret dread to engage in an enterprise so perilous and disproportioned to the assembled force of the confederates. Since, indeed, submission to the Papal authority was identified with every pious sentiment of the Age, it is impossible not to conclude that, in the minds of the remaining leaders and soldiery, the temptations of glorious or gainful adventure had triumphed over religious considerations; and chiefly through the personal persuasions, as it is said, of the Venetian Doge, the proposals of young Alexius, despite of the impending thunders of the Vatican, were finally accepted by the Marquis of Montferrat, the Counts of Flanders, Blois, and St. Paul, with eight other great French Barons, and the majority of their followers.*

However apparently inadequate for the conquest of an ancient Empire, the armament wherewith the Doge of Venice and the confederate Barons now sailed for Constantinople, was of its kind the most complete and formidable which the world had yet witnessed. The fleet was composed of fifty great galleys of war, one hundred and twenty flat-bottomed horse transports, called palanders, or huissiers,† two hundred and forty vessels filled with troops and warlike engines, and seventy store-ships laden with provisions. On board this navy of nearly five hundred sail—of which the enumeration conveys so magnificent an idea of the wealth and power of the great Republic—there were embarked, under the confederate Barons of the Crusade, six thousand cavalry, composed of two thousand Knights with their Esquires and Sergeants, or mounted attendants, and ten thousand foot: besides the Venetian sea and land forces, of which the numbers might be loosely estimated at twenty thousand more.‡ Although the Byzantine usurper was early apprized of the destination and force of this hostile armament, he made not a single effort to oppose its course; the Crusaders were permitted successively, during a tardy navigation, to refresh themselves and their horses, and to replenish their provisions on the coasts and islands of Greece; and they finally approached the port of Constantinople itself without having encountered an enemy. The Byzantine navy, which, it is said, had but lately numbered sixteen hundred vessels of war, might have sufficed to harass, and even to destroy, on its passage an armament so encumbered with horses and stores: but the Greek Admiral, Michael Struphnos, brother-in-law of the usurper, had, in the baseness of his avarice, broken up the hulls of the shipping, that he might sell, for his private profit, the masts, rigging, and iron work; and the port of Constantinople now contained only twenty galleys. The shores of the Propontis might have furnished abundant timber for the construction of a new navy: but the ennuis of the palace, to whom the charge of the imperial forests was intrusted for the purposes of the chase, would not suffer a tree to be felled for the public defence. To this and every other object of patriotism, the whole Nation indeed was alike insensible: for the unwarlike and degenerate Greeks, as a race in whom the despotism of Centuries had extinguished every spark of generous shame, beheld in covering apathy the approach of a detested enemy; and without favouring the cause of the younger Alexius, the people both of the Capital and Provinces were equally indifferent to the danger of the tyrant who filled their throne.¶

If that usurper himself, or his adherents, had been capable of exerting even the passive courage of a defence, the natural strength and resources of the Capital might have defied the efforts of assailants, whom the able-bodied inhabitants outnumbered at the lowest estimate as ten to one. When the Venetian navy arrived before the walls of Constantinople, and the gorgeous city, which the admiration of the Crusaders deemed well worthy of being the mistress and queen of the world, burst in all her magnitude and splendour upon their astonished gaze, there was no heart so stout, is the simple and emphatic confession of the noble companion and chronicler of the adventure, but recoiled with dread at the spectacle of her massive ramparts and gigantic towers: for never surely had so great an enterprise been essayed.† But with the awe which the bravest might not feel ashamed to confess, was not the less mingled a magnanimous spirit which rose with the danger: and each warrior looking upon his arms reflected with unshaken resolution, that the hour was at hand in which these must serve the need, and would suffice to ensure the event, of glorious achievement. As a strong wind swept the armament past the walls of the majestic Capital towards the opposite shore, the fleet was there brought to anchor; and the Chivalry disembarking took possession of the Asiatic suburb of Chrysopolis, the modern Scutari, and during nine days reposed in an Imperial palace and gardens. This interval of inaction was marked by some negotiations, in which the Byzantine usurper offered to expedite their march through Asia Minor against the Infidels, but menaced them with destruction if their purpose was hostile to his State: while the Doge and Barons sternly replied, that they had entered the Empire in the cause of Heaven to avenge the wrongs which he had committed; and boldly admonished him

Annals of the East.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Their arrival before that Capital.

Alliance of the Crusaders and Venetians with young Alexius.

They sail to Constantinople.
A. D.
1203

* Villehardouin, No. xlv., xlvii., lii. Vita Innocent. III. p. 533. Ejadem Epistolæ. No. xlvii., &c.

† The origin of the former term for such a description of naval transport has been lost; the latter is derived from the hau, or door in the side of the vessel, which was let down as a drawbridge for the purpose of shipping and landing the horses. Du Cange, on Villehardouin, No. xlv.

‡ According to Savaro, Vite de Duchi di Venezia, (in Script. Rer. Ital. vol. xxii.) p. 528. the land forces of the Republic in the expedition, were four hundred and fifty cavalry and eight thousand foot. But after the first siege of Constantinople, Villehardouin (No. clii.) estimates the total combined army of French and Venetians at only twenty thousand men.

* Villehardouin, No. lvi., lvii. Rhamnusius, De Bello Constantinopolitano, &c. lib. i. p. 33. Nicetas, (in Alexen) lib. iii. c. 9.

† El sacheiz que il ne ot si hardi cui le cuer ne fremist, et ce ne fut merveill, car onques si grande affaire ne fut entrepris. Villehardouin, No. lvi.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Assault

that if he hoped for mercy he must descend from the throne which he had unjustly seized.*

After this declaration, they prepared to cross the Bosphorus to the European shore: the whole body of the Chivalry being divided into six corps or battles, two composed of Flemish Knights with their attendant archers under Count Baldwin and his brother, three of French Crusaders led respectively by the Counts of Blois and St. Paul, and the Lord of Montmorency, and the sixth or reserve of Italians and Germans under the Marquis of Montferrat. The Knights and Sergeants embarked in the palauaders, with their horses ready saddled and caparisoned: the Venetian galleys took them in tow; and in this order, they stood across the strait towards the European suburb of Galata, which commands the entrance of the port. The Greek cavalry were drawn out on the beach in far superior force to oppose their landing; but when the Knights, as soon as the water reached only to their girdles, leapt from the vessels, lance in hand, the enemy immediately fled; and the horses being brought on shore, the cavaliers mounted, pursued the flying squadrons, and captured the Imperial camp without striking a blow. On the following morning, after a faint sally by the Greeks, the assailants entered the town of Galata with the fugitives; the chain which from thence secured the mouth of the harbour was broken; and the whole Venetian fleet entering the port of Constantinople in triumph, the remains of the Imperial navy either fell into their hands, or were driven on shore and burnt.†

and capture of the port.

Siege of the city.

Though the port was thus captured, the gigantic works, by which the city itself was completely enclosed and separated from the suburbs, might still bid defiance to the efforts of the Crusaders: but their courage and confidence were unbowed; though their numbers were insufficient to observe more than a single front of the walls, they determined to commence a regular siege; and this magnanimous resolution presents the singular and amazing example of the investment of the largest and strongest Capital in the world by a few thousand men. The perils and the hardihood of this extraordinary enterprise were enhanced by the privations under which it was prosecuted. Of flour and salt provisions, the confederates had a supply but for three weeks left; clouds of Greek cavalry confined their few foragers to the camp; and their only fresh meat was obtained by the slaughter of their own horses. Delay was therefore far more to be dreaded than the resistance of the enemy; and the preparatory operations of the siege were urged with superhuman exertions. The possession of the harbour determined the point of attack; and against the walls on that side, two hundred and fifty great projectile and battering engines were planted. When by incredible labour the ditch had been filled up and some impression made upon the defences, the French and Venetians agreed to attempt a simultaneous assault: the former from their approaches against the land faces; the latter from their galleys upon the fronts which overlooked the port. Standing upon the raised deck of his vessel, with the gonfalon, or great banner of St. Mark, floating over his head, the venerable Doge himself led the naval attack; and such was the ardour excited by his presence, his voice, and his example, that the line of galleys was boldly rowed to the bench under the walls;

General assault by the French and Venetians.

by ladders from the foot of the ramparts, and by draw-bridges let down upon their battlements from the masts of the loftier vessels, the defences were surmounted; and the banner of the Republic was planted on one of twenty-five towers which were carried by the assailants.

But meanwhile the attack on the land side had been less successful; every gallant effort of the French Chivalry to scale the walls through the imperfect breaches had been repulsed by the assistance of some Pisan colonists and the valour of the Varangian, or Anglo-Saxon and Danish guards, ever the firmest support of the Byzantine throne;‡ and the numerous cavalry of the Greeks, pouring from the gates, threatened to surround and overwhelm the scanty array of the exhausted Crusaders. The Doge learning their danger, after setting fire to the quarter of the city which he had entered and which was thus reduced to ashes, drew off his triumphant forces to the succour of his fainting allies; and the pusillanimous Greeks, without daring a closer or prolonged encounter, disgracefully retired within the shelter of their walls. The confederates passed the succeeding night in eager rather than anxious suspense: but such was the terror with which the usurper Alexius was seized at the balanced success of the conflict that, under cover of the darkness, he basely fled from his Capital with a part of the Imperial treasures. On the discovery of his absence, the trembling Nobles of the palace drew his blind and captive brother Isaac from the dungeon to the throne; and when morning dawned, the leaders of the Crusaders were astonished by an embassy from the restored Emperor, announcing the revolution, desiring the presence of his son, and inviting them also to receive his grateful acknowledgments.†

The first proceeding of the confederates on the receipt of this message was to depute two Barons and two Venetians to wait upon the Emperor with their felicitations, and with a less welcome demand for the fulfilment of the engagements which his son had contracted in his name. While he admitted that their services were entitled to the highest recompense which was his to bestow, Isaac heard with consternation the extent of the conditions which he was required to ratify: the payment of two hundred thousand marks of silver; the employment of the Imperial forces in the service of the Crusade; and the submission of the Greek Church to the spiritual authority of the Pope. But the immediate subscription of the Emperor to these onerous terms was peremptorily insisted upon, and, however reluctantly obtained; on the return of the envoys to the camp, young Alexius was permitted to make his triumphant entry into the city, attended by the Latin Chiefs; and the joint coronation of the aged Emperor and his son, which was joyfully celebrated, seemed to announce a

Assault of the East.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204. its sequel.

Restoration of Isaac II.
(Angelos) to the Byzantine throne.

Alliance of the Crusaders with

Isaac and his son Alexius.
Joint Coronation of the Emperors of the East.

* On the subject of the Anglo-Saxon emigrations which filled the ranks of the Varangian guards of the Byzantine throne, see p. 666 of this volume. Du Cange, indeed, (notes on Villehardouin, No. lxxix., &c.) labours to prove that these Varangians came from the Northern continent of Europe only; but the words of Villehardouin are explicit, Anglos et Danos; it is not probable that a French Knight could have confounded their race; and his statement is in agreement with the fact, that impatience of the Norman tyranny had, ever since the epoch of the Conquest, driven multitudes of the bolder spirits among the oppressed English to seek a more honourable existence in foreign Countries.

† Villehardouin, No. lxxxi.—scilicet, Dandolo, Chron. p. 321, 322. Nicetas, (in Alexius,) lib. iii. ed. fol. Vitis Innocent. III. c. 91. p. 533, 534.

* Villehardouin, No. lviii.—lxxxi.

† Ibid. No. lxxxi. Nicetas, (in Alexius,) lib. iii. c. 10.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

peaceful conclusion to the recent struggle. This fallacious promise of concord between two Nations so mutually obnoxious as the Latins and Greeks, was of short duration. To satisfy the rapacious demands of their deliverers, the Emperors, in the low state of the Byzantine treasury, were compelled to make many grievous exactions from their subjects; the warlike Franks cared not to conceal their insolent disdain for a pusillanimous people; and above all, the veneration of the Greeks for the peculiar forms and doctrines of their faith—the only symptom of virtuous feeling which, discernible as it is throughout the long annals of their degradation, may command some share of our respect—was outraged by the undisguised design of subjugating their Church to the Papal yoke. From the very altar of the Cathedral of St. Sophia, the Patriarch of Constantinople was compelled, at the dictation of the Crusaders, to proclaim the spiritual supremacy of the Roman Pontiff; and the people were required to subject their consciences to the doctrines and discipline of a Church, which they had ever been taught to regard with horror as schismatic and heretical. By these measures, their political and religious antipathy was extended to the young Emperor, as the ally and creature of the detested foreigners; and the conduct of Alexis himself did not tend to win the favour, or to command the respect, of his offended subjects. While the boisterous orgies and rude freedoms, which marked the social intercourse of the Western Nations, shocked the superior refinement or ceremonial pride of the Greeks, the young Emperor, regardless alike of the difference in national manners and of his own dignity, continued to visit the quarters, and to share in the debaucheries and gaming, of the Franks. In one of these carousals, he suffered the diadem to be snatched in sportive or contemptuous familiarity from his head, and exchanged for the coarse woollen cap of some low reveller; and the contempt as well as the aversion of his subjects was not unjustly provoked against the unfeeling or thoughtless boy, who could thus basely, in the eyes of insolent Barbarians, sully the lustre and dishonour the majesty of his Imperial Crown.*

Alexis induces the Crusaders to defer their departure.

Through all these causes, Alexis soon found that he had become so odious to his Countrymen, as to render the continued presence of his Latin allies indispensable to the security of his throne; and he endeavoured by the promise of further rewards to induce them to postpone their departure, and the prosecution of their Crusading vows, until the following Spring. He found them little loth to accede to his terms. On the first restoration of Isaac, indeed, the Latin Barons had given some signs of pursuing the original purpose of their confederacy; had sent a defiance to the Sultan of Egypt; and had deprecated the anger of the Pope at their repeated disobedience, by entreaties for pardon and by assurances that thenceforth their arms should be devoted exclusively to the sacred service of Palestine. The Venetians also had condescended to solicit a reconciliation with the Holy See; and Innocent was so well satisfied with the prospect of bringing the Greek Church under his dominion, and so rejoiced to recognise the slightest symptom of penitence in those stubborn Republicans, that he extended absolution to them as well as to their more submissive Baronial confederates. But in truth, both the Doge and his noble allies were by this time almost equally ready to disregard the Papal displeasure and the objects of the Crusade for their personal profit; and Alexis seems to have experienced little difficulty in purchasing their continued services until the Spring, as soon as he had quieted their consciences by repeating the condition, that he would then accompany them to Egypt with the recruited forces of his Empire.†

To occupy the interval, and enforce the recognition of his disputed authority over the Imperial territories, the Marquis of Montferrat, with a body of the confederate Chivalry, successfully conducted the young Prince in an expedition through the Thracian Provinces; but during this absence, the hatred of the people of the Capital was fatally aggravated by the misconduct of the Latins. Though, for the prevention of feuds, a separate quarter had been assigned to the strangers in the suburb of Galata or Pera, some Flemings and Venetians, during a visit to the city, attacked a commercial colony of Musulmans, which had long enjoyed the protection of the Byzantine Emperors. The Infidels, though surprised, defended themselves bravely; the Greek inhabitants assisted them, while some Latin residents aided the aggressors; and during the conflict, the latter set fire to a building, from whence the flames spread with such frightful rapidity, that, before they could be extinguished, a third part of the magnificent city was reduced to ashes. During eight days, the conflagration raged over above a league in extent from the port to the Propontis; immense quantities of merchandise and other valuable property were destroyed; and thousands of families were reduced to beggary. The Latin Chiefs expressed their vain sorrow for a calamity which, as produced by the unbridled license of their followers, it should rather have been their care to prevent; but the suffering and exasperated Greeks were little disposed to credit their sincerity. Moreover, as some of the Italian settlers in the Capital had instigated or shared the outrage, the vengeance of the sufferers was specially directed against the ingratitude of these foreigners who had long been naturalized among them; and to the number of fifteen thousand persons, the whole Body were compelled to abandon their dwellings, and to consult their safety by flight to the suburban quarters of the Crusaders.‡

From this epoch the national animosity of the Greeks and Latins mutually increased to a deadly height; and when the young Emperor returned to his Capital, he found the rupture incurable, and his own position such, that he was scarcely permitted to choose between the party of his subjects and that of his allies. By the Greeks, he was more than ever abhorred as the tool of their oppressors; by the Latin Chiefs, without consideration for the difficulties which oppressed his government, his hesitation in fulfilling the pecuniary conditions of the alliance was resented with suspicion and menaces. Not deigning to admit the public distresses, which the late conflagration had grievously aggravated, as any excuse for delay in the collection and payment of their promised reward, the confederate leaders suddenly adopted the most violent counsels; and an embassy was sent, in the name of the Doge of Venice and of the Barons of the army, to defy the two Emperors in their own palace. After fearlessly delivering their haughty

Annals of the East.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Great part of Constantinople burned in a feud.

Frightful ravages of the flames.

Exasperation of the Greeks.

Mutual hatred between them and the Latins.

Renewal of hostilities.

* Nicetas, in Isaacum et Alexium Angulos, c. 1.—3. Villehardouin, No. xcix.—ci.
VOL. XI.

† Papa Innocent. III. p. 534. Villehardouin, No. ci.—ciii.
‡ Nicetas, in Isaac. et Alex. p. 272—274. Villehardouin, No. cvii.—cviii.

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Revolution in Constantinople.

message, the envoys mounted their horses and returned to the quarters of the confederates; and hostilities, to which the two Emperors were the only reluctant parties, as they were also the first victims, immediately commenced on both sides.*

Such was the unhappy condition of the Nation and the times, that the only man among the Greeks who had courage and ability to undertake the defence of his Country, was placed in the odious light of a traitor and an usurper. Alexius Angelus Ducas, surnamed Mourzoufle, from his sluggish eyebrows, a Prince allied by blood to the Imperial House, had been the chief instrument in urging the vacillating young Emperor to resist the laughable demands of the Latins; and in the war of skirmishes which now ensued, his personal valour and energy were invidiously contrasted with the weakness or reluctance of his Sovereign. The seditious populace of Constantinople demanded the deposition of Isaac and his son, whom they stigmatized as the secret friends of the invaders; and after the prudence of several members of the nobility had induced them to decline the proffered dignity of the purple, a young Patrician, named Nicholas Canabus, was tempted by his vanity to accept the Byzantine crown. But the valour of Ducas had meanwhile gained the suffrages of the Varangian guards; the Imperial puppet of the hour was displaced without resistance; Isaac and his son were persuaded to seek safety in flight, and were betrayed into a dungeon, in which the former soon expired of grief and terror; and the more deserving patriot or successful conspirator was unanimously called to the throne. From the hour in which Ducas assumed the insignia of Empire, a new impulse was given to the Byzantine councils: the walls of the Capital were guarded with active discipline; many sallies were at least boldly directed; two attempts, frustrated only by the intrepidity and skill of the Venetian sailors, were made to burn the Latin fleet; and if it had been possible to nerve the hearts of the Greeks in the national cause, its ruin might yet have been averted by the spirit of their leader. But in every encounter before the walls and in the adjacent country, Ducas was deserted by the cowardice of his new subjects; he found it necessary to negotiate with the invaders; and when they insisted on the restoration of the deposed Emperor, he attempted to remove that obstacle to an accommodation, since Isaac was already dead, by the murder of his remaining prisoner Alexius.†

When the intelligence of this event reached the camp of the Crusaders, the causes of resentment which had separated them from the young ally and companion of their voyage, were forgotten in commiseration and horror at his untimely and cruel fate. They passionately swore to revenge his death upon a perfidious usurper and Nation; and the crime of Ducas served only to exasperate the enmity, while it inflamed the ambition, of these formidable assailants. Conceiving themselves now released from all obligations of forbearance towards a race so inhuman and treacherous as the Greeks, and easily adopting the convenient doctrine that it was a religious duty to punish their murder of a Prince by the conquest and dismemberment of his Empire; the Doge and confederate Barons proceeded to sign a Treaty of partition by which, in the hardly confidence of valour, and undaunted by the disparity of their force to the perilous magnitude of the enterprise, they anticipated the result of their astonishing achievements. It was agreed that, after liquidating, out of the booty to be captured, the pecuniary claims of Venice for the expenses of the armament, the remainder should be equally shared between the troops of the Crusaders and the Republic; that the existence of the Empire should be preserved, and one of the confederate Barons raised to its throne, but with only a fourth of its present territories for the support of his title; and that, of the remaining three-fourths, one moiety should be surrendered in full sovereignty to Venice, and the other divided into Imperial Fiefs among the Nobles of the Crusade.*

The Winter had been consumed in desultory conflicts or in necessary preparation; but, with the return of Spring, the confederates having completed the arrangement of their daring project, proceeded to put it into execution. To prevent a repetition of the failure in the last attack upon the walls from the separation of their forces, it was determined that the assault of the Capital should be attempted from the port alone; and the Venetian fleet being distributed into six divisions, to correspond with the former arrangement of the Chivalry into as many battles, one body of Knights embarked in the palanders of each squadron with their horses and followers. In this order the whole armament crossed the harbour, and assaulted the same line of defences, against which the Venetians had before successfully exerted their efforts. But, though the depth of water permitted the vessels to approach near enough to the walls for the combatants, on the ramparts and on the drawbridges and rope ladders which were let down from the upper works of the galleys, to fight hand to hand; the insecure footing of the assailants on these frail and floating machines, and the firm vantage ground and superior numbers of the besieged, rendered the combat so unequal, that the former, after astonishing feats of valour, were finally repulsed at every point. Instructed but not intimidated by this failure, the Venetians now undertook to supply their allies with the means of approaching the walls in steadier array; the large vessels were strongly lashed together in pairs to increase their stability and impulsive force; and three days having been spent in preparation and refreshment, the assault was again given with resistless vigour and happier fortune.

From sunrise to noon, the slow advance of the heavy line of vessels was retarded by volleys of missiles which were showered from the walls; the recent success of the Greeks had animated their spirit into a courageous resistance; and the issue of the conflict still hung in dangerous suspense: when a strong breeze, suddenly springing up from the North, all at once drove the double galleys with propitious violence against the walls. The names of the two linked vessels—the Pigrim and the Paradise—having on board the martial Bishops of Soissons and Troyes, which first touched the walls, were repeated with loud shouts as an omen of Divine aid; the panic-stricken Greeks fled from their posts; loud

Mourzoufle
deposes the two Em-perors.
A. D.
1204.

And murders Alexius.
Second siege of Constantinople by the Cruisaders.

Annals
the East.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204

General assault,

and capture of the city.
April 12.

* Villehardouin, No. cix.—cxii. Nicetas, ubi supra.

† Villehardouin, No. cxiii.—cxix. Vita Innocent. III. p. 534, 535. Nicetas, in Innoc. et Alex. c. 4, 5, in Mourzoufle, c. 1.

‡ Yet if Nicetas (p. 280), may be credited, in preference to the Latin authorities who do not notice such a transaction, the Crusading Barons, by the advice of the Doge of Venice, were still willing to have granted peace to the usurper for fifty thousand pounds of gold: but mutual distrust broke off the negotiation.

* Epistola Baldvini, in Fifth Innocent. III. p. 536. Danduli, Chronicon, (in notes), p. 326.

History.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

towers with a long line of rampart were escalated and carried; and three gates being burst open, the Knights led their horses on shore from the palanders, mounted, and swept through the streets of Constantinople in battle array. In the mazes of a vast Capital, indeed, their cavalry might have been useless, their feeble numbers might have been lost and overpowered; in the hands of a brave people, every house might have been defended, every church and palace and massive building converted into an impregnable fortress. So conscious were the victors of their danger, that they immediately began to fortify the first quarters which they had seized; passed the night under arms; and setting fire to the streets in their front, produced a new conflagration, which in a few hours consumed another portion of the city equal in extent, according to the confession of their Chronicler, to any three towns in France. But these precautions were needless against an enemy, whom neither patriotism nor despair, neither the ruin of their Country and fortunes, nor the violence with which the licentious passions of a ferocious soldiery menaced their own lives and the honour of their women, could rouse to one generous or manly effort. The Emperor Ducas, finding it impossible to animate his craven subjects with any portion of his own spirit, abandoned them to their fate, and retired from the city with his family. After his flight, the brave efforts of two other illustrious Greeks, Theodore Ducas and Theodore Lascaris,—the latter of whom was destined subsequently to re-establish and sustain the fortunes of his Country,—proved for the time equally ineffectual; a suppliant train bearing crosses and images sought the quarters, to implore the mercy of the Crusaders for the fallen Capital; and when morning dawned the Latin Chiefs, who had anticipated that the reduction of the whole city would still cost them at least the labour of a month, found themselves the masters of the Eastern Empire.*

But while they gladly accepted the submission, they were deaf to the abject prayers of the Greeks. Constantinople was abandoned to a general pillage, during which the miserable inhabitants witnessed and endured every extremity of horror. Yet even the brutal and licentious soldiery were surpassed in cruelty by the Latin residents who had been recently expelled from the city; and chiefly by whose revengeful malice two thousand of the unresisting Greeks were wantonly murdered in cold blood. Insult and sacrilege were added to rapine and debauchery; the churches and national worship of the Greeks were defiled and profaned; and by the followers of a Crusading army was strangely enacted at Constantinople the same impious scene, which another European Capital was to exhibit to modern times, of enthroning a painted strumpet in a Christian Cathedral.† The worst vices were freely perpetrated by the rabble of the camp and Latin suburbs; but attempts were made to control the privilege of rapine for the general benefit of the victors; on pain of excommunication and death all individuals were commanded to bring their booty to appointed stations for a public division; and though some incurred the penalty of disobedience, and many more successfully secreted their spoils, the quantities of treasure which were collected exceeded the most greedy or sanguine expectation. After satisfying the claims of the Venetians, the value of the share which fell to the French Crusaders is estimated, by their Chronicler, at four or five hundred thousand marks, besides ten thousand horses; and another eye-witness declares that, by the division of the booty, the poorest of the host were rendered wealthy.*

But the gain of the adventurers, however enormous, bore a small proportion to the destruction and waste of property by which their victory was attended. It would be vain to estimate the wealth of Ages which had been consumed in three conflagrations, or spoiled in the wantonness of a sack. But every scholar and lover of the Arts must deplore the irreparable loss of those relics of the literature and sculpture of Classical Antiquity, which perished in the fall of Constantinople. Her libraries, still containing many precious remains of the best Ages of Greece and Rome, which have not been preserved to our times, were now abandoned to the flames by the ignorant indifference of the barbarian conquerors; but their malevolence or cupidity was more actively exercised in the destruction of those beautiful monuments of which Constantine had robbed the ancient seat of Empire to enrich his new Capital. In the furious violence of conquest or in mere wanton love of destruction, the statues of marble were mutilated or thrown down from their pedestals: but those of bronze were melted, with insensible and sordid avarice, to afford a base coin for the payment of the soldiery. This barbarous abuse of the right of conquest was probably the work of the rude Barons of France: for the more refined Venetians, with better taste if not with less injustice, converted a portion of their spoil into a national trophy; and removed to St. Mark's Place in their Capital those four celebrated horses of bronze which, at the distance of six Centuries, still present the most striking memorial of the glory and ruin of the once mighty Republic.†

After the division of their booty, the leaders of the confederate host assembled to consummate the more important work of partitioning an Empire. For the preliminary business of nominating one of their number to fill the spoliated throne of the Cæsars, six persons of each nation, French and Venetian, were appointed under one of the provisions of the existing Treaty; and this Council now balanced the claims of the Marquis of Montferrat, hitherto the chosen leader of the Crusade, and of the Count of Flanders: for though the superior merits of the Doge to either were generously suggested by the French electors, his own Countrymen, with the patriotic jealousy of republican freedom, declared the Imperial dignity incompatible with the office of the first magistrate of their commonwealth. The final choice of the Council fell upon the Count of Flanders, determined, perhaps, by his descent from Charlemagne, his alliance by blood to the King of France, and the anticipated repugnance of the French Barons to obey an Italian Sovereign. As soon as this decision of the electors was announced, Baldwin was raised upon a buckler,

Annals of the East.
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

Destruction of the remains of, ancient letters and art.

Partition of the Empire
among the conquerors.

Baldwin of Flanders, first Latin Emperor of the East.

* Villehardouin, No. cxx.—cxxx. Epistola Baldwini in Fide Innocent. III. p. 535, 536. Nicetas, in Marzuffum, c. 2.

† This "Goddess of Reason" of the XIIIth Century was seated on the throne to represent the office and person of the Patriarch, while drunken revellers in ribaldrous songs and dances mocked the chants and ceremonies of the Greek worship. Nicetas p. 303.

* Villehardouin, No. cxxx.—cxxxv. Vita Innocent. III. p. 536

—538. Nicetas, in Marzuffum, ad fin.

† Before St. Mark still glow his steeds of brass
Their gilded collars glittering in the sun;
But is not Doria's menace come to pass?
Are they not bridled?

History.

From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.

according to the Byzantine custom, by his brother Barons and Knights, borne on their shoulders to the church of St. Sophia, invested with the purple, and exhibited to the Greeks as their new Emperor. His rival, and now his vassal, the Marquis of Montferrat, was consoled by the possession of Macedonia and great part of Proper Greece with the regal title; and the remaining Barons shared, by lot or precedence of rank, the various Provinces of the Empire in Europe and Asia which remained at their choice, after the stipulated appropriation of three-eighths of the whole to the Venetian Republic. Besides that proportion of the Capital itself, Venice thus obtained the sovereignty of Crete, of most of the Islands in the Ionian and Ægean Seas, and of a long chain of maritime ports on the continent, from the eapes of the Adriatic to the Bosphorus. While the Republic, in virtue of this partition, arrogated to her venerable Doge and his successors the proud and accurate title of lords of one-fourth and one-eighth of the Empire of Romania, to the new Sovereign of Constantinople had been reserved in immediate sovereignty only one-fourth of the Byzantine dominions; and on all sides the narrow and inadequate limits of his throne were surrounded by vassals, who only nominally acknowledged, and by enemies who wholly denied the legality of his reign.*

Aspect of the Latin Empire.

The eagerness of the Latin adventurers to occupy their several allotments of the territorial spoil, discovered the total insufficiency of their divided strength to secure the work of conquest, which they had so daringly achieved. The dispersion of the French Barons, each attended by no more than a few score of lances, over the vast Provinces of the Empire, betrayed to the subjugated Nation the weakness of their conquerors while the impolitic contempt by which the Greeks of all ranks found themselves excluded from employments and honours in the Latin Court, increased their impatience to escape from a yoke, which they still wanted courage or concert to break. By degrees, therefore, from the Capital and its neighbouring Provinces on the European shores, the noblest born and the bravest of the Greeks withdrew into less accessible quarters of the dismembered Empire to range themselves under the standards of native leaders. In Europe, for a moment after the fall of Constantinople, the Imperial title was still arrogated by the two fugitive usurpers, the elder Alexis Angelus and Ducas Mourzoufle; and between them an apparent reconciliation was effected. During his short reign, Ducas had endeavoured to strengthen his pretensions to the Imperial dignity by seizing the hand of a daughter of Alexis; and being now driven out of Adrianople on the advance of the Latins, he obtained, through the tender of allegiance to his father-in-law, a promise of such protection as his camp could afford. But he had no sooner placed himself in the power of Alexis, than that tyrant, even more perfidious than impotent, caused him to be deprived of his eyes and thrust from the camp. In this sightless and horrid condition, as he was endeavouring to escape across the Hellespont into Asia, Mourzoufle was arrested by the Latins; brought to trial for his own worst crime, the murder of young Alexis; and condemned to be cast, alive and headlong, from the lofty summit of the Theodosian pillar at Constantinople upon the marble pavement beneath.* The execution of this dreadful sentence on him was soon followed by the captivity of his betrayer Alexis, who was surprised by Boniface of Montferrat and transported to an Italian dungeon. By the fate of these two usurpers, the principal support of the National cause of the Greeks devolved upon a young hero, who might maintain, in right of his wife, the hereditary claims, while he spurned the base qualities of the Angeli; and in whom the valour of Ducas was unsullied by the guilt of treason and murder. This was Theodore Lascaris, who had also married a daughter of Alexis Angelus; and whose gallant devotion to his Country had already been signalized in the two sieges of Constantinople. Retiring, after the fall of the Capital, across the Bosphorus into the recesses of Bithynia, and being joined by the most generous and congenial spirits of his Nation, he there organized a resistance against the Latin adventurers, which not only prevented them from ever gaining a secure establishment in the Asiatic Provinces of the Empire, but prepared their expulsion from their European conquests. But the fate both of the Latin and Greek Dynasties, which for sixty years were to dispute the sceptre of the Eastern Empire, will reclaim our future attention in another place; and the connection of the History of the Crusades with the Revolutions of Constantinople closes at the period before us.

In the division and enjoyment of a conquered Empire, the confederate Barons who had embraced the service of the Cross now seemed as completely to have forgotten the original object of their expedition, as if it had never been undertaken for the deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre; and the vain trophies of a victory, not over Paynim but Christian enemies—the gates and chain of the harbour of Constantinople—sent by the new Emperor of the East to Palestine,† were the only fruits of the Fourth Crusade which ever reached the Syrian shores.

Annals of the East
From
A. D.
1099.
to
A. D.
1204.
Fate of Mourzoufle and Alexis Angelus.

Escape of the Greeks from the conquered Provinces.

End of the Fourth
Crusade

* Villehardouin, No. cxxvii.—cxli. Dandoli, Chron. lib. x. c. 3. Du Gange, Hist. de Constantinople sous les Empereurs François, lib. i.

* Villehardouin, No. cxi.—cix. Nicetas, in Baldoin. p. 393. † Nicetas, in Baldoin. p. 393.

BIOGRAPHY.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

THOMAS AQUINAS.

BORN A. D. 1224, DIED A. D. 1274.

Biography. THE Biography of the Schoolmen of the Middle Age presents at the first view little to interest the general reader, who seeks to be led through a series of incidents various in character and striking in effect. A prospect seems stretched before him of wild plains or barren sea, without any landmarks to arrest the eye, or irregularities to break the dull level. But it is only at the first vague glance of the subject that it appears in this uninteresting form. The level which, whilst we viewed it from a distance, seemed nothing but uniformity, on the nearer approach discloses the variety of hill and valley, which its broad surface had concealed from the distant survey. And so the life of the Schoolmen, when closely studied, is by no means devoid of the interest naturally to be expected from an account of any one among men, whose name has attracted the admiration of Ages, and thus obtained an historical importance.

But the interest here is of a different kind from that which an unreflecting prejudice may suggest to our wishes. It is true, that there is something of that uniformity, which repels and disappoints both the imagination and the feelings. There are no vicissitudes of fortunes, like those which diversify the story of the more busy agent in the History of the world. For the most part, the life of the Philosopher of the Schools of the Middle Age was drawn out in even tenour, amidst the still shades of the cloister, or the wrangling but still innocuous tumults of the Schools. We may single out, indeed, the instance of the celebrated Abelard in the XIIth Century; whose calamities, the effects of the vicious system of the Age more than the fault of the individual, have rendered him notorious in the page of Ecclesiastical and Literary History, no less than his labours as a Philosopher and a Theologian. But with this exception, one uniform character seems to prevail over the whole assemblage of illustrious names, which the annals of the Schools present.

Is there, however, no interest even in this very uniformity? Is variety of incident all that captivates the reader of Biography? If the development of human character be a principal object in the record of human actions and events, then is the very uniformity of the Scholastic Biography an important feature in it, demanding our attention and close examination. For the sameness of character, which we thus observe diffused over so large a surface of human life, is clearly not a fortuitous desultory effect; but is an index to the philosophical eye, of the force of circumstances in influencing and modifying the human mind. Men born in different conditions of life, of different tempers and talents, have been found, to be acted on by the discipline of circumstances in the Middle Age, nearly in the same manner, and to have yielded to the same impressions. It is an interesting inquiry, then, to trace these dominant influences in the life of any of those distinguished individuals, who shone as the luminaries of their own dark Age. It is the Philosophy of Man that we are unconsciously searching into: and even the scanty fragments of incident which we may be able to collect, are valuable: for they give us some instruction in the elements of which our nature is compounded, some illustration of what it is susceptible of under the varied action of society and education.

The life of Aquinas may be particularly selected as a type of the Scholastic Biography. His name is familiar to every one, as the representative of the class to which he belongs. That very familiarity is an evidence of the conspicuous place, which he holds among the Theological Philosophers of the Middle Age. But we have been taught at the same time to associate his name with all that is dark in Religion or in Philosophy: and we are apt, therefore, to think of him with some degree of ridicule or contempt, as unworthy of the serious inquiry of enlightened times. In truth, however, Aquinas, when impartially examined, will be found not to shrink from a comparison with the Philosophers of the brightest period of Literature. If we are to judge of the Philosopher from the intrinsic powers of mind displayed, independently of the results attained by him, which chiefly depend on the concurrence of favourable circumstances, then may Aquinas be placed in the first rank of Philosophy. If penetration of thought, comprehensiveness of views, exactness the most minute, an ardour of inquiry the most keen, a patience of pursuit the most unwearied, are among the merits of the Philosopher, then may Aquinas dispute even the first place among the candidates for the supremacy in speculative science.

Descended from a noble ancestry on both sides; his Nobility of Father Lodolph being Count of Aquino, and his mother his family. Theodora, daughter of the Count of Theate, the future Saint and Doctor of the Church seemed destined for a peculiar interest (that uniformity).

Thomas Aquinas.

Thomas
Aquinas

Biography. fortune of life very different from that, to which his own temper subsequently directed his choice. He was born at the castle of Roccaica at Aquino, in the year 1224,* being, as it seems, the youngest of several sons. Whilst his brothers, however, pursued the military profession, the circumstances of his early life soon marked him out for another path of employment and distinction. Being sent at the age of five years to the Monastery of Monte Cassino, one of the usual places of education for the children of Italian Nobles, during the five years spent there, he gave indication, even at this early period, of that seriousness and abstractedness of mind, which characterised his maturity. The thoughtful manner of the child attracted, indeed, the notice of the Abbot of the Convent; by whose recommendation his parents sent him to Naples, which was then established as a flourishing School of Philosophy under the patronage of the Emperor Frederic II. The six years which he passed at Naples tended only to foster and develop this contemplative disposition: and it was a natural result when, at the age of seventeen years, he passionately devoted himself to the monastic life; embracing the profession of a Dominican, and adhering to his resolution, in spite of the remonstrances and opposition of his family.

Educated at Monte Cassino;

Afterwards at Naples.

Cessation of inducements to active life at this period.

We may, perhaps, at first be at a loss to conceive the inducement to a young man of rank, thus to relinquish his hereditary pretensions, and to embark on a scheme of life, in which distinction was to be sought by dint of personal exertion. We might wonder the less, had we heard of his leaving his father's home on some romantic project of adventure, suggested by the enthusiasm of a young and ardent mind; such as would be furnished by the occasion of the Holy Wars. But our surprise will be removed, when we reflect on the general condition of the Western, or Latin World in those times, and the relation in which the Church then stood to the community at large. The Crusades of the XIIIth Century had supplied the cravings of the public mind for some matter of interest and excitement, to vary and relieve the listlessness which had spread over the whole face of society. The spontaneous impulse and blind obedience, with which the spiritual call to fight the battles of the Lord in a distant land, was answered throughout the length and breadth of Christendom, show the existence of that demand by which they were so readily met. But by those very events, the cause which had stimulated, and in a great measure indeed occasioned them, was removed; and the public mind found employment in a new direction. The fact is evidenced in the little interest taken in the Crusades of the following century. Infidels were yet to be exterminated from the land of the Holy Sepulchre; the sacred duty of waging interminable war against the Infidel still continued to be preached. But the call was no longer heard with alacrity: the interest was gone; and the change of circumstance was not a state of inaction, as of exhaustion after violent exertion, but of employment, as we have said, in a new direction. We may characterise the activity which then began to develop itself, in general terms, as an expansion of intellect, as a reaching towards larger and more diversified means of learning and information. The efforts made in this direction were indeed feeble in their result: they were those of persons ignorant of the true grounds of mental cultivation, of the right method of applying any existing resources to that end. But still there was a vigour about them; a spirit of enterprise, which, in more felicitous circumstances, would undoubtedly have produced more fruitful results. There was enough certainly in the intellectual labours of the XIIIth Century, however, in the pride of modern improvements in Literature, we may look back on them with contempt, to engage the elevated and aspirant mind. Little really worthy of such minds was to be accomplished by the adventures of a military life, the only other existing resource besides the pursuit of Literature, to those endowed with any energy of character. The spirit of Chivalry, as it is called, had its charms for those cast in a rougher mould; to whom the busy stillness of the intellectual life, would in any Age have seemed no better than torpor and stupidity. But to the gentler, more thoughtful disposition of mind, the diversion into the quiet paths of Philosophy, would be eagerly hailed as a refuge from the storms of the world, where it might freely exert its strength, and come back from its excursions, loaded with the spoils of bloodless victories.

To those, however, who were duly susceptible of the Social improvement begun at that period, the Church of the XIIIth Century presented the only opportunity for indulgence of the sentiment awakened in their minds. The great Society of the Church itself, and the several subordinate associations into which it was divided, the Monastic Orders, and the Schools of Theology, presented means of combination, and opportunities for the display of personal talent and influence, which could be found nowhere else. The Church in fact, as it then was constituted, was the great centre of power. Men who looked on what passed around them with any shrewdness of discernment, could not but observe that, whilst kings and armies were the ostensible agents in the affairs of the world, it was the power of the Church which actuated the whole machine, and guided, if it did not always originate, the complex movements of the social mass. If there was ambition then in the breast of any one, here was the theatre on which it might act; if there was the love of Literature, here it might find opportunities for its gratification; if there was concern for the public good, the high-born wish to be among the benefactors of the human race, here were the means provided by which either good or evil might be achieved on the greatest scale. Nor was the simple circumstance of the fellowship subsisting between members of the Church as such,—and more particularly of that intimate connexion between individuals of the same Religious fraternity,—an inconsiderable attraction to men of sensibility and refinement, in those days when society scarcely existed in the world at large. In these associations, the artificial distinctions which separated man from man, disappeared. Men met together on a principle independent of the passions or the vicissitudes of the world, the principle of equality in the sight of Him who is no respecter of persons. At the same time, there was enough in them to solicit and reward the candidates for the spiritual Society, who entered it with higher pretensions of birth, or talent, or character. The dignities of Bishop, or Abbot, or General of an Order, held out to such persons a rank analogous to the aristocracy of worldly station; or where a more refined and spiritual ambition might be superior to such attractions, the loftier, more abstract honours of saintly reputation, or the refined luxury of a profession of piety, maintained the Social improvement of the Church.

* Sub initium anni 1225. Oudin, in Vit.

Biography. to superior merit its due relative situation in the community.

Probably indeed the adoption of the monastic profession by Aquinas, in the first instance, was not altogether voluntary. The first step may have been taken with little reflection on the momentous change of life consequent on it; from the mere enthusiasm of a youthful mind, and an ardent compliance with the example and wishes of a revered instructor. The Dominican and Franciscan Orders, themselves in great measure an effect of the peculiar circumstances of the times, were but recently established in the early part of the XIIIth Century. The spirit of proselytism consequently was actively exerting itself at this period, to obtain for each its respective votaries, and raise it to an ascendancy over the rival institution. The Dominican Order especially, as framed in a more worldly spirit of fanaticism, had its clever and active partisans dispersed every where, who, by the fame of their erudition and piety, and by their tact, won the hearts of devout hearers to their cause. It was by the addresses of a preacher at Naples, a Dominican, by name John of St. Julian, that Aquinas was induced to take up the monastic profession. He had imbibed the teaching of the Monk with an eager attention, and anxiously sought an opportunity of personal conference with his spiritual instructor. A conversation with St. Julian decided his purpose. His religious wish was communicated to the brothers, and readily approved by them; on which he immediately assumed the habit of a Dominican, and immured himself within a Monastery of the Order at Naples.

Intelligence of this proceeding on his part was received by his family with the greatest concern and indignation. Theodora, his mother, especially, remonstrated with passionate vehemence against the act, and strove to reclaim him to his family. The writer of the Life prefixed to his Works, in his partiality to the sacred Order, would have us believe that the resentment of the mother was an after-thought; and that at first she expressed the piety of her heart in devout thankfulness to God at the event. But with what probability this statement is made, we may judge from the active measures taken to frustrate the purpose of her son. The recovery of such a step was not easily to be effected, or rather was impracticable. The victim of the cloister was bound by a spell which no entreaties or menaces could unsay. In this difficulty, force was resorted to as the only expedient. But the Dominicans were on the alert. To prevent the effect of an interview with his mother, they conveyed their novice to Rome, intending to transmit him thence to Paris. His mother followed him to Rome, and disappointed of seeing him there, instructed his brothers to watch the roads, and intercept him on his way. They succeeded in surprising him as he was drinking at a spring after the fatigues and heat of his journey, forcibly seized him, and struggling in vain to strip him of his monastic habit, carried him away to his home. His mother received him with tears, and provided for his future security, by confining him within their own castle. The Dominicans complained to the Pope of the sacrilege: but though the Pope was disposed to favour the new Religious Orders, as the great bulwarks of his authority, the power of the Emperor, who was in the interest of the brothers of Aquinas, was then in collision with that of the Apostolic See, and could not be boldly opposed. His family was left for the present, therefore, in undisturbed possession of their recovered prize.

Aquinas being once more in the bosom of his own family, every argument of kindness was tried by his mother and sisters to alter his unwelcome purpose. He was proof against these, and even against the severities of angry rebuke; expressing his readiness to submit to the closest confinement, but never to abandon the Religious profession which he had assumed. To complete the trial of the future Saint, by an experiment usual in the legends of Saints, the biographer adds, that the brothers of Aquinas next assailed him with the blandishments of female society; thinking that the resolution which had proved inexorable under stern trials, might at length yield to softer impressions. They introduced accordingly a female visitant to his apartment. Consolation was made the ostensible pretext of the visit; whilst under this cover all the winning arts of womanly endearment were plied to solicit his affections. His firmness had nearly failed him under this ordeal, when suddenly collecting himself, with a rude indignation, he abruptly dismissed his fair assailant, searing her from his presence with such arms as were ministered by the fury of the moment, a burning stick snatched from the hearth. He then threw himself, as the story proceeds, before the sign of the Cross, which the random force of the stick had traced on the wall; and praying for strength to resist the temptations of the flesh, and for an entire devotedness, he at length fell asleep from exhaustion. The scene is closed by a vision of two angels, appearing to him as he slept, girding him, and strengthening his chaste determination.

Aquinas patiently endured this imprisonment at his own home for two whole years, relieving his stubborn solitude only by prayer, and religious contemplation, and literary studies. Together with the Scriptures, the Book of the Sentences, the celebrated Digest of Theology compiled by Peter Lombard, a Bishop of Paris in the preceding Century, now engaged his attention. At the same time he employed himself in writing a Commentary on Aristotle's Book of Fallacies. The art of disputation was cultivated at this period with the most intense interest, as we shall presently show more fully, being regarded as an essential part of the education and business of the Theologian. The writings of Aristotle in particular, being more known to the Christians of the West about the same time, attracted extraordinary curiosity: and both the Dominicans and Franciscans dexterously availed themselves of the course which the fashion of the Age had taken; establishing Chairs of Philosophy at the various Schools and Universities, for the express purpose of expounding the doctrines of Aristotle. We find accordingly a Logical Work of that Philosopher occupying the leisure of the secluded devotee, no less than studies of a strictly Theological character.

The tenderness of a mother was no match for the implacable resolve of an enthusiastic self-devotion. The mother of Aquinas, who had all along been the chief agent in these measures of restraint, finding all endeavour to turn him from his purpose utterly unavailing, at length gave up the unequal contest, and connived at his escape; preferring probably making the concession in that way, to openly surrendering him to the demands of the Dominicans. The Monks were apprized that his escape might be effected by night. Accordingly, they were in attendance at the stated time, at the well-

Thomas Aquinas.

Expendents tried by his family to reclaim him.

He is imprisoned for two years; relieves his solitude by prayer and study.

His escape connived at by his mother.

Aquinas won to the Dominican profession by John de St. Julian.

Enters a Monastery at Naples.

Indignation of his mother.

He is rescued by his brothers.

and confined at his own home.

Biography. known window of his apartment, through which they had been used secretly to convey to him the woollen habit of the Order. He let himself down from the window, was received by them, and conducted to Naples, and then to Rome, to John the Teutonic, the General of the Order. This took place in the year 1244, when he was in the twentieth year of his age.

He was immediately placed by the General of the Order under the charge of Albert of Cologne, also a Dominican by profession, and whose fame for science and erudition, then diffused throughout Europe, had obtained for him the distinctive appellation of the Great. The School of Albert, indeed, like that of Plato at Athens, (if we may venture to compare the degenerate Philosophy of the Middle Age with the high thoughts and animated eloquence of the classic Age of Science,) appears to have been the great seminary, from which the chief Philosophers of the subsequent period were propagated. Plato combined the traditions of ancient wisdom extant at his time, and moulded them into a whole by the force of his genius: and it is to that spirit which he breathed over the whole, and which his disciples imbibed, that we may trace both the acute vigour of the Aristotelic Logic, and the masculine dignity of the Stoic Ethics. So to Albert of Cologne the epithet of the Great appears to be not unworthily attached, if we look to the effects of his influence on the Philosophy of the Schools of the Middle Age. Before him there hardly existed any Philosophy, that might properly be called Scholastic. There had been many who had taught the like principles, and had reasoned in the same manner: particularly we may notice Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury; who in the century preceding composed several Treatises which display an astonishing power of metaphysical reasoning. So, again, Abelard, though inferior to Anselm, might be mentioned as an eminent instance at the same period, of the same kind of metaphysical acuteness. And perhaps but for him,—but for that popularity which Abelard attained, and for the disciples of his School, who afterwards filled influential stations in the Church,—the School of Albert would not have been frequented, or his method of philosophizing have been so generally adopted. Still Albert must have the praise of having systematized the Scholastic discussions; of having perfectly accomplished what Anselm had only partially executed; the drawing to one point the mass of reasonings which had hitherto existed in dispersed portions, and combining the various principles employed in those reasonings into one peculiar Philosophy, to which we give the peculiar name of Scholasticism.

In Aquinas, Albert had a pupil exactly qualified for maturing the instructions received in his School. To carry on the analogy just mentioned, Aquinas was to Albert what Aristotle was to Plato. Aquinas digested the rude plan of Albert, and elaborated the system in its minutest parts. Under Albert, indeed, at Cologne, he exercised the functions of "Master of the Students;" collecting and reducing to writing the lectures of his master; so that his mind was in fact completely formed by the training of Albert.* He had not that taste for physical pursuits, or that various knowledge for which Albert was distinguished; but his attention was more concentrated on the pure theories of Scholasticism in itself, and their application to Theology. And here he may be said to have surpassed his master. The wonderful perspicuity which, amidst all the subtilities and abstruseness of metaphysical speculation, pervades his celebrated Work entitled the Sum of Theology, is enough to establish his superiority in the contrast, as well with Albert, as with any other Scholastic writer, on this particular ground.

Whilst a hearer of Albert, Aquinas was content to listen and learn in silence, leaving the exercise of disputation to others; both from an extreme reserve and shyness of disposition, and from his devotional employment, which led him to avoid all conversation and concern in affairs of the World. He carried this reserve so far as to incur the reproach of stupidity from some, and even the humorous appellation of "the mute ox," which the massy frame of his limbs rendered the more apposite. But he had an opportunity of showing how little the reproach was merited, when Albert, having heard how he had convinced and silenced some individuals who had presumed to instruct him, called on him to defend a particular opinion on the following day. The dexterity with which he executed this task, reluctant as he was to undertake it, from an excess of diffidence in himself, astonished all present, and extorted from Albert the honourable and characteristic eulogy; that "the mute ox, as he was called, would one day make the world resound with his roaring."

The great Professors of that day did not confine their instructions to one particular place, but went from School to School, as their services might be required. During three years, from 1245 to 1249, Albert filled the Chair of Theology at the College of St. James at Paris. There accordingly he was attended by Aquinas. On the return of Albert to Cologne in 1248, Aquinas accompanied him; and appears to have resided there until 1253, when he returned once more to Paris, and commenced the office of a public lecturer. At the commencement of his lecture, which consisted of an exposition of the Book of the Sentences, he had only the degree of Bachelor: but the talent which he displayed so excited the admiration of all, that at the close of his course, he was created Master in Theology; an honour which he accepted, it is said, not without a modest reluctance.*

In 1260 he left Paris, and appeared as a Professor of Theology and Philosophy in his native Country; accompanying the Court of Rome in its successive changes of residence, and teaching at Rome, Bologna, Pisa, and other cities of Italy. At length, in 1272, he proceeded to Naples, where he continued the same course of laborious employment during the remainder of his life.

In the midst of these active labours, his mind, it is said, was still incessantly engaged in religious contemplation, which he regarded as the most real mode of prayer. To such excess did he carry these silent con-

* There is some difficulty in ascertaining the dates of these circumstances. According to the biography prefixed to his Works he was twenty five years of age when he went to Paris, and obtained the Theological degree. This may have preceded his formal commencement of the duty of a lecturer in Theology. Oudin, in his Life of Aquinas, assigns the year 1256 as that in which the degree of Doctor was conferred on him at Paris: a date which is confirmed by the observations of Brucker also, Hist. Crit. Philoe. tom. iii. p. 800.

* Frater Thomas magister lecturarum studiosi collegii, et redegit in scriptis opus, stylo disertum, subtilitate profundum, sicut a fonte tanti doctoris haurire potuit, qui in sacralis omnium hominum in sui temporis aetate precepsit. Vita S. Th. ap. Act. SS. Mon. Mortii, tom. i. p. 603. Jourdain, Rech. Crit. sur l'Age et l'Origine des Trad. Lat. d'Aristote, p. 436. Paris, 1819.

Thomas Aquinas.

Extreme reserve and diffidence of Aquinas.

His lectures at Paris.

He created Master in Theology.

He retired finally to Naples.

His mental abstraction.

Biography. temptations, that in the midst of society he would sometimes be entirely lost in mental abstractness. An instance of this, it is said, occurred in the presence of the King of France; when, from the vehemence of his interest in an argument pursued in the silence of his own thoughts, he struck the table with his hand, exclaiming, "that the argument was now conclusive against the Manichees." The ambitious style of Saintly biography has appended also several miraculous stories to the account of his mystical devotion; such as, that by intensity of contemplation he was, on some occasions, so transported out of the world of matter, that his very body, sympathizing with the elevation of his mind, was raised into the air.

General view of the Scholastic Religious life.

In order, indeed, to arrive at a just estimate of the Religious and Philosophical character of Aquinas, and, in him, of the whole class of Theologians to which he belongs, we should observe him under this point of view more particularly. It is the practical exemplification of the Scholastic Philosophy. As that Philosophy was a mixture of Heathen and Scriptural truth, so the Religion of the Schoolman was a mixture of two systems of life—the perfect life of the Heathen Philosopher and that of the Christian. From Heathenism were derived all those austerities and privations, and sequesterations of the thoughts and affections from the concerns and sympathies of humanity, so fondly regarded as the highest credentials of purity and sanctity; whilst the more excellent parts of that scheme of life, the devotion to the glory of God, the imitation of the life of Christ, and the fixing of the mind on the things of Eternity, were, as taken in themselves, real constituents of Christian profession. But Christianity nowhere gives the preference to the contemplative life over the practical: on the contrary, it lays its stress on the duty of practical exertion; presenting to us for our example, one of eminently social disposition and social habits, and who went about doing good, conversing and acting amidst the scenes of human life. But Heathenism has exalted the contemplative life in comparison with the practical. And it naturally did so: its theory of human happiness required such a view. In that theory, the life of contemplation was the substitute for the Future State which Christianity reveals. The Philosopher beheld in that life the nearest approach to a condition, in which the soul is at rest, and where the wicked cease from troubling. Exemption from the active engagements of an evil world, where the force of irregular passions and depraved customs is continually disturbing the tenour of happiness, promised a repose and security which could be found in no other way. The Philosopher, therefore, living entirely in theory, and having no further concern with the world than that which the actual necessities of nature required, was the most truly virtuous, the most truly happy man, according to Heathen views. It followed, too, from this estimate of human happiness, that the peculiarly social affections would sink in importance. At first they would lose their relative force in connection with the other principles of human nature, in consequence of their not being proportionately exercised. Their indulgence would next come to be regarded as positively sinful; and then would be created those imaginary virtues of ascetic continence and passive obedience—the living among men, as not a man—as a living instrument, actuated, not by Feeling, but by pure unimpassioned Reason. Such then were the principles engrained on the Christian self-denial. There is something attractive to the imagination, it must be confessed, in thus living and dying, as it is said, in "the odour of sanctity." But it is only an illusion of the imagination; which pleases itself, without dwelling on the thought of what is morally right or wrong in the concrete being, man, with the ideal beauty of a superhuman purity and of a heroic, romantic virtue. The mass of human misery which has really been produced by the indulgence in this fond illusion, who can duly estimate? Half of human nature has thus been left without cultivation, and consequently more than half of human happiness has been sacrificed. A penalty not ordained by God has been affixed to certain acts, and a false susceptibility communicated to the conscience. Whilst, therefore, much positive happiness has been missed from the want of a due exertion of all the active principles of human nature, much positive misery also has been inflicted, in the waverings and searchings of heart which an unreal code of moral offences has occasioned.

The real evils covered under the snow-white mantle of the angelic life of devotional contemplation, did not escape the notice or the censure of some even in that Age, when the fashion of piety was entirely set that way. Indeed, the disregard of parental authority, the breaking of ties of blood and of friendship, which this inhuman Religion produced; the neglect of social duties, the proud humility involved in it; could not pass unobserved. For who, in his heart, could justify the renunciation of family, the fanatical self-devotedness of the young Aquinas, when once he had given himself over to the Religious fraternity? If the constancy and pious feeling of the individual be admired, yet who could approve the spirit of an institution, which could so control and pervert the best principles, shaping the immutable law of right and wrong according to its own arbitrary will. The biographer of Aquinas, in order to magnify the virtue of his hero, has introduced his mother and sisters pathetically remonstrating with him on the act of desertion, and asking whether those could be preachers of peace who could produce so much discord in the bosom of families? The speeches, however, which he puts in their mouths, are the real expressions of the popular indignation against the Monastic Orders. Nor were these complaints without their organs among the Clergy themselves. A Work appears to have been presented to the Pope Clement IV., in which the author freely discussed the merits of the Monastic life, complaining of its inertness and its opposition to the precepts of Scripture. This Work indeed Aquinas was called upon to answer; and he succeeded, as we might expect from an effort thus made under the command of the sovereign authority of the Church, in suppressing the obnoxious publication.*

In truth, the cause of the Monastic institutions did not rest on argument; however ingeniously Aquinas may have defended it. They were a requisition of the times. They were aristocratical, as opening to the higher orders a resource of power and influence: but there was also a democratical leaven in them, so far as the lowest of the people might be admitted into them, and all as brothers were on a footing of equality. They had therefore in their constitution a principle of conservation. All classes in some measure felt it to be their interest, that these Societies should exist. Their vices would sometimes attract indignation, or their follies excite a laugh: but these were transient expressions:

Thomas Aquinas.

Censures of the Monastic system at that time.

Real basis of the Monastic institutions.

* Fit. S. Thom. Opera, ed. Antwerp. 1612.

Biography. the institutions themselves survived these attacks, unshaken at least, so long as they rested on the demands of social life.

Peculiar claims of the Dominican and Franciscan Orders.

Add to this that the institution of the Dominican and Franciscan Orders was an effort of reformation. The world was scandalized at the luxurious habits and pomp and wealth of the ancient Orders. It occurred to the thoughtful observers of the state of public opinion, that new institutions, professing poverty, and devoted to the active duties of preaching, and the cultivation of Learning and Philosophy, were wanted at such a crisis. And the truth of their calculations was shown in the great popularity which the institutions so framed immediately obtained. It was an infusion of new blood and new life into the decayed body of Monasticism; and men forgot the innate deformity of the system, in the renovation of energy and active usefulness which it exhibited in its revival.

Aquinas refuses all worldly dignity.

The situation in which Aquinas now stood was so congenial to his temper, that no offers of promotion to the dignities of his Order or of the Church, could induce him to quit it. Clement IV. would have advanced him to the Archbishopric of Naples. But though his own town of Aquino had been sacked by the Imperial forces, and his relatives who had espoused the cause of the Pope were slain or driven into exile, he could not be prevailed on to receive any accession to his worldly fortunes. Nor would he even accept the station of Abbot of Monte Cassino, which was also offered to him, and which might have seemed more accordant with the tenour of his life. He showed his contempt of all earthly honours and wealth, when on a visit at Paris, his pupils having jocosely observed that the Kingdom of the Gauls was what they wished for him, he replied, "For my part I would rather have the Commentaries of Chrysostom on Matthew." It was no little complacency in his own peculiar pursuits, which could have dictated such an answer.

His perspicacious method of instruction.

Rome, Paris, and Naples appear to have been the principal scenes of his labours. His lectures were crowded not only with doctors and dignitaries of the Church, but with persons of every class. His teaching is characterised as eminently perspicuous, though proceeding in the established Scholastic method of disputation. For though, as it is observed, he had spent much study on Cicero and other classical writers, he did not think it becoming his modesty to depart from the established method, and adopt a more easy, open style. Such, at least, is the statement of his biographer. But we must express our doubts whether any other form of teaching than that generally adopted in the Schools of the Middle Age, would have appeared at all proper, or even have suggested itself, to a mind trained in the Philosophy of that period. The method itself is so closely connected with the Philosophy, that for a writer or lecturer to have followed any other, would surely have appeared a departure from his principles.

His vast labours in composition.

The whole period of his life was included within fifty years, the latter half of which was uninterruptedly devoted to these intellectual labours. How incessantly his mind was occupied in them, is sufficiently evident from the voluminous monuments of them which are yet extant. The mass of accumulated Commentary on various Treatises of Aristotle, of discussion of questions of Philosophy and exposition of Scripture, which compose his Works, is truly astonishing. The printed edition of his Works extends to eighteen volumes in folio.

Of these, the first five consist of Commentaries on Aristotle, the remaining volumes being occupied by his Sum of Theology, his principal Work, which fills three of the volumes, his Commentary on the Book of the Sentences, Commentaries on various Books of Scripture, Sermons, and some smaller Theological tracts. Nor are these the whole of his writings.* If we may believe his panegyrista, his facility of composition was so great, that he constantly employed four persons to write by his dictation, which was even too rapid for their united labours. Or if we would follow them in the still greater marvel of the story, he could compose himself to rest when exhausted, and still carry on the connection of his argument unbroken. An ambition seems to actuate the biographer of a Philosopher-Saint, like that of the panegyrista of Mahomet, of magnifying the literary labours of his hero into miraculous effects.

This restless working of the mind at length exhausted the powers of his constitution. He had been invited by Gregory X. to attend the 11d Council of Lyons in 1274, in which the disputes constantly agitated with the Greek Church were to be debated with a view to their settlement. By command of the preceding Pope, he had composed a Work against the Greeks, which he intended to have presented at the Council. But he did not live to attend the Council. He was seized with illness on his journey, and immediately feeling that his end was near, observed to his companion Reginald, who was in constant waiting on him, when, after long reverie, he returned to himself, that "soon he should write no more." Afterwards he became more languid, but rallied again a little, sufficiently to be conveyed on a mule to an adjacent Monastery of the Cistercians. There, on entering the Church, he observed in the same strain of melancholy anticipation to Reginald: "Here is my resting place for ever and ever." The Monks were delighted to receive so distinguished an inmate, and waited on his dying bed with sedulous kindness. He lingered for several days; but they were days in unison with the tenour of his life. He continued conversing with the Monks, and instructing them to the last, and even at their request composed, in that extremity, Commentaries on the Canticles of Solomon. He received the Eucharist prostrating himself on the ground, and exerting his feeble strength to meet the Host. After receiving also the rite of extreme unction with the same devoutness, he calmly expired with a serene countenance; replying just before his departure, to an inquiry from his sister, "whether he had any wish to express," that "soon he should have every wish gratified."

Thus died this extraordinary man; a martyr, we may say, to the spirit of the times in which he lived; and affording in himself a striking picture of the state of Christianity in that Age. There was in him the gentleness, the modesty, the piety of the Christian character; but these graceful outlines were dashed with the hard touches of Monastic austerity. He stands forth to our view, like the sculptured image of the form of Christianity, executed after the true model, but by some rude hand, ignorant of the principles of taste, and unable to subdue the stubborn marble to a conformity with the living original. His mental endow-

* Considerable deduction must be made for the Commentaries of the Cardinal Caietan, appended to his text, for translations of Aristotle accompanying the exposition, and for some additions of writings which are not his. The Antwerp edition of 1612 is the one referred to here.

His character.

Biography. —ments and character are not inaptly represented by the description given of his person. His body, it is said, was "almost vast, tall, and massy in the bones, to which the spare flesh scarcely gave a complete covering." For so was there something gigantic in his mind and his scheme of life, whilst there was a nakedness and dreariness in his studies and contemplative pursuits,—a want of substance and vitality,—truly characteristic of the scholastic Theologian and Philosopher. Nor is the remainder of the portrait out of keeping with the above. "The expression of his eyes," continues his biographer, "was most modest; his face oblong; his complexion inclined to sallowness; his forehead more depressed than the profundness of his intellect might seem to require; his head large and round, and partly bald; his person erect."*

Thomas Aquinas.

His reputed sayings.

Some of his sayings have been thought worthy of being recorded. Being asked why he had kept silence so long under Albert, he answered, "Because as yet I knew nothing to say worthy of Albert." Being asked again what was the most agreeable thing that could happen to him, he answered, "To understand all that I have read." Some one observed that he was not as learned as he was thought, "It is for that reason I study," he said, "that men may not be deceived." Being reproached for the size of his body: "The cucumber," he said, "also grows without food." Being blamed by a certain matron for avoiding women, when he was himself born of a woman; "This is the very reason," he answered, "because I was born of a woman." To his sister, inquiring what and where Paradise was: "You will know both," he said, "if you will only merit it." To persons consulting him how they might escape error: "By doing every thing," he said, "so as to be able to give a reason for the action." Going to visit Bonaventura, and finding his friend employed in writing the Life of St. Francis: "Let us leave," he said, "the Saint to labour for the Saint;" and retired.† Being led by an importunate brother about the streets of Bologna, until he was exhausted with fatigue, he replied to one who wondered at his patient submission: "By nothing else is Religion perfected but by obedience."

Extent of his fame.

His great reputation during his lifetime attracted to him the notice and favour of the several Pontiffs under whom he flourished. He enjoyed also the patronage of the chivalrous and sainted King of France, Louis IX., who highly esteemed him both for his learning and his counsels. A Work addressed by him to the King of Cyprus on the Government of Princes, shows still further the extent of his fame. He was frequently applied to for counsel in difficulties by various persons throughout Europe. So much was the recluse Monk, living out of the world by profession, familiarly known to the world of his day: and so great must have been the influence really exercised by him, amidst his formal renunciation of all human concerns. Amongst his friends, of whom he had several warmly attached to him, he particularly honoured Albert, whose name from a feeling of respect, it is said, he would never expressly mention in any discussion of his opinions. The legend says, that so great was the union of friendship between these two, that Albert being at dinner at Cologne at the time when Aquinas expired, felt a secret intimation of the event;

for that rising with tears in his eyes from the table, and being asked by the persons present the cause of his distress, he informed them that Thomas Aquinas, the light of the Church, and his dearest friend, was dead. Albert, too, it is added, so approved the doctrines of his favourite disciple, and felt so great an interest in his reputation, as to have undertaken a journey to Paris, in his eightieth year, to defend Aquinas from the attacks of Theological opponents.*

But great as his reputation was during life, it was increased ten-fold after his death. It was then cherished as the property of a rival party in the Church. The interest of the Dominican Order was engaged in setting forth the heroism and the Philosophy of their own brother to the greatest advantage. Hence the miraculous attestations which are alleged to have been given to his sanctity and the truth of his doctrines. The question of the Immaculate Conception which divided the Dominicans and Franciscans, made each party solicitous about maintaining their ground in the popular favour. Arguments might suffice, as addressed to each other, to learned and philosophizing Theologians; but other means of persuasion were required with the mass of believers. This is evident in the introduction of accounts of miracles confirmatory of their doctrines, both in the Life of Aquinas, and in the counterpart on the Franciscan side, the Life of John Duns Scotus. They are not merely the miracles of the ordinary legend, but miracles intended to bear on the truth of their doctrines. To John Duns Scotus, the marble statue of the Virgin bows its head, as he offers a prayer before it, on his way to the place where he is to hold his triumphant disputation in favour of the Immaculate Conception.† To Thomas Aquinas, not only the Apostle Paul gives an express sanction to the Saint's interpretation of his Epistles, but the Virgin, and even Jesus Christ himself, speaking through the mouth of their images, confirm the Saint's exposition of doctrine, by the declaration, Bene scripsisti de me Thomas.

The honours of canonization conferred by John XXII. in the year 1323, and the assignment to him of the rank of Vth Doctor of the Church, were the fruits of the same struggle. The honours given to a Dominican were paralleled on the other side by the like declarations in favour of Bonaventura, a Franciscan. And as Aquinas was styled in the phraseology of those days, the Angelic Doctor, so, on the other hand, the title of the Seraphic Doctor was assigned to Bonaventura.

But the Theology of Aquinas triumphed in the end. The repeated declarations of Popes that his writings were perfect, without any error whatever, gave a sanction to them which perpetuated their authority in the Church and in the Schools. The intrinsic merits, indeed, of his Sum of Theology, in comparison with every other composition of the Scholastic Age, secured for that Work the high estimation in which it has been constantly held. But the fact of his having represented more closely the doctrines of Augustine, the great authority of the Latin Church, on the questions of Grace and Predestination, than the rival Philosopher of the Franciscans, John Duns Scotus, is quite reason enough to account for his more extensive and permanent popularity in the Church.

Triumph of his doctrines in the Church.

The friendship between Aquinas and Albert.

* Life prefixed to the edition of his Works. Antwerp, 1612.

† The proper name of Bonaventura was John de Flandria. He was a native of Tuscany, born in 1171. He became a Cardinal, and died in 1274, during the holding of the 11d Council of Lyons.

* In 1277. Albert died at Cologne, Nov. 15, 1280, at the age of eighty-seven. He was also, like Aquinas, of noble family. Jourdain, Rech. Crit. sur l'âge et l'Orne des Trad. Lat. d'Arist. p. 332.

† J. Duns Scoti Vit. a Luc. Wadding. Scoti Oper. tom. i.

Biography.

PHILOSOPHY OF AQUINAS AND THE SCHOOLMEN.

Uniform character of the Scholastic Philosophy.

As we remarked, at the commencement of our observations on the life of Aquinas, the invariableness of character in the different Philosophers of the Schools, is the point to which we would first direct attention, in order to arrive at just views of the nature of the Scholastic Philosophy. The uniform aspect of their biography and their Philosophy is equally remarkable, when we compare them with the eminent men of any other period of Literary History. Take, for instance, Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, Aristotle, all, we may say, trained in the same method, and nearly contemporary; and yet how different is the character both of their lives and of their Philosophy! We see in them all the variety of original minds; the later, indeed, versed in the systems of the former, but yet striking out a path for themselves, and throwing into their speculations the peculiarities of their own turn of thought and of their respective condition of life. But compare Albert the Great, Thomas Aquinas, John Duns Scotus, William Ockam, the four most eminent in the annals of Scholasticism, and to whom we may most properly refer as illustrations of its spirit and form, and we observe only an expansion and working out of the same ideas, in Ockam the last in the succession, which we find in Albert the first. There may be minor differences in parts; the conclusions at which they arrive are sometimes directly opposed. But still it is one note that we hear sounding through all. One might think that it was some mechanical process by which the several elaborate systems of these authors had been constructed; so little evidence is there in them of the vitality of human nature; of their Works having been composed by men each of whom had his own feelings, his own views, his own temper and prejudices.

This uniformity the general idea of the system.

Proceeding then from the uniformity of Scholasticism as the most general idea of its nature, we shall the more easily fall into that train of speculation which the Philosophy of the Schools exhibits. We commonly hear this Philosophy spoken of as dark and subtle, and intricate; and indeed the words "Scholastic subtilty," "Scholastic trifling," are in the mouths of every one. But these are merely declamatory expressions, and give us no proper general description of its character. They denote qualities which accidentally belong to Scholasticism, and which are the consequences of its fundamental idea; modes of proceeding to which it was led by the principle on which it took its rise. The uniformity which pervades it, is, as we have said, the most faithful representation of that principle. This is its real characteristic as it is distinguished from all other scientific methods which have engaged the attention of mankind. The explanation and account of that uniformity will be the great object of our present inquiry. This will lead us to just notions of the method pursued by Aquinas and his brother Philosophers, and of the nature of that system in itself.

Constitution of the Latin Schools.

If we revert to the character of the Schools of the Middle Ages, we shall find a tendency in those institutions to impress one unvarying form on the mental constitution of those educated in them. They were not founded with a view to the enlargement of the mind, to the cultivation and improvement of the intellectual and moral principles, for their own sake, in order to the perfect development of the human being. But they were designed for a particular object; to render those trained in them more fit instruments for the Civil or Ecclesiastical power. We have only to read the regulations of the Theodosian

Code concerning the students at Rome, in A. D. 370, to form an idea of the spirit of those institutions. The strictest supervision, we find, was exercised in regard to the studies pursued and the disposal of their time; the Emperor requiring a report to be sent to him every year of those admitted, that he might know the merits of each, and employ them in offices of public business suitable to their talents.* Nor were they permitted to remain at Rome beyond a certain age: the object being, probably, to disperse them through the Provinces of the Empire, and diffuse the benefits of Roman civilization. The Latin Language, by a wise policy, being retained throughout the Empire, as the language of public business, the institution of the Schools was directed to the cultivation of a knowledge of that Language, and a study, consequently, of Latin authors. Provision, indeed, was made for the study of Greek Literature, but it appears to have formed only a subordinate object of the Schools of the Western Empire, more as the accomplishment, than as the business, of the student. In the East, where Greek civilization was in action at the time of the Roman conquests, Greek continued to be spoken and studied, both as a vernacular Tongue, and as the sacred idiom of Poetic and Philosophic inspiration. But in the West, the legions of Rome had to carry the civilization of Rome into barbarian regions. They had to mould and refine the rough materials which the sword had carved out. This part of the Empire, therefore, was more completely assimilated to Rome. It exhibited, consequently, what we may call a Latin nationality; and the Eastern and Western portions of the Empire became contradistinguished as the Greek and Latin Worlds. A Roman policy has hence been impressed on the Schools of the West, and has survived with that durability which characterises the conceptions of Roman genius, through the long night of the Middle Ages of European History. The Latin Language and Literature, and a limited practical subserviency of the studies pursued, are the prominent features of those Schools, wherever they may have flourished, whether in France, or Italy, or Spain, or Africa, or the British Islands. The great regeneration of the human mind consummated in the reform of Religion, has, in fact, only modified and improved these fundamental characteristics of the education of the Western World. The original Scholastic form has not been obliterated; as we may see in the circumstance alone of the importance which the Latin Language still holds in the Schools and Universities of modern Europe.

But why do we direct attention to the original constitution of the Schools of the West? It is because it contains in it the germ of that principle, which afterwards developed itself in the system of Philosophy called Scholasticism. The Latin Church, growing over the ruins of the Roman Empire, succeeded to the policy and power of the Civil ruler. The maintenance of the Latin Theology became accordingly the immediate limited object to which the Schools, now passed into the hands of Ecclesiastics, would be directed. Men expert in fighting the battles of the Lord, skilful in defending each disputed point, and in parrying the assaults of the Heretic, were the kind of persons which the method of teaching pursued in the Schools would particularly contemplate. There would be no desire on the part of the Latin Churchmen to encourage a freedom

Thomas Aquinas

Transition of the Schools into the hands of Ecclesiastics.

* Codez Theodos. lib. xiv. tit. 9. Baluzi Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. I. p. 77.

Biography. of inquiry, or a wide range over the field of Literature ; the adventurer in such a track might be dangerous to the repose of the Church ; might break that chain of dependence, which bound the subject-people to the chair of spiritual authority. Only such a discipline of the intellect would be provided, as should sharpen and strengthen without emboldening it ; render it apt to object, to discuss, to infer, without tempting it to spread forth Dedalean wings, and soar above the labyrinth in which it was immured.

Effects of studies confined to books.

A commenting Literature, and a second-hand Philosophy, naturally became the burthen of the lessons taught in Schools so constituted, both under their Heathen and their Christian administration. The invention of Works of original genius was foreign to their purpose. The Roman Literature, indeed, was essentially derivative. The spirit of the Republic in the busy period when it was occupied in the acquisition of its Empire, was averse to the soft influence of Letters : and a great people found itself the mistress of the World, and in a high state of civilization, with no domestic Philosophy, and scarcely any domestic Literature. In this state of the case, when the leisure of the people demanded the gratification of Literature, recourse was necessarily had to the stores of a foreign Tongue : and the learned Greek was sought by the studious Roman as the interpreter of the Language and Philosophy of Greece. Thus the learning from books was the expedient to which the literary Roman was necessarily driven. And this led further to the rise and employment of Commentators ; to the study, in short, of the instrument of knowledge in combination with the subject explored, and at length to the use of the mere books as an end of study in themselves. When the Schools assumed an Ecclesiastical character, this restricted mode of teaching would only be more fully established. The very low estimation in which all Heathen Literature was held by some of the primitive Fathers, the reprobation, indeed, often cast on it, and the mistaken jealousy with which it was regarded as a rival to Christianity, would contract, instead of extending, the range of studies. Further, Christianity imposing on its disciples the study of a book, the sacred records in which its own truths are deposited, the Christian student would be led to seek his instruction analogously in other subjects from books also : and his Learning, consequently, would consist principally of an interpretation of books.

Increasing ignorance of the Greek Language.

The same reason which induced the Emperors to make the Latin the Language of Government and of Civil intercourse throughout the Empire, would operate no less strongly with the leaders of the Church. The Scriptures being at an early period translated into Latin, were in that form as an original to the Latin world : the knowledge of Greek declining more and more in the West ; to such a degree that, at the close of the 14th Century of the Christian Era, Jerome was perhaps a single exception of a Latin Father competently acquainted with the Greek Language. It would evidently be an important point with the Church leaders, to obtain from all parts of their communion a confession of the same doctrines in the same words. We know what opening is afforded by the translation of expressions of one Language into the corresponding ones of another to vary the sense ; or rather how impossible it is to transmute precisely the same ideas without any addition or diminution, from the terms of one Language into those of another. This, indeed, was felt particularly during the agitation of the early controversies of the Church. The Greek would insist that the Latin should confess in his phraseology, and the Latin was peremptory in resisting, on finding that the terms imposed by the Greek conveyed to his ear a sense which he could not admit. The desire, therefore, of preserving a uniformity of doctrine suggested the necessity of keeping up a knowledge of the Latin Language, as the idiom of Theology, and, with a view to Theology, of all Literature in the Church, wherever the spiritual power had the rule.

Thomas Aquinas.

Translations into Latin of the Works of Greek authors were accordingly the principal, if not the only methods by which those authors were studied in the Schools of the West. It is obvious that such a method would lower the standard of knowledge. It brought the range of studies immediately under the control of the heads of the Church. Those who from their superior learning or talent in governing, were called to the station of command in the Church, were enabled to select those portions of the Greek Literature which might snow their own confined views, and detain the mind of the student on these exclusively. The consequence was that many valuable Treatises of the Greek Philosophy were neglected, and some were forgotten in the Western Schools. Nothing appears to have contributed more than this circumstance to that desolate, barren state, in which we find the Latin Schools in the Centuries subsequent to the 14th, which have proverbially obtained the name of the Dark Ages. The irruption of Barbarians and the miserable state of society, doubtless aggravated the darkness which then spread over Europe. But the seeds of ignorance were sown in the system itself. The wildness and fury of the elements raging without, will not account for that jejune and frivolous erudition, which overran the very soil itself of the fields of knowledge, during this period. We see, however, a sufficient reason for it, in the intrinsic narrowness of the mode of education subsisting in the Schools, in the circumstances of there being no proper Latin Literature, amidst the neglect of the study of the Greek, and the restriction of the attention of thinking men to certain Works existing in Latin translations.

Besides this, the need of Commentaries to explain the text of an author, when he is read as the writer of another Age and another Country, gave occasion for further limiting the views of students. For soon the original text of the author would scarcely be read : the labour would be spent on the Commentary : and only such Works would be read, as were illustrated by Commentaries. And thus in process of time an artificial, microscopic Literature would grow up, wanting entirely the raciness and spirit of original composition, and encumbering the understanding with its molecular accumulations. Such was the result, in fact ; as a glance over any page of the Scholastic Literature will readily make appear to every one. The explanation of the sense of the author commented upon, is the utmost aim of the expositor : his highest ambition is to show what his author means under every possible light, or to elicit out of his assertions a multiplicity of subordinate propositions.

The unphilosophical nature of the Latin Language was in itself a fatal impediment to the vigour of philosophical studies, when that Language came to be employed as the sole medium of intellectual cultivation. Its utter inadequacy to express the subtle abstractions of the Greek Philosopher, was the means of perverting in great measure the truth of Science ; and not unfre-

Effect of translations.

Effect of Commentaries.

Unphilosophical nature of the Latin Language.

Biography. quently indeed of engrafting materialism on the metaphysical ideas of the Greek, when they came to be represented in Latin phraseology.

Scholasticism the result of this method of education.

Scholasticism an inversion of the natural progress of knowledge.

The same method of education, carried to its full extent, developed itself at length in the proper form of Scholasticism. Nothing was wanting for this result but to direct the attention of the student to certain subjects, and certain Treatises on those subjects. And this was naturally the next step taken. It is by observing the stages of this progress, that we shall arrive at correct views of the peculiar Philosophy of the Schools.

But first it becomes matter of inquiry, why it should have resulted in establishing a particular philosophical system, rather than in forming a particular School of Literature in general. Now this will appear, if we consider that Philosophy is the ultimate growth of a people's intellectual progress. Where a people passes through the regular transitions from an infancy to a maturity of intellectual cultivation, Poetry and the Fine Arts at first engage their attention: the taste is formed before the powers of judgment and reasoning are wrought to their severe perfection. This appears from the case of Greece, where we have the instance of a people forming for themselves, by successive original efforts, their own intellectual character. Their genius threw itself forth in its native Poetry; and their Temples, their Statues, and their Pictures, proclaimed its graceful vigour, before the bowers of Academus or the Lyceum resounded with the hum of their Philosophy. This then is the natural progress of things; the natural course of the education of a people. But in the case of the Latin World, as we here designate that part of the Roman Empire which was united into a social mass by Roman civilization, the intellectual character first developed itself in Philosophy: the first great movement was to that which is the last properly in the order of Nature. But the fact explains itself when we look into it more closely. The Schools of the Middle Age received in a mass the accumulated treasures of antiquity. They invented nothing for themselves: the riches of Poetry, Eloquence, and Philosophy, were poured out on them in lavish profusion. At the same time, there was no capacity for appreciating the relative value of the several acquisitions of knowledge. At this crisis, however, polemical disputation called upon the Heads of the Christian Church, to acquaint themselves with the theories of that Philosophy, from which the Infidel or the Heretic drew his attacks on Christianity. The necessity was felt of opposing Philosophy with Philosophy. Hence, from the earliest Ages, Christianity is spoken of by the Fathers, as a Philosophy; and is strenuously maintained to be the only true Philosophy of life, as contrasted with that of Heathen Sages. Whilst the Poetry, therefore, and History, and Eloquence of the Classic Authors were held in contempt, as comparatively unworthy of attention from the Christian, the pages of the Philosopher were eagerly explored, in order to an acquaintance with those principles which were brought into competition with Christianity. And thus, unhappily, the Christian Schools reversed the natural order of the education of the human mind, rushing all at once to an end, legitimately attainable only by the fruit of matured habits of thought and the discipline of all the faculties of the mind. Their Philosophy consequently was an insincere, unreal system; a collection of principles, the data not of investigation and experience, but of a prescriptive authority; the results of the labour and ingenuity of others taken in their concrete form without analysis, and applied as oracular texts for the deduction of truths.

But not only were Works of Philosophy the principal objects of attention to the Christian student, as containing theories of Science, but also, and more especially, as an instruction in the method of polemical defence. The disputers against Christianity were found to possess an acute science of argument, by which they could give a plausibility either to their objections or their heretical speculations. The multitude of believers was open to seduction from the true Faith through the arts of the skilful dialectician, who could often make the worse appear the better view of an opinion or doctrine. The possibility of converting the same instrument to the support of the sacred cause of Christianity and Christian orthodoxy, was obvious. The questionings indeed of the Faithful themselves, which we know from Ecclesiastical History to have arisen on almost every point of doctrine on various occasions, admitting often of no direct answer, required an ingenious solution, so that the difficulty might at least be staved off. (if we may so express it,) might be removed a step beyond that at which the questionist had taken his stand. Thus the necessity of combating the Infidel or Heretic with his own arms, and of providing the Christian advocate with a casuistical Theology, such as should meet all the emergencies of doubt and difficulty in the Christian community, made the study of works of dialectical Science,—the Logic of the ancient Schools,—imperative in the course of Christian education. Hence recourse was had to the great master of that Science among the Philosophers of Greece; and the Works of Aristotle, at first reprobated as atheistical and impious, obtained a practical value, which soon bore down all speculative opposition to them, and exalted that Philosopher to the preeminence in the Scholastic system.

The combination of these two objects,—the necessity of an acquaintance with the theories of ancient Philosophy in themselves, and of acquiring an art of polemical defence,—produced in the result an Eclectic, Logical Philosophy, as the peculiar system of the Schools of the Middle Age. To explain the nature of this Logical Philosophy will be to develop the fundamental principles of Scholasticism.

We must observe, then, that Platonism was the established Philosophy of the Church in the primitive Ages of Christianity. The first converts to the Gospel from the class of Philosophers appear to have been of that Sect: and these brought with them into their new professions, a predilection for the theories which they had only formally renounced in embracing the Gospel. Though the accommodation then attempted to be made between truths of Religion and theories of Philosophy, awakened a just alarm in the minds of many, yet the devout and sublime tone of Platonism softened down the opposition of the pious, and won them over as by a siren-song in despite of themselves. Thus we find Augustine, the great Father of Latin orthodoxy, commending and approving the Platonists, as the only Philosophers who had spoken fully of divine things and of human nature; and in describing his own conversion to Christianity, mentioning the advantages he had derived from reading their writings.

Platonism, accordingly, we may say, was the original orthodox Philosophy of the Church, so far as the Church owned itself philosophical. We see this very strikingly

Thomas Aquinas.

Logic studied as an art of Polemics.

An Eclectic Logical Philosophy the result.

Platonism first distinguished in the Church.

Biography. In the early controversies of the Church, when the speculations, both of the Heretic and of the Orthodox, drawn fundamentally from the theories of Platonism, corrupted the pure truth of the Trinitarian doctrine with the subtle alloy of a refined materialism. So firm was the hold which Platonism had on the Church, from the veneration paid to the great men of its early history who had professed their admiration of that system, and from its having been incorporated with various expositions of Christian Truth, that it was impossible to substitute any other Philosophy in its place, even had any such design existed in the Schools of the Middle Age. Still that Philosophy did not suffice for the whole state of the case. It presented, indeed, the means of speculating on the truths of Christianity, and explaining them to the satisfaction of speculative men: but it was deficient as a method of investigation and argument. It was only a vast collection of theories. Such, however, was not the case with the Philosophy of Aristotle. This was essentially a science of methods. Aristotle had analyzed the principles of human knowledge, examining into the nature of Language, as the instrument of communicating knowledge, and delivering with accuracy and fulness the means of producing persuasion and conviction. This was observed to be eminently the characteristic of a large portion of Aristotle's Works, that collection of Logical Treatises to which Moderns have given the name of the Organon; whilst throughout his Works a methodical character marks them in contrast with the rhetorical diffuseness and irregularity of Plato. Thus was the Christian student invited to the study of the Logic of Aristotle; and thus too has the name of Aristotle been identified with that of Logical Philosopher. An imperfect Logic, indeed, was already taught, drawn from the Stoic School, which being more accordant with the degenerate Philosophy of the later days of Greece, had superseded that of Aristotle. But the Heretics of the II^d and III^d Centuries had infested the citadel of Orthodoxy with missiles furnished from the dialectical armory of Aristotle himself. And this circumstance, whilst it excited a strong prejudice against the Philosophy of Aristotle in general,—for the heresy of his readers was imputed to the system of the Philosopher,—pointed out to the Orthodox, at the same time, the resources for improving their own argumentative power.

Objects of Plato- nism. The disciples of Plato in the Church strenuously opposed the introduction of Aristotle's Philosophy, not only as Churchmen, but as Philosophers. They had carried to an extreme the very doctrine in the system of Plato, which Aristotle had impugned with the severity of his powerful reasoning. They were, therefore, still more strongly opposed to Aristotle than the original School of the Academy. The theory of Ideas was, according to Plato, the cardinal point of all Truth; so far as the Ideas were the abstract intellectual realities from which all objects of the sensible universe derived their existence. But according to the interpretation of his doctrines adopted by his Alexandrian followers, and through them current in the Christian Church, the Ideas were the eternal reasons of things as they are contemplated by the Divine Intellect. The Philosophy of Aristotle, entirely destitute of any thing like enthusiasm, possessing no attraction for the imaginative and the mystic, seemed to those already enamoured of the pleasing reveries of Platonism, a cold, atheistical system that tied down the intellect to the mere things of sense, depriving it of its high and ennobling contemplations of the Divine Being.*

Hence we may account for the entire neglect into which all other portions of Aristotle fell, except the Logical Treatises. These were neutral in the matter of Theology. They contained the rules of a universal method, equally applicable to all subjects. They coincided, however, with the system of the Platonists, inasmuch as that was in itself an application of the Philosophy of Language to the interpretation of Nature. Plato, indeed, had assigned the name of Dialectic to the highest Philosophy, a description which prepared the way for the transformation of it into the Logical Philosophy of the Schools. Thus were the two systems, the Platonic and the Aristotelic, imperceptibly blended together. The Aristotelic, repulsive in its dryness of methodical discussion, and disappointing to the religious feelings of the heart, obtained a support in the enthusiasm of Platonism: whilst Platonism, too imaginative in its own unmixed nature, too evanescent in its abstractions for the herd of Philosophers, descended to conversation with men of humble genius, and combated the religious disputant with reasonings drawn from the practical Philosophy of the Peripatetic School.

This union of the two systems was never indeed completely effected until the mature period of the Scholastic Philosophy which was the result of it; until the period, that is, of Albert the Great and Aquinas, in the middle of the XIIIth Century. In the mean time, we may see the two streams running together, sometimes joined in one channel, sometimes receding from each other. We clearly recognise, as we cast the eye over the page of Ecclesiastical History, two classes of Theologians, the Mystic and the Argumentative; the representatives of each of the two combined Philosophies, and each representing that combination in process. For the Mystic is Argumentative; and the Argumentative betrays a tendency to mysticism: both, in fact, working on partial, undeveloped views of one and the same principle—that very Scholasticism to which their labours separately tended. The Mystic, indeed, as the representative of the original Church Philosophy, is found continually charging on the argumentative Theologian the heresy of his Logic; but the Logician, on the other hand, as the innovator, so far from retorting the censure of mysticism on his opponent, is anxious to show his own contemplative spirit amidst all the rigour and homeliness of his reasonings. These struggles for ascendancy between the Platonic and Aristotelic systems, antecedently to their perfect union in Scholasticism, identified themselves with the conflicts which have ever existed in the human mind, and which the condition of the Church in the Middle Age greatly fomented, between Faith and Reason, and Authority and Reason. Soon the Mystics arrogated to themselves the dignity and merit of supporting the Faith as handed down by the Fathers in its divine simplicity, whilst the Logicians were characterised as the impugners of authority and assertors of Reason against Revelation. Both however were, as we have said, urging forward the same principle, the construction of a divine Philosophy, in which Faith and Reason, Authority and Reason, should meet together and coalesce. The Mystics accomplished this by internal processes of the

Thomas Aquinas.

Logical Treatises of Aristotle exclusively studied.

Union of Mysticism with an Argumentative spirit in the result.

* The existence of a Work attributed to Justin Martyr, entitled Evereo Aristotelicorum Dogmatum, is an evidence to this point.

Objects of Plato- nism. Christians to Aristotle.

Biography. intellect, pursuing the Ideas of divine truth by an imaginary spiritualization of the thoughts to the utmost abstractedness from the world. The Logical Theologian only more avowedly trod the same path, pursuing the same ideas by the scientific methods of definition, analysis, and argument.

Augustine and Boethius the leaders in forming the system.

The two great leaders in the formation of this system were Augustine, at the close of the IVth Century and commencement of the Vth, and Boethius about a century afterwards. Augustine, as a venerated head of the Church, whose voice was received as decisive of all points of controversy, set the example in his own writings of a speculative Theology, in which the truths of Revelation were subjected to argumentative discussion. Whilst his authority overruled the refractory reasonings of heresy, he established by the course of his own disputations, orthodox principles of religious speculation. Still in Augustine the Theologian prevailed over the Philosopher. In Boethius, on the contrary, Philosophy was supreme. This may be seen in his well-known Treatise On the Consolation of Philosophy; in which it is not Christianity, but Philosophy, that whispers peace to the troubled soul, and pours the balm into its wounds. This excellent and great man formed the patriotic design of laying a broad basis of Latin Philosophy, by transmuting the stores of Greek wisdom into the Latin Language. His project was vast beyond the powers of any single agent, however energetic. Though, however, he accomplished but little in the way of translation, his exertions were fully instrumental in introducing to the Latin world that Eclectic method of Philosophy, which afterwards ripened into Scholasticism. This Eclectic method, having for its express object, to establish a concord between Plato and Aristotle,* was the ultimate form which the Greek Philosophy had received in the School of Athens, where Boethius himself had imbibed it. It was, however, but imperfectly maintained through the centuries intermediate to the Age of Boethius and that of Albert and Aquinas. During this period, when Philosophy began at length once more to emerge from the pressure of Ecclesiastical authority, speculative men were engaged in endeavouring to resume the thread of their lost Philosophy, and in making desultory experimental efforts. The first great effort was that of the celebrated John Scotus Erigena in the IXth Century. And this is characterised, as we might have expected, by a wild metaphysical mysticism; such as the religious spirit of the preceding Ages would have suggested to a philosophic mind, anxiously seeking to think for itself, yet encumbered with the heavy armour of a severe ecclesiastical authority. A mind so circumstanced finds its relief in explaining away, by principles of Philosophy, the opinions imposed on its passive belief; and instead of simply making Reason subservient to the defence and exposition of doctrines, overwhelms the sacred Truth with the officiousness of its speculation. The mixed system

John Scotus Erigena.

* Ego omne Aristotelis opus quodcumque in manus venerit, in Romanum stygium vertimus, eorum omnium commenta Latini oratione præcedimus; ut et quid ex Logica Artis subtilitate, et ex moralis gravitate primum, et ex naturalis acumen veritatis, ab Aristotele conscriptum est, id omne ordinatum transferamus; atque id quodam lumine commentationis illustramus; in Latine redigam formam. His variis, non equidem contempnendis Aristotelis Platonisque sententiis in unum quodammodo revocare concordamus, et in his eos, non ut plerique dissimulat in manibus, sed in plerisque quæ sunt in Philosophia maxime concordare, demonstramus, &c. Boethius, Comment. in lib. de interpretatione.

accordingly, compounded of the Philosophies of Plato and Aristotle, degenerated, in the hands of Erigena, from the more sober method of the Athenian School, into the wild enthusiasm of the Platonism of Alexandria. Others again, as Anselm of Canterbury in the Xth Century, exemplified more of the Aristotelic character: whilst Abelard seems to vibrate between the two elements of the combination,—a Platonist where he professedly teaches Theology; a disciple of the Aristotelic School in the rigour and positiveness of his abstract reasonings.

Thomas Aquinas.

The confusion and misery prevailing in the West during the Xth Century produced a retrograde movement in the condition of Literature. The feudal anarchy which then desolated a large portion of Christendom, threw the labourer in the field of Science on the resources supplied by the Arabian Literature of those times. The only conspicuous name which emerges out of the storms and clouds of this period, to preserve the tradition of Latin Philosophy, is that of Gerbert, whose reputation for Learning cast a lustre on the Papal throne to which he was elevated under the title of Sylvester II. He, it appears, was chiefly indebted to the Arabian Philosophers of Spain for that Learning which rendered him the prodigy of his Age. The Arabians, studious of physical and mathematical Science, had cultivated an acquaintance with portions of Aristotle's Philosophy, which had been neglected in the West,—the physical and metaphysical Treatises. By the aid of these they had elaborated an artificial Theurgic system, subsidiary to the imaginary processes of Magic and Alchemy. From them the Christian Schools in the West derived that bias towards notions of Pantheism, which is shown in the speculations of the XIIth and XIIIth Centuries. A system drawn from Commentators on Aristotle was naturally confounded, in the ignorance of those times, with the Philosophy of Aristotle himself. Hence was occasioned a still greater opposition to the reception of his writings. We find in the XIIIth Century "the books of David de Dinant, and Amalric, and Maurice the Spaniard," which taught the Pantheistic system of the Arabians, expressly reprobated by Papal decrees, and with them, in the same sentence, the physical and metaphysical writings of Aristotle.* But Albert and Aquinas, by a more enlarged study of the Works of Aristotle, removed that prejudice which the association of Arabian notions with his system of Nature had engendered. They laboured against that sequaciousness of the Arabian Science, which speculating Christians had displayed. Aquinas more particularly, as the less addicted to physical inquiry, tended to give right views of the nature of Aristotle's Philosophy, and by his exposition of it to establish it in the Church, and thus restore that original Eclectic Philosophy of which Boethius had set the example to the Latins.

Importance of the True time of the Categories.

At first then, we should observe, when Aristotle was united with Plato in the Church system, it was only the Logical treatises of Aristotle that were studied. Of these, that entitled The Categories, or the Predica, was the chief object of attention, and soon the exclusive one. Logic, indeed, being studied with a view to polemics, was necessarily very imperfectly studied. The elementary

* Non legatur libri Aristotelis de Metaphysicis et de Naturali Philosophia, nec summa de eisdem, aut de doctrina magistri David de Dinant, aut Amalrici harricis, aut Maurici Hispani. Laurentii de Vico Aristoteli. Fortuna in Acad. Paris. Bulmi Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. iii. p. 62.

Biography. theory of the Science, that which lays the foundation of it in the nature of Language, principally attracted notice. For that which engaged the attention of controversialists was the extent of signification of terms, the differences of the several notions included in them, and their exact definition. This was the kind of Science chiefly required in order to Theological disputation. It was important to be able to defend certain expressions in the enunciation of doctrines, or to exclude others brought forward by the heretic,—to remove alleged consequences by distinctions,—and to state in explicit terms the notions embraced in any particular dogmatic expression. Hence we find that portion of the Organon of Aristotle, which was most applicable to this purpose, principally, or rather exclusively, studied until the XIIIth Century. Other Logical Treatises of Aristotle besides the Categories existed in Latin translations. But these, as John of Salisbury, writing in the XIIIth Century, indignantly complains, were quite disused in his time; and no Logic was tolerated in the Schools, but such as was conversant about the mere technicalities of the sterile Art then professed. To state the truth, indeed, Aristotle himself, though the name of Aristotle was in the mouths of all the reasoners of the Middle Age as that of the great Master of their Art, was absolutely unknown to them. Abstracts drawn from translations and comments of the IVth, Vth, and VIth Centuries had superseded the originals, even on the narrow ground to which his Logical Science had been reduced.

Maturity of Scholasticism seen in Aquinas.

To judge then of the true internal character of Scholasticism, we must view it at that point of its progress, where those principles which presided over its formation were at length fully developed; at the period, that is of Thomas Aquinas, who is eminently the Philosopher of the Schools, the creature of the system which had then obtained its full strength. We see in him, that acuteness which the polemical spirit had fostered in the Church; that narrowness which the limited range of studies had necessarily engendered; that servility to authority which the magisterial power of the Latin Church had engraven on the mind of the pious votary; that boldness of speculation at the same time, which Philosophical talents, pent up within the barriers of a technical Logic and Metaphysics, would naturally acquire, and by which they would, however imperfectly, assert their conscious dignity and vigour. After Aquinas there is evidently a decline in the character of Scholasticism. There were not wanting men of considerable power of mind to carry on the system. It is enough to mention the names of John Duns Scotus and William Ockham; names indeed well nigh forgotten in these days, particularly in this Country, from the darkness which the reformation of Philosophy and Religion has spread over their volumes, but by no means meriting that silence into which they have fallen. Hooker indeed has honoured Scotus with the appellation of "the wittiest of the School Divines."† But Ockham especially ought never to be forgotten among those who prepared the way for the improved Science of the XVIIth and XVIIIth Centuries; as having inculcated by his Logical theory the unjustly vilified doctrine of the Nominalists, and so far led men from that exclusive devotion to mere abstractions which Scholasticism had taught, to look also to experience for information and science. But in depicting the form of John Duns Scotus. William Ockham.

Scholasticism, we must pronounce both these eminent men far inferior to Aquinas, as representatives of its genuine features at its maturity. They present its features rather under distortion and caricature; the less graceful characteristics being magnified to an undue proportion, though but slightly varied from the original outlines. In them and in the later Schoolmen generally, down to the period of the Reformation, there is more of the parade of Logic, a more formal enumeration of arguments, a more burdensome importunity of syllogizing, with less of the philosophical power of arrangement and distribution of the subject discussed. The dryness again inseparable from the Scholastic method is carried to excess in the later writers; and perspicuity of style is altogether neglected. The patient Schoolman of the latter Age plods his way through the desert sands of his journey, with all the alacrity of a traveller through the most picturesque country; careless, as it would seem, who may follow him, so he may himself reach the given point. The same faults exist in Aquinas: but in him they are rendered less offensive by his greater art in the management of the method of disputation. It is not, perhaps, saying too much, to give him the praise of even exciting interest in his reader;—no small merit, when we think of the intrinsic repulsiveness of the method itself. To refer more particularly to his greatest Work, his Sum of Theology, the admirable order which reigns throughout it, the regular succession of the several Questions adduced for discussion, and the combination of the mass of particulars into one whole,—certainly impart an attractiveness to the Work, of which, on the first superficial examination of its contents, it would seem utterly incapable.

Thomas Aquinas.

These remarks should be extended, on the other side, to the immediate predecessors of Aquinas, Peter Lombard and Albert. If we assign to Lombard the merit of having laid the literary groundwork of Scholasticism by his Book of the Sentences; we must at the same time deny him any other merit in the comparison with Aquinas. Nothing can be more meagre than the Work itself in point of thought. This absence, indeed, of all purely intellectual merit is the great cause of that Ecclesiastical sanction which the Book of the Sentences obtained. The timidity of the speculation charmed to rest the jealous feeling of spiritual authority; and with some passing slight objections, it was allowed to descend into the Schools as a manual of Orthodox Theology. It thus gave a license for Theological speculation, whilst it marked out exactly the lists within which the Religious tournament should be held. It embodied in itself, that is, those narrow, exclusive principles on which the system of education in the Latin world had been all along proceeding; reducing them to these two general ones: first, that no authority sanctioned by the Church should be questioned; secondly, that nothing should be attempted to be established, independently of those authorities, or which could not be reconciled with them. The discernment of Lombard appears in his having seized the spirit of his Age, and with a prophetic sagacity laid a foundation on which the shrewder genius of his successors in Scholasticism might build securely.* But his Work is nothing more than a rough foundation as compared with the fabric of the Summa of Aquinas.

Character of Peter Lombard's Book of the Sentences.

Nor again can we consider the Works of Albert, though more closely resembling those of Aquinas, as presenting an equally comprehensive and masterly display of the character of Scholasticism. Albert had in view rather to imitate the method of Aristotle, following Contrast of Albert with Aquinas.

* Metaphysics, lib. iii. c. 5. p. 859.

† Eccle. Polity, book I. c. 11.

Biography.

throughout the Physical Treatises, supplying, as he himself says, parts either omitted or lost, and elucidating by digressions what was obscure or doubtful in the Greek Philosopher.* He affects more the character of the Philosopher than of the Theologian; though, in the Schoolman, as we shall have occasion to remark more particularly presently, the two functions were almost coincident, as in Aquinas, indeed, they are completely. Employment strictly Ecclesiastical was uncongenial to his taste. For a time he was drawn from his Philosophic seclusion to the more busy station of the Bishopric of Ratisbon: but a restless hankering after his loved studies, and an impatience of the detail of official duties, very soon induced him to renounce the incompatible charge. His devotion to Physical studies especially is evident, from the title of Magician, by which an ignorant and superstitious Age characterised his mysterious operations on Nature. Alchemy and Astrology found in him an ardent devotee; and such was the repute which he obtained for his mystic science, that, in fact, he is more known in modern times for these pursuits than for his Scholastic disputations.† Aquinas, on the other hand, followed the proper path of the Scholastic Theologian with an undivided attention. He regarded the attempt to explore the secrets of Nature with a superstitious dread; so far that, on seeing the speaking automaton which the art of Albert had constructed, in a paroxysm of pious horror he dashed it to pieces, dissolving the demon-spell to which he attributed the wonder.

The voice of fame, indeed, has not unreasonably discriminated between the master and the disciple, in awarding to the one the title of the Great, expressive of the prodigy of his Learning and Science; to the other, that of the Saint, and the Angelic, characteristic of the devout, theological Philosopher.

Literary spirit of Aquinas.

There is yet another important circumstance by which Aquinas is distinguished, not only from Albert, but from all other Schoolastics. There is more of the literary spirit about him. We can scarcely call it Criticism:—for the Critical Art could not have lived in such days, when examination of principles was forbidden ground to the Religionist and the Philosopher:—still there are attempts at Criticism to be seen in his writings. He ventures to question the correctness of the translation of passages of Aristotle, to compare different versions, and to qualify his own exposition by examination of conflicting authorities. But we see nothing of this in Albert, who is content to follow his text with an unscrupulous and servile docility.

A still greater test of the literary spirit of Aquinas is given, in the care expended by him on a new translation of Aristotle. At his desire, a Dominican, by name Henry or William of Brabant, made a new translation of the Treatises of Aristotle from the Greek original.‡ Hitherto the versions used were principally drawn, not immediately from the Greek, but indirectly from the Arabic, or Hebrew, or Syriac, or Persian; and sometimes from versions that had passed through several of these secondary channels. For it was but a small portion of the Organon that Boethius had translated, and in this century many Treatises of Aristotle, which, if not unknown before among the Christians of the West, had at any rate fallen into disuse, were brought into the Schools, either from the Arabians of Spain, or directly from Constantinople and the East. Many of these were brought in that form, in which the successive transfusion from Language to Language only imperfectly represented the sense of the Philosopher. It argues no little vigour of mind in Aquinas at such a time, to have provided for a more genuine acquaintance with the Philosophy, which was destined to hold a permanent dominion in the Church and to absorb into its vortex the whole of Christian Theology. By some, indeed, the whole of translation has been attributed to Aquinas himself. But besides the express testimonies on the other side, there is so ground to think that he was at all acquainted with the Greek Language. References to Greek words occur in his writings: but these are evidently drawn from second-hand authorities. Indeed, the business of translation may be regarded as properly a professional one. The Philosopher superintended the task; whilst the learned Jew, or Saracen, conversant with the Greek, the Latin, and the Arabic Languages, was engaged in the actual process of translation. The Christian Philosopher resorting to Toledo, had the Greek text interpreted to him in the vulgar idiom, the Moorish, or Spanish Language spoken there; and then himself rendered the interpretation so given into Latin.† The new translations, indeed, which Aquinas was instrumental in producing, were probably little more than collations of those already extant, with a view to ascertain their variations; and not original versions founded on a simple study of the original Greek.

In setting forth then a general view of the Philosophy of Aquinas, we may fairly assume, that we are taking a survey of Scholasticism in its most general form, the proper characteristic of its nature, independently of individual peculiarities which may have accidentally modified it in part.‡

* Albert. Mag. Physic. lib. i. tract. 1. tom. xi. p. 1.

† The following passage from Albert sufficiently testifies to his enthusiasm in Alchemy. Having spoken of his laborious travels, and the inquiries he had pursued for ascertaining the truth of the Science, but for a long time without any satisfactory result; he adds: Ego vero non desperavi, quin facerem labores et expensas infinitas, vigilans, et de loco ad locum migrans omni tempore, ac meditando, acut dicti Alchemici; si hac res est, quomodo est? et si non est, quomodo non est? Tandem percesseram studendo, meditando, laborando in operibus ejusdem, quousque quod quorundam inveni, non es mihi sciatum, sed ex Spiritu Sancti gratia. Unde quoniam operemur et intelligerem, quod autem in superius, diligentius vigilare cepi in directionibus et sublimitatibus, sublimitatibus et distillationibus, aerationibus, et calcinationibus, atque coagulationibus alchymiarum, et in multis aliis laboribus, donec inveni, esse possibilem transmutationem in solum et lunam. Albert. Mag. libell. de Alchem. prefat.

‡ So extensive was the fame of Albert, that William of Holland, passing by the way of Cologne, paid a visit to the great Professor of the day. On this occasion, Albert entertained his Royal visitor by producing in the depth of Winter from the garden of the cloister the flowers and fruits of Spring. The artificial skill of the hot-house was interpreted as an evidence of the magic art of the Philosopher.

Thomas Aquinas.

Improved version of Aristotle.

Improved method of translation.

* Willelmus de Brabantii Ordinis Predicatorum translatit omnes libros Aristotelis, de Græco in Latinum, verbum e verbo, qui translatione scholarum adhuc hodieque die altius in scholis ad usum S. Thomæ de Aquino Doctoris. Aut. Anonym. Chron. Siles. apud Lindenbrog. p. 206.

Eodem autem tempore, anno minime Christi 1271, Henricus Brabantinus, Dominicus, rogatus D. Thomæ, e Græco in linguam Latinam, de verbo ad verbum, transferri omnes libros Aristotelis. Albertus vero est veteri translatione quæ Dominicanis vacavit. Aemul. Annal. Boar. lib. vii. c. 7.

Jourdain, Rech. Crit. sur l'Age et l'Origine des Trad. de Aristote, p. 266.

† This appears to have been the mode in which Michael Scot, like Albert, also, more known for Magic than for Philosophy, performed his translations of Aristotle. He was at Toledo, engaged in this Work, in 1217. Christian students used to learn at Toledo the necessity of the Arabians. See Jourdain, Rech. Critiques, &c. p. 139. 235.

‡ Aquinas is particularly selected by Dante to represent the Philosophers of the Schools.

Biography.

In examining into any Philosophy, there are two leading points to which we naturally advert. 1. the substance itself of the Philosophy; or the principles in the different departments of human knowledge, of which it actually consists: 2. the method on which it proceeds; what data it assumes, and in what order it applies these for the construction of its system.

Scholasticism founds the method and the principles of Philosophy.

Now in the Philosophy of the Schoolmen these two points of view meet in one. We have shown how the method of Aristotle was gradually superinduced on the established Platonism of the Church. The introduction of so powerful an ally was the means of revolutionizing the system to whose aid it was brought. The Philosophy so constantly engaged in the field with the heretical disputant, obtained a practical ascendancy founded on its actual services in the emergencies of the Faith. Not that we are to suppose that Platonism was extinct in the Church, even when the Aristotelic Philosophy triumphed. This would be to mistake the true character of Scholasticism, which, as we have pointed out, never abandoned its first attachment to the Platonic mysticism. But Platonism was the strong under-current. The Aristotelic Philosophy was the tide that flowed on the surface, propelled by every wind and storm that vexed the Church.

The Aristotelic Philosophy, accordingly, being cultivated only as a Science of defence, and consequently established as a Logical Philosophy, what was in its proper nature simply a method of discussion, became in the result an organ of investigation, and a Science also of the first principles of every other Science. This was in direct opposition to the views of Aristotle himself: for the great service rendered by him to the cause of Scientific Truth, was, that he separated Logic from the Metaphysics with which it had been confounded in all former systems. But the Church Philosophers, cleaving to the original misconceptions of the Platonic Schools, brought back that confusion, and perpetuated it in their own artificial mode of philosophizing.

Source of this confusion in the nature of general terms.

The Science of Logic, leading us to consider the manner in which general principles are applied to the deduction and communication of knowledge, is apt on that account to give the delusive idea of its power to interpret the secrets of Nature. The universality of the terms of Language is mistaken for the generalization of facts. Because, as we may explain this more fully, we discover by reasoning from words as the signs of our ideas, a vast variety of particulars involved in general notions, (every argument being in fact a deduction of some particular out of a more general principle,) we seem to have occasion only to study the abstractions denoted by words, to obtain a universal Science. Plato's Philosophy carried this notion to the utmost point, stating it in the form of his well-known theory—that knowledge is nothing but reminiscence. And the same theory has been expressed by Moderns under a still more paradoxical form—that Science is nothing but a Language well arranged. The most abstract ideas become, according to such a view, the most adequate and true conceptions of things as comprehending under the most scientific form the infinite variety of subordinate particulars. Such a Philosophy resolves itself into a system of Idealism. By realizing the mere abstractions of the Mind, and at once converting Metaphysical Truth into Physical, and Physical into Metaphysical, it results in a refined Materialism, or Idealism, a system in which Metaphysical Truth is all in all.

Such then, in the general view of its nature, was the Philosophy of the Schools. It was pure Idealism, so far as Platonism predominated in it: it was Realism, so far as the Logical or peculiarly Aristotelic character pervaded the whole system. Idealism describes the system itself as to the nature of the principles on which it was founded; Realism describes the method of investigation pursued, the action of those Logical processes by which it explored the Truth. We may characterize Scholasticism truly, by one or the other of these two designations, according as we look to its internal nature, or to its Logical method of proceeding.

The Scholastic Philosophy is the only system in which Idealism and Realism have completely coincided. Plato gave the name indeed of Dialectic to the Supreme Science: for the train of thought, by which he arrived at his theory of Ideas, naturally suggested that name as the designation of the Science of Ideas. But still the Ideal or Metaphysical character predominates over his whole Philosophy. He argues strenuously, but as if argument, as such, was not his concern; as if he wanted only to clear away by discussion the obstructions of the human intellect, and to present the realities of the invisible world—the “Ideas” of his system—clearly before the eye of abstract contemplation. In Aristotle there is a great deal of Realism, especially in his Physical Philosophy, which is, for the most part, an assumed Science of Nature, deduced from the abstractions of Language. At the same time his general views are entirely adverse to Idealism, and no Philosopher of antiquity has displayed so fully throughout his writings the scientific value of experience and observation. But in the Schoolmen, Idealism and Realism go hand in hand. In them, there is no proper, direct appeal to experience and observation. The visible world is to them only a shadow and type of the Metaphysical; a writing, as it were, in cipher, to be read by the key of those concordant truths which exist in the secret chambers of the intellect. But their very business is argumentation. And thus conclusions, indicating nothing more than connections of thought in the mind, are continually realized in their mode of speculation; applied, that is, as if they were indications of real connections in Nature. This Idealism and this Realism correspond with the mystical and the argumentative character, which, as has been already observed, were combined in the system.

We find, indeed, the different Schoolmen, especially after the XIIIth Century, distinguished from each other as Nominalists or Realists. The Logical question which had attracted particular notice in the XIth Century, respecting the nature of Universals, as the phrase then was, or as to the existence of objects corresponding to the general Ideas denoted by abstract terms, having been silenced for a while by the authority of Anselm of Canterbury, was again agitated with renewed vigour in the XIVth Century, and from that time ostensibly divided the Schools into the two great parties of Nominalists and Realists. These two classes included under them a great variety of shades of opinion; of which we may state the two extremes to be; on the one hand, the opinion that regarded abstract terms as mere sounds; on the other hand, that which supposed a Physical Being corresponding to every abstract term. Still Nominalism, as it existed in the Scholastic Ages, was rather a modification of Realism, or the exception from the general system. It certainly preluded to a more liberal method of philosophizing: and this tendency appears to have Thomas Aquinas, Coincidence of Idealism and Realism the result.

Biography been foreseen, though indistinctly, in the jealous opposition which it excited. But the Scholastic Nominalists were practically Realists, so far as they pursued the same mode of establishing truths by syllogistic processes, as those who were Realists in theory. Albert and Aquinas, to whom we have attributed the formation of the Scholastic system, were avowed Realists.

Conceptualism—The truth appears to be, that an intermediate opinion, —that denoted in modern Philosophy by Conceptualism, the Ideal theory of Locke,—was the notion most generally adopted in the subject. This was the neutral ground on which the controversialists on each side seem to have retired when pressed by argument on the other. The ambiguity of the word res, from its extensive application to the objects of thought as well as to those of sense, gave a facility to the arguer for sliding from the notion of Physical existence to Metaphysical, and again from Metaphysical to Physical. An abstraction so vague, indeed, it is hardly possible to hold distinctly in the mind: so that the theorist on a question in which this term is so essentially involved, is apt to be led astray even in the processes of his own mind in forming his view of the subject. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Scholastic disputant should have found such matter of altercation on this speculative question.

Importance of the theory of Universals Nor was the question by any means so trifling as we are apt to suppose it at this day. The whole system of Scholasticism depending on abstract general notions, whatever touched the character of these first principles of the Science, affected the whole nature of the Science deduced from them. It raised a question whether the speculative Theology so deduced, were sound or not; and each party therefore had to justify his view on this ground. About the same period too, or rather just before the agitation of the question concerning Universals, the discussions relative to the presence of Christ, which had arisen in the IXth Century, began to be revived. And these, turning principally on the notions attached to the words really and truly, were intimately connected with the theory of general notions. The presence of Christ, indeed, in the Sacrament, as asserted in the speculations of the Schools, was that of the abstract nature of Christ: the divinity and manhood conjoined in His person being regarded as that real Being, which, truly existing in itself, was capable of communicating itself to the forms of bread and wine, and of being thus infinitely multiplied and infinitely present without multiplication of its own essence. So that any question as to the nature of abstract existences was a question also bearing on the doctrine of the Eucharist.

Theology becomes the theory of Universal Science. The mixed character of Scholasticism develops itself to our view more fully, when we look closely into its internal nature. A universal à priori system of speculative Truth would be the natural produce of such a combination; or in other words, a Theological Philosophy, comprehending in it all knowledge. Consistently to follow out such a method of philosophizing, there could be no pause to the speculatist, until he had reached the fountain of all Truth, and seized the primary principles existing in the mind of the Deity himself. The Schoolmen, indeed, as disciples of Christianity, felt themselves bound by the double tie of Religion and Church-authority, to uphold that divine knowledge, which the Scriptures and the dogmas of the Church had delivered, as the ultimate highest knowledge of Man. They thought it necessary therefore to show, that in this were contained the elements of all Truth whatever; not only in matters of Religion,—in what concerns the relations of Man to his Creator,—but generally, in every department of human speculation. This mistaken notion of revealed Truth was engendered and fostered by that Ideal and Logical theory of the nature of Science, which they had adopted. Had they simply regarded Science as the generalization of facts, they could not have incurred this error in regard to revealed Truth. They must then have seen the propriety of suffering each Science to rest on its proper principles obtained from the study of its own facts, without endeavouring to bring all together within the limits of a universal method. But an essentially Logical Philosophy is not satisfied with this simple Historical method. It must lay down its theorems as universals, and from them deduce synthetically all other truths as necessary consequences of these first principles. In that case only would the requisitions of a Logical method of Philosophy be fully satisfied. Hence we find Aquinas condemning as false, whatever may be found in any other Science contrary to the principles of Theology. And we know from the History of Philosophy, how extensively such a maxim has operated to the prejudice of scientific Truth: the authorities of the Latin Church having constantly opposed all improvements in Natural Science, from the fear of contradicting some doctrine of Theology.*

Union of the Theory of Ideas with that of Matter and Form. The later Platonists had prepared the way for this universal Theological Science in assigning to the "Ideas" of their master's theory a locality in the Divine mind. But a difficulty arose to the Schoolmen, as the disciples of Aristotle, in reconciling this tenet of the new Platonism with Aristotle's disavowal of the Ideal theory. The Eclectic method of Philosophy, established by the labours of Boethius in the Latin Church, provided a solution of the difficulty, in the introduction of Aristotle's physical theory of Matter and Form. Under these two terms Aristotle had classed all the principles which respect the Physical constitution of bodies: Matter denoting all that constitutes them Physical Beings simply; all those properties by which they affect the senses, or display to our observation changes in their composition: Form denoting whatever distinguishes them as belonging to different classes of being. Both these terms were of Logical origin; being, in truth, heads of classification under which the Mind ranges its first rough observations on Nature. The notions of Matter and Form were therefore readily incorporated into a Logical Philosophy. By an extension of the terms, which Aristotle's authority by no means warranted, they were applied by his expositors universally. As it was apparent of every subject of consideration, that it had certain points of agreement with others, and also certain peculiarities, or points of difference; it was concluded, that these Logical arrangements might be applied to every subject indiscriminately. And thus the Schools resounded throughout * Witness the persecutions of Roger Bacon and of Galileo. The instance, which has been often cited, of the declaration of the Jesuits in their edition of Newton's Principia, that they assume the motion of the Earth in order to the demonstrations, but comply at the same time with the Papal decree against its motion, is in itself enough to illustrate the point. Their words are: Newtonius in hoc tertio libro telluris motu hypotheseos assumit. Autoris propositiones aliter explicari non poterant, nisi eadem quoque facti hypothesei. Hinc alienum coacti sumus genere peramoni. Ceterum talia a summi Pontificibus contra telluris motum secretis nos obsequi profitemur. tom. iii. ed. 1742.

Thomas Aquinas.

Biography. with the technical language of matter and form. Had these notions been restricted to their true meaning as subtle abstractions of the Mind; as practical analyses performed by the Mind for its own direction in the general survey of Nature; it might have been well: though little benefit to the purpose of sound Philosophy could have resulted from their adoption. But the mischief was, that they were taken into the Scholastic system, as expressions denoting Physical constituents in the different subjects to which they were applied. Every thing was considered as made up of Matter and Form; as consisting of something out of which it was made, and of something by which it was made what it actually was. Then it came further to be supposed, that these two constituents of things might exist separately from each other: and the ingenuity of a subtle Philosophy was exercised in giving a history of their conjunction; or in explaining how things came to exist as they actually are, by the descent of Forms into Matter. So that, these principles of a perverted Aristotelic Philosophy being adopted, the proper order of philosophical inquiry was reversed. In the Scholastic system, the object was, not to rise from individuals to general principles, but to descend from the highest abstractions to individual beings. The only certain real existences given in the system, were the natures of Matter and Form. The problem then was, to find the principle of individuation: to show how these infinite natures were circumscribed and limited in the various individual objects which the sensible universe presents.

Accommodation of Aristotle's notion of the Deity.

But Aristotle's Physical Philosophy being understood in this manner, the difficulty arising from his rejection of the Ideal theory was easily evaded. It was only to call these Ideas by the name of Forms; and the objectionable part of the theory was then removed. For Aristotle had only argued against the separate sole existence of Ideas, as a philosophical account of all actual individual Beings. He had said nothing to exclude the supposition of the pre-existence of the Forms of things in the Divine intellect, or rather according to his view of the Deity, in the universal energizing, or motive principle of Nature. Indeed, he might be considered as having invested these abstract Forms with some such pre-existence, in assigning them, as the ultimate ends, to which Nature must be conceived to tend, in all its manifold operations and productions, with instinctive, unceasing effort.

Inconsistency of this notion with Christianity.

This notion of the Divine principle, evidently, could not be embraced by a believer in Christianity. Christianity is expressly opposed to it, inasmuch as Christianity reveals the Deity to us in the strictest sense as a personal agent, acting on and controlling by His will the course of Nature, not identified and confounded with that course. It was necessary, therefore, in the reception of Aristotle's Philosophy, to modify this view of the Divine principle. And this was effected by the alliance formed with the more pious theism of Plato. The incongruity of the alliance was indeed continually appearing to view. Some following too closely the language of Aristotle would relapse into notions of Pantheism, attributing to Nature itself an instinctive divine vitality; others, again, would reduce the whole of Nature to mere phantom and shadow, asserting in pure Idealism the sole real existence of the Divine Being.

Thus, however, were the Platonic Ideas re-instated in their empire over the realms of Philosophy. A basis, accordingly, was laid for a Theological interpretation of Nature, (if interpretation may be said of a system which was only a string of mental anticipations,) and at the same time for rationalizing the truths of Revelation.

The manner in which the profane Sciences were brought into the service of Christian Theology, and blended with it in one system, is a point particularly to be noticed. The confusion itself was drawn from Platonism: so also Platonism furnished the mysterious links between the worlds of Reason and of Revelation. As the Ideas of the purely intellectual region were assumed to be the primary elements of all Truth,—the principles from which the constitution and order of the sensible universe were derived,—they were evidently to be explored in those types and representations of them which the universe presents to our observation. Plato had remarked the great law of Association in the constitution of the human mind, and applied it to the establishment of his Ideal theory. From the observed fact, that one object serves to suggest to the Mind a variety of other objects, he concluded that the whole of Nature was to be regarded as an instrument of suggestion; as the means of reviving in the Mind the invisible, reconciled truths of the intellectual world, which had a more real existence, according to his theory, than the flowing things of the external world cognizable by the senses.* He thus bound together Physical and Metaphysical Truth; and led the philosophical student through the course of the various Sciences, as through a necessary initiation, to the sublime point, where the purified intellect should ultimately expand itself to the contemplation of the mysterious Ideas. We may remark, that his attempt was, in fact, to merge the certainty of all other Truth in the evidence of consciousness; and to counteract the method of the vulgar, which holds no other Truth so real as that which is apparent to outward observation. The Scholastic Theologians proceeded on the same view. They wished to exalt the spirituality of the Christian profession above the grossness of worldly pursuits; and therefore sank all profane Science in Theology. In Theology was the reality and the truth of Science: all other Science was instrumental and subsidiary. The world of sense and observation, according to their view, lay between the Divine Mind and the human. The Mind by the study of the Forms impressed in that world, under the guidance of the natural Sciences, penetrates the interposing mass; and thus at length, rising by the steps of sublime contemplation, is brought more immediately into the Divine presence, and enabled more and more to see God as He is.

In accomplishing this connection, Theology was the first and the last of the links. Theology both natural and revealed was the point of departure, as well as the consummation of all Science. The principles of Theology were assumed as those by which each Science was to be interpreted and ascertained. The dominion of Ideas was carried throughout. Each Science had its Metaphysical basis; not being founded on any conclusions of experience, but on mental abstractions, or definitions of its terms. This is particularly evidenced in Physics; where the Scholastics had the example itself of Aristotle to mislead them, and to increase their fundamental misconception of the nature of this Science in particular. Here the Theological character of the principles assumed is apparent at the first view. The doctrine of final causes is the master principle of the whole inquiry. Instead of looking at phenomena, and

Thomas Aquinas.
Profane Sciences studied as instruments of Theology.

Consequent Theological character of all Science.

* See the Phædo.

Biography. examining things in themselves, the Schoolman, following Aristotle, is employed in considering the tendencies or designs of Nature, and constructing a hypothetical system on assumptions of what is best and most perfect in Nature. The whole drift of his inquiry is the Idea, or abstract Form, which Nature is supposed to be endeavouring to realize. Thus, therefore, in the pursuit of his lofty Science, his own mind, as the mirror of the Divine, —the philosophical synopsis of all that exists without it in the universe,—becomes the only field of study; whilst he neglects that actual Form which things present to external observation, as accidental, and unreal, and unscientific.

To examine, however, more particularly into the influence of this mode of philosophizing on the different branches of Science; we will proceed first to the character of the Theology resulting from it.

Speculative Theology multiplied by refuta-tions of Heresy.

As in the ancient Philosophy there was an exoteric and esoteric method; an internal instruction addressed to the speculative disciple, and a popular one addressed to the general hearer; so in the Philosophical Theology erected by the Schoolmen, we find a twofold teaching adapted to corresponding classes in the Christian Church. Though the habit of reasoning on the truths of Religion had been formed by the struggles against Heresy and Infidelity, the practice itself once acquired could not easily be renounced; and a morbid taste for abstract speculation outlived the occasions by which it was engendered. The continued conflicts, indeed, with disputatious Theologians, involved the Orthodox in such a mass of technical doctrines,—of decisions accumulated upon decisions,—that the business of ratiocination became indispensable to the Churchman of the Middle Age. What may be called an excess of legislation in matters of doctrine had taken place, through the mistaken notion on which Divines had acted, that every variation of opinion required to be ruled by the coercive judgment of the Ecclesiastical power. This state of things naturally led to the creation of a class of expositors and commentators, who should maintain the consistency of this vast accumulation of decisions,—bring to light what was obscure,—defend what was ambiguous from the perverse constructions of the Heretic. For this state of things, instead of resting at any given point, constantly worked its own aggravation. Repeated declarations on controverted statements of the Religious Truth, only opened a larger frontier to hostile invasion. With the conquests of Orthodoxy increased also its points of attack from Heresy: and thus a more complex system of speculative defence was necessarily organized; and all the outposts of doctrine were fortified and guarded with the subtle arms of orthodox Metaphysics. It is the collection, then, and systematic arrangement of these several points of debate,—these multiplied decisions of the Church authorities,—that properly constitutes the Scholastic Theology. The Logical Philosophy of the Schools was the cementing principle,—that which gave unity and symmetry to the chaotic assemblage. But by this elaborate process, this ceaseless deposition of matter of speculation by the active current of controversy, a pile of Religious doctrine rose to view by the side of the Scriptural Truth—a new land, like the Delta of the Nile, the creation itself of the busy stream, which had been constantly flowing, and accumulating soil in its course. And, like that artificial land, it was the ground on which Priestcraft and Superstition fixed their peculiar abode; where a speculative Fancy erected the shrines and altars of its Idols; and whence, as from their proper home, the mystical symbols of Theological doctrine proceeded to diffuse themselves over the Western world.

Thom.
Aquinas.

To judge adequately of the nature of this Theology, we have only to take a survey of the celebrated Summa of Aquinas. We have there a complete Science of Theology, sketched in all its parts by a master-hand; the genius, as it were, of Scholasticism embodied by the mighty Magician, whose call it was forced to obey. He did not live, indeed, to work out all the parts of his system; but he had cast the whole at once with a vastness and a minuteness of design, which more reminds one of the great Philosopher himself, whose principles he undertook to expound, than of any other writer. There is, at least, the same endeavour shown, to grasp the subject in all its bearings, and to leave no region of it undistributed or unoccupied, that we find in the most elaborate Treatises of Aristotle.

Sketch of the Summa
of Aquinas.

The Work is divided into three great Parts: 1. the Natural; 2. the Moral; 3. the Sacramental. The first, being a speculation concerning the nature of things, lays down and discusses the principles of the Divine Being, from which hangs the golden chain of Physical and Moral Truth in perpetual series. "We have considered," he says, in his Prologue, "that novices in this doctrine are greatly impeded, in consequence of what has been written by different persons; partly, indeed, on account of the multiplication of useless questions, articles, and arguments, partly, also, because the things necessary for such to know, are not delivered according to the order of discipline, but according to what the exposition of books required, or as the occasion for disputing presented itself; partly, indeed, because their frequent repetition generated both disgust and confusion in the minds of the hearers. Studying, therefore, to avoid these faults and others of the like kind, we will endeavour, in confidence of Divine aid, briefly and luminously to pursue, to the extent that the matter will permit, what belongs to sacred doctrine." He proceeds, accordingly, to point out the scientific nature of Christian Theology, that it is strictly a Science capable of being argumentatively established, and resting on certain assumptions, themselves founded in the Divine knowledge, and communicated to Man by Revelation. The questions discussed in this part respect the existence and attributes of God, the nature of His intelligence and will, His providence and predestination, the Trinity in Unity. From these he proceeds to the Divine effects manifested in the works of Creation, in the existence of Angels, in the material world, and in the human Being; dilating more especially on the subject of Man's nature, and interweaving a mass of Metaphysical discussion concerning the soul and its faculties, its connection with the body, and the primitive condition of Man in Paradise.

Thom.
Aquinas.
division of the Summa

Prima Pars.

The Second Part is divided into two; which are commonly distinguished under the titles of the Prima Secundæ and the Secunda Secundæ. The first of these enters more immediately and strictly on the examination of the nature of Man. The nature of Man has been considered, indeed, in the first part, but under a different point of view; as it is involved in the history of the Divine operations. Here Man is viewed as he is a complex system in himself, having in himself a principle of operation. The former Part considered Man as he is a Physical Being, the creation of the Divine hand; the Prima Secundæ regards him under the aspect of a

Prima Sec.
Secunda.

Biography. Moral and Intellectual agent. Aquinas here takes a survey of the principles of human nature as they are exemplified in human sentiments and actions. Having in the outset examined how Man is naturally impelled to action, in the sequel he views the natural principles as they are modified by the operation of Divine grace. In discussing these subjects, the comparison of the state of Man under the systems of Nature and of Grace, and the doctrines consequently of Free Will, Original Sin, and Justification, come to be considered. The various laws also given for the guidance of Man are minutely examined in this department of the inquiry.*

Secunda Secunda. The Secunda Secunda takes up the great Moral argument, where the former part had left it, and discusses the several Virtues in detail. The former part had examined the principles of human action under their most general form: this Part considers them as they take the forms of particular Virtues, whether under the influence of Divine Grace, or by the operation of Nature. The Virtues are classed according to the threefold arrangement, which he found already received in the Church; as they are Theological or Ethical, Infused or Acquired, or as they are the sevenfold Gifts of the Holy Spirit: the Theological Virtues being Faith, Hope, and Charity; the Ethical, the four cardinal Virtues, Justice, Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance. This portion of the Work has attracted peculiar notice and commendation as a systematic exposition of Christian Ethics. And, certainly for the copiousness, of its matter, the connection of the points of discussion, and the ingenuity with which the Ethical theories of Aristotle are grafted into the Christian Moral system, it fully merits that high admiration which successive Ages have bestowed on it. As for originality of observation, this, of course, we could not expect to find in the most gifted Schoolman. But a close examination will disclose to the inquirer, that Aquinas has occasionally struck out thoughts, which imply a power of observation superior to the system within which he had restricted himself.

tertia Pars. The Third Part is devoted to the doctrines of the Incarnation and the Sacraments. According to the Scholastic Philosophy, these two subjects were intimately connected. The theories belonging to them were brought into perfect harmony. For since the Sacraments were regarded as vital influences of Grace descending immediately from the sacred person of Christ, it was necessary for the nity of the system, that an adequate notion should be settled of the great truth of the Incarnation. The traces of this connection are sufficiently evident, in the peculiar importance attached by the practice of the Church of Rome, to the particular Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This importance is derived from the idea, that this Sacrament is the mystical conveyance of the Passion of Christ, that the act of consecration brings down to the consecrated elements the whole virtue of the priesthood of Christ. The same idea is extended to all the seven Sacraments of the Church of Rome, according to the Scholastic view; the only difference being, that these are inferior instruments of Grace; they are participations of Christ; whereas the Eucharist is the substance itself of Christ. It was necessary, therefore, that the doctrine of the union of the divinity and humanity in the person of Christ should be premised and fully established, in order that the Sacramental virtue should be represented as flowing in continuous stream from Christ to His mystical body, the Church.

This whole Part, indeed, develops with the utmost precision the complex Philosophy of Expiation, under the representations of it contained in the doctrines and ritual of the Church of Rome. The latter portion of it is occupied with a comparison of the two leading modes of life suggested by Heathen Philosophy and from that adopted into Christianity, the life of Contemplation, and the life of Action; and in showing, according to the principles of Aristotle, the superiority of the former, or according to its Christian representation, the life of Monastic devotion.

This is a general outline of what is discussed in this extraordinary Work. What however is most important to observe in it, is the connection of the several Parts and questions throughout it. To observe this, is to seize its proper Scholastic character. The Deity himself, it will be perceived, agreeably to what we have already stated as to the general nature of Scholasticism, is "the point of departure: and Theology consequently furnishes the principles, on which the whole fabric of the various Science included in the Work is rested. All the other Sciences are strictly treated as handmaids and auxiliaries to Theology. They are employed instrumentally, as the means of disengaging, if we may so express it, the principles of the Divine Science, from the external forms in which they are involved,—whether these forms be the mysteries of Revelation or of Nature,—and presenting them as pure matter of intellectual perception to the philosophic mind. All other Sciences, that is, served only as a method of analysis,—as a symbolical Language, analogous to that of Algebra, by which the connections of Sacred Truth might be ascertained and systematically deduced. Accordingly a great part of the discussion is occupied in perfecting this symbolical Language, as we have called it; in showing, by examination of doubts and difficulties on various points, the coherency of the analytical system in itself. This, of course, was required in such a mode of philosophizing; just as a method of Algebra must cohere in all its parts, that the interpretations of its symbols may throughout be consistent.

There is still, however, amidst all the speculative matter with which this Work of Aquinas abounds, a very valuable Theological knowledge to be extracted from it. It brings into one view the subtle distinctions and arguments, which Theologians at various times have employed to maintain their peculiar doctrines. It enables us to ascertain the precise controversial sense of terms in Theology. We see here the reasons for their introduction, and their mutual connections. It was, in fact, in the course of the Scholastic discussions, and by their instrumentality, that the exact force of these terms was positively fixed. Previously, their sense had remained in a fluctuating state: the early polemical writers having varied in their use of them. There had been, at the same time, a constant endeavour to reduce the use of them to greater exactness. Now at length in the proper age of Scholastic Theology, the scheme of uniformity was wrought to its perfection. A large induction of instances was brought from the volumes of ancient Polemics; and an acute Reason was exercised upon them, in rejecting differences of meaning, and selecting the points of general agreement. In this office, the Scholastic

Thomas Aquinas.

Close connection of Questions throughout the Summa.

Real Theological importance of Scholastic Discussions.

* The same kind of abstract speculation into the nature of Law is pursued, which we find adopted by Hooker in the first Book of his Ecclesiastical Policy.

Biography. Divines have shown a real philosophical power : and to estimate their merits properly, we must contemplate them under this point of view. A study of Aquinas will convince us, that he was not a mere compiler of authorities, or a mere Logician, but that he possessed a true perception of the nature of Philosophy, whilst he was cramped by the fetters of an artificial method, and was compelled to exercise that power within the narrow range of a technical Theology.

Futile character of the Scholastic Physics. From what has been already observed on the subject, it is to be expected that the Physical Philosophy of the Schools should present nothing but a barren waste to the view. There is nothing indeed in it of that animation and business which the Mind expects to contemplate in opening a volume of the History of Nature. But all is silent as the page itself, which arrogantly and vainly attempts to tell of laws unexplored by the Philosopher. Ideas of power, and motion, and energy are presented before us : but it is only in the little laboratory of the Mind itself that all this activity of Nature is exhibited. We seem to be standing by as spectators of the construction of the fabric of the universe ; the laws by which all the changes of the natural world take place, appear to be subjected to our survey ; but we find the whole system only a vast illusion, produced by the dizzy height to which we have been carried. The speculation taking its outset from the great original Causes of things in the Mind of the Creator, mocks us by the unreal universality of the principles, which it presents to us as solutions of the course and constitution of Nature. As theories of the creative and disposing power of the Divine Author of Nature, these principles may possess a speculative truth : they may, that is, be just, comprehensive views of the objects of the natural world, as they admit of being mentally analyzed into different views of the Divine agency. But, as Bacon observes, of the whole Scholastic method of anticipation, "the subtlety of Nature far exceeds the subtlety of Sense and Intellect :"^{*} and these general principles accordingly, specious as they are in promise, are much too superficial in reality, to give any sound information concerning the actual processes of Nature.

Doctrine of four universal Causes.

Thus the Schoolmen, following Aristotle, state four universal Causes of existing things : 1. the Material ; 2. the Formal ; 3. the Efficient ; 4. the Final : the Material Cause being supposed to be that common substance or nature, out of which things are made ; the Formal Cause, that by which one object is made to differ from others produced out of the same common matter ; the Efficient or Motive Cause, that which originates the motion or change from which the particular thing results ; the Final Cause, the tendency, or end, to which the whole process of formation has reference, and in which it is completed and perfected. These several Causes (as we have said before respecting the notions of Matter and Form in particular) are evidently nothing more than certain classifications, the mere creations of the Mind, under which it arranges its different views of any object considered as a thing produced. They are so many different reasons which the Mind may assign for the existence of a thing ; and the aggregate of which seems to give a full account of its being. For the Material Cause is the first most general view that we take of it ; that general resemblance according to which we class it with certain other objects. The Formal Cause is a more dis-ting view of it, exempting it from that vagueness in which our first rough classification had left it. The Efficient Cause is a still further limitation of it, as the effect of a given power. The Final Cause again brings it still more within the grasp of the Mind by assigning the boundaries to which it is tending, and beyond which it cannot pass. Now all these Causes or reasons may be very useful to us logically,^{*}—as principles to guide our investigation into the nature of any object,—but without experience and observation they are utterly fruitless. They are the rules by which our observations are to be conducted, and they of course imply that these observations should be made. The Schoolmen, however, used their Logical rules instead of observation, and set themselves to explain how each object in Nature was constructed according to these rules.

Thomas Aquinas.

The doctrine of Contraries, again, which the Schoolmen adopted from the ancient Physics, as an explanation of the changes which took place in the natural world, what was this but the realizing of a principle of Logic, and vainly endeavouring to make the operations of Nature submit to a law of the human understanding ? It is evident that there are certain notions which mutually exclude one another ; that the same thing, for instance, cannot be hot and cold at the same moment ; and that to remove the one idea therefore is to admit the idea of the other. But the Schoolmen applied this Logical truth to Physical existences. They gave an activity, that is, to these abstract notions, and regarded any two Contraries, as principles coming and departing in perpetual real succession, and which, by their presence or their absence, constituted Physical bodies what they are.

Doctrine of Contraries.

With this doctrine of Contraries the ancient Physics connected the principles of Transmutation of bodies, of Privation, and the distinction between Potential and Actual being. These several principles, as flowing out of the same Logical doctrine of Contraries, were readily taken into their Physical system by the Logical Philosophers of the Schools. The facility with which the Mind substitutes one notion for another, and varies at will the forms which it creates, was converted into a real capacity of transition in Nature itself from one form of Being into another. Hence every thing in Nature was conceived capable of being changed into another ; the same common matter remaining as the subject of the alteration. And thus in the language of the Schools was every thing said to be generated or corrupted,—the transition from one nature into another being the generation of that which resulted, the corruption of that which disappeared. Thus, too, the motion of bodies was said to be of three kinds : since besides locomotion, the changes which occurred, either by the alteration of the thing, or by its growth and diminution, were included under the term : Logical distinctions being here again converted into Physical forces. The principle of Privation, clearly part of the same Logical analysis by which the notions foreign to any subject are excluded from it, underwent the like Physical adaptation ; the qualities mentally excluded by any particular notion, being conceived to be Principle of Transmutation and Privation.

Generation and Corruption.

Doctrine of Motion.

^{*} Take, for example, the familiar instance of Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood from an application of the doctrine of Final Causes. By appealing to the principle according to which the Mind views an object in its ultimate tendency or end, he was led to consider whether the structure of the valves in the blood-vessels might be thus limited and summed up, as it were, in a final result : and by observation on them according to this principle, discovered the fact of the circulation.

^{*} Nov. Organum, lib. i. Aph. 10.

Biography. physically removed from it, when the thing passed from one nature into another. In like manner, attributing to every thing a potential and an actual being, realized distinctions which exist only in the Mind: the former being the object, as it may be supposed to exist in that capable of producing it; as the plant, for instance, in the seed; the latter being the production into being, of that which before only existed in such a capacity or power. Upon this distinction, indeed, it should be observed, the Schoolmen, closely following Aristotle, founded their philosophical description of the Deity as "pure act." All created things existed at one time in power, at another time in act. But in God, in whom nothing is antecedent, nothing consequent, all is Action and Energy at once.

Potential and Actual Being.

This notion of the Deity as "Energy," or "Act," was the connecting principle of the Theology and Physics of the Schools. That the Deity pervaded all things as the ultimate Sovereign Good, which all things, whether animate or inanimate, desired to attain, and in attaining which the perfection of each consisted,—was the Theological point of view in their system. But it was further required to exhibit the Deity, as the universal Principle of Motion, as the origin of those changes which were observed in the world. And this was accomplished by the representation of him under the notion of "pure operation," or "act." The Divine goodness became thus, by the realism of the system, a real vital power impelling the whole course of Nature. Regarded as an unoriginated, ceaseless energy, it presented an adequate cause of the perpetuity of life, and motion, and production throughout the universe.

Notion of the Deity as Pure Act.

In noticing the general character of the Scholastic Theology and Physics, we have brought forward the heaviest charges which lie against the system. In the Sciences which immediately belong to the Philosophy of Human Nature, whether in those purely conversant about the intellect or the heart, we cannot apply the same censure to the Scholastic method; though at the same time we cannot give, even here, unqualified praise. A great part of their Metaphysics was mere Ontology; a Science, that is, of the abstract nature of Being, meagre in its pursuit and unfruitful in its result. For they did not extend the term Metaphysics, according to modern usage, to the Science of the laws of the human Mind. The knowledge of the nature of Mind was included by Aristotle, and other ancient Philosophers, under Physics; and the Schoolmen here, as in other respects, followed the arrangement already prescribed. Nor is there indeed any fault in such an arrangement; if we understand by the nature of the Mind, simply the laws of its operations, as unfolded in the facts of consciousness and observation. And, perhaps, it would be better if the Science of Metaphysics were restricted to an investigation of the laws of Thought; to an analysis, that is, of the various notions of the Mind. In this view of the Science, Language becomes the great medium of observation: since Language has been formed by that very analysis which we are formally pursuing in this method of Metaphysical Science. This is the view given in the Treatise of Aristotle, to which modern commentators have assigned the name of The Metaphysics; and which is consequently adopted by the Schoolmen. So far as this restricted view of the Science is concerned, much valuable matter is to be collected from their writings. No Philosophers have traced with such patience, and minute exactness, the shades by which the Ideas involved in terms of Language are discriminated from each other, or more illustrated that secret process by which Ideas are combined and infinitely diversified. Their whole Philosophy indeed bears on this point. But their great error is, as we have throughout endeavoured to show, that they have carried principles of this Science into other Sciences, and by a fallacious Realism have made these principles interpreters of external nature.

Further, as studying Metaphysical Science by the medium of Language, they were led to overlook the limits which separated it from Logic. Accordingly, though they have displayed a wonderful practical acuteness as Logicians, they have by no means excelled, as scientific expositors of Logical Truth. They cultivated it chiefly in subservience to Metaphysical Truth, and therefore comparatively neglected the treatment of that part of it which more strictly relates to the theory of argument. Paradoxical as it may seem, they had properly no Logic strictly so called. Logic, not being studied by them as a Science of Language, but as a method of universal discovery, was in consequence of this misapplication, stunted of its due proportion as a Science of reasoning; whilst it was, preposterously enlarged in its immediate connexion with Metaphysics.

In Moral Science they had an admirable guide in the Ethical system of Aristotle. The extensive and accurate knowledge of human nature which Aristotle displays throughout his Moral Treatises, served to his disciples of the Schools instead of their own experience. Otherwise, shut out as they were from the general intercourse of mankind, and living entirely in the secret converse of their own thoughts, how could they have learned the nature of human actions and sentiments, principles which chiefly depend on society for their perfect development? As it is, they have merged Moral Philosophy in Theology, by connecting the rules of duty with the abstract notion of the Deity regarded as the Chief Good of Man. We feel, indeed, even in this day, the effect of this confusion, in the vague opinions commonly held respecting the relation of Morality to Theology. But the case was here as in their Logic. Their practice was superior to their theory. Whilst they constructed a system of Moral Theology, as their Ethical science was termed, they spoke as practical Moralists with a wisdom far exceeding the stretch of their technical Philosophy. Much of this practical excellence must undoubtedly be attributed to the clear outlines which Revelation has sketched for those who would "do justly and love mercy," whilst they also "walk humbly with their God." Still as the Scriptures refrain altogether from Moral theory, simply employing the popular language on Moral subjects to express their precepts; there is ample room for the Scriptural Theologian to construct his own system of Ethics. And thus have Philosophers, in some instances, at the same time that they acknowledged the authority of the Scriptures, deviated widely in their conclusions from the practical spirit of Christianity. This, in fact, is what has happened in the case of the Schoolmen. The pursuit of the principle of the Chief Good,—the Platonic part of their Ethical doctrine,—led them to place the excellence of the Christian life in an estrangement from active duties, and in an entire abstraction of the thoughts and affections from all human concerns. Here it was then, that the Philosophy of Aristotle applied a salutary check, and prevented the whole system of Scholastic Ethics from rushing into a theoretic enthusiasm. How far it acted in this manner

Thomas Aquinas.

Logic confounded with Metaphysics.

Importance of Aristotle's Ethics.

Moral Theology.

Biography. may be judged from those of the Schoolmen, who, indulging a mystic imagination, felt less of this control. If we compare Bonaventura with Aquinas, we shall see the decided superiority of the Aristotelic Moralist over the tender enthusiast of the Platonic School.

No proper distinction of Sciences in Scholastic method.

In treating, however, these different Sciences as distinct, we have done so only by way of illustration of the influence of the Scholastic method on the great leading divisions of human knowledge. Strictly to speak, Scholasticism was in itself one absorbing Science, in which all Sciences were confounded. An evidence of this is, that no other kinds of knowledge were pursued by the Scholastic Philosopher, except those which admitted of being transfused into this promiscuous, technical system. There subsisted, indeed, a formal division of the Arts into Grammar, Logic, and Rhetoric, Arithmetic, Geometry, Astronomy, Music, the first three named the Trivium, the four last the Quadrivium: still the Arts were by no means cultivated in themselves, when Scholasticism had once taken deep root. Its dry and leafless branches, spreading out with unhappy luxuriance, withered every thing around them with their funereal shade. As for Rhetoric, considered as an Art of eloquence or composition, it was entirely unknown. An inopportune, technical Logic occupied every place, and effectually excluded by its presence, any expression that could strike the imagination or interest the feelings. For it is not only the naked framework of argument which is presented in the Scholastic page. There is an eloquence in the mere force of argument barely stated, without the least adjunct of recommendation from language. But this is not the mode in which the Scholastic argumentation is exhibited. The parade of the syllogistic process—the anatomy itself of argument—is forced on our notice. The same fundamental error, through which the Schoolmen applied rules of investigation to the solution of Physical facts, is shown in their application of the technical principles of Logic. The syllogism, which, properly considered, is nothing more than a development of the latent process in every argument, becomes in their hands the method of communicating knowledge, and the instrument by which conviction is to be produced; not the mere analysis of an operation of the Mind. The office of Rhetoric, of course, was entirely superseded by such a method of teaching. There was no room left for arguments of unfortunate use of the Syllogism.

inducement,—for enforcing persuasion by appeals to the intellectual and moral principles of human nature. Nothing could add to the cogency and perspicuity of an instrument, conceived to be so efficacious and infallible.

Thomas Aquinas.

The marks, indeed, of the origin of the Scholastic Philosophy, accompany it throughout in its development. As it arose in the struggles of Reason against an imperious authority, so Reason is throughout the principle with which it is concerned, and which alone it endeavours to satisfy. It had not for its object, to win men to the Truth: it sought only to justify and secure an obedience to which the unwilling intellect was constrained.

The Reason the only principle addressed.

Its whole tendency, accordingly, was to magnify Reason against the principle of mere authority. And on this account (though the assertion may seem strange) the Schoolmen must undoubtedly be reckoned among the precursors of the reformation both of Religion and Philosophy. By the temerity of their speculations, they inured the minds of men to think boldly: and they raised doubts and difficulties which sustained the inquisitive spirit, until at least a better day should dawn upon its efforts. Unconscious they were themselves of the benefit, which was slowly and painfully resulting from their own abortive endeavours. But what they were in themselves was merely accidental, and passed away with them. The spirit which they had nurtured, survived beyond them, to fight against the system within which it had grown up; as the system itself had fought against the arbitrary authority of the Church, within whose bosom it had been cherished. Thus we find some of the early Schoolmen strenuous opponents of the usurpations of Rome: as Robert Grossetete, Bishop of Lincoln, in the XIIIth Century, and Ockam in the XIVth. A reaction, indeed, took place, by which the conclusions of the Scholastic Theologians were expressly affirmed in the decrees of the Church of Rome; and invested with that perpetuity, which the dogmatist of that communion claims for its authoritative declarations. This curious effect, consequently, has followed; that the same writers live as authorities in Theological speculation to the Roman Church, who, as the advocates of Reason against the Church-system, have raised up its most formidable antagonists, both in Religion and in Philosophy.

Influence of the Schoolmen on the reformation of Religion and Philosophy.

END OF VOL. XI.

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES, DUKE-STREET, LANCEN.

